HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

No. CXLV.—JUNE, 1862.—VOL. XXV.

BROADWAY.

"ALIVE WITH THE TREAD OF FEET."

THE sunlight falls from the fair blue sky
On buildings stately and grand and high,
Whose distant roofs seem to touch the clouds
That gaze below on the passing crowds.
Hung with laces and lawns so fine,
With silks and satins that shimmer and shine,
Shawls of Cashmere, and robes of wool
Wondrously woven, crowded full Entered according to Act of Congress, in the year 1862, by Harper and Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

VOL. XXV.—No. 145.—A

Are the polished windows with all things rare,
From the costly cloth made of camel's-hair
To the plumes of the ostrich white as snow,
And the silky down of the marabou:

Purple clusters from Spanish vines;
Tropical fruits and luscious wines;

Jewels that sparkle, of every kind:—
Luminous pearls that the divers find
Down in the depths of the sea so blue,
Scintillant diamonds like drops of dew,
Wine-dark rubies and emeralds fine,
Milky opals that gleam and shine
Like sullen fires through a pallid mist,
With the carven onyx and amethyst.

'Tis four o'clock, and the crowded street
Is all alive with the tread of feet;
Hither they come and thither they go,
Like a mighty river they ebb and flow,
With a rushing sound as of falling rain,
Or of wind that ripples the grassy plain.
The old and the young, the sad and the gay
Jostle each other on bright Broadway.
Hard-featured men with sinister faces,
Women adorned with jewels and laces,
There are men with beards and men who have none
Every condition under the sun:—
The man of fashion and indolent ease,
The sun-browned sailor from over the seas,
The cold, proud lady of stately mien,
The child who is sweeping the cross-way clean,
The whiskered fop with the vacuous stare,
The gambler standing outside his lair,
Innocent girlhood in contact with Shame
That purity shudders to think of or name:—
Hither they come and thither they go,
Like a mighty river they ebb and flow,
With a rushing sound as of falling rain,
Or of wind that ripples the grassy plain.

Hark! down the street there is something coming.
A mingling of fifes and noisy drumming;
With gleam of sabre and bayonet bright
That, glancing, flash in the warm sun's light;
Nearer they come with soldierly tread,
And the calm blue heavens high overhead
Ring with the shout of the clamorous throng,
As each solid column is marched along.

In her elegant carriage, dressed with care,
Sits the haughty Madame Millionaire.
A queen she looks as she rides in state,
And the strong-limbed horses seem elate
With the thought of the lady, fine and gay,
Who rides behind them on bright Broadway.
With their iron-clad hoofs the stones they spurn;
The folks on the sidewalk gaze, and turn
To gaze again as she passes by—
When lo! on the air breaks a piercing cry,

"DOWN THE STREET THERE IS SOMETHING COMING."

"SITS A WOMAN, POORLY CLAD AND THIN."

And some one lifts from the cold, hard stones
 A shapeless bundle of broken bones,
 And they bear it off in a jolting cart,
 'Mid the noise and din of the busy mart.—
 On the pavement yonder, cold and bare,
 At the further corner, over there
 By the marble building lofty and grand,
 Around whose windows the people stand
 And stare at the costly show within,
 Sits a woman, poorly clad and thin,
 With hand outstretched and a pleading face
 So wan and wasted that you may trace
 Each separate bone through the shriveled skin,
 And count them all from the brow to the chin.

Two hours have passed—from factories grim,
 With windows smoky, dusty, and dim,
 Through whose crusted panes the sunshine falls
 On the grimy floors and the blackened walls,
 Comes a sudden current of human life—
 Mother and daughter, sister and wife—
 Glad to escape from the heated rooms,
 The whirring spindles and noisy looms,
 From the squalid, narrow, and gloomy streets
 Which the light of heaven but seldom greets,

"COMES A SUDDEN CURRENT OF HUMAN LIFE."

"THE LIGHTS ARE LIT IN DWELLING AND STORE."

From the fetid air they have breathed all day,
To the life and vigor of bright Broadway;
And on they pass with the hurrying crowd,
While swells the murmur prolonged and loud.

The lights are lit in dwelling and store;
In countless numbers, score upon score
Of those that crowded the brilliant mart
Are gone to their homes in the city's heart;
Yet the throng in the street seems hardly less
In the crush and tumult, hurry and press.

One! two! three! four!
Over the roofs of the city pour
The hollow notes of the deep-mouthed bells,
Louder and louder the chorus swells;
The engines rattle adown the street;
The pavement rings to the tread of feet;
The air is wild with the hoarse, loud cry
Of the panting firemen hurrying by.

Ten has sounded—that stroke is the last;
Painted shadows go flitting past,
The stages pause on their upward way,
To wait for those who are in at the play.

They are coming now, like a gath'ring tide,
 From the glare and heat to the world outside.
 And the women seem, in their evening dresses,
 Made expressly for love's caresses.
 Like a lovely vision they pass, and soon
 Their voices sound in the gay saloon.

'Tis the dead of night, and silent and dark
 Are the shadowy trees in the gloomy park.
 And silent, too, is the beautiful street,
 Save the watchman pacing his lonely beat.
 The bundle of bones on the hospital bed
 Moans, and tosses its restless head;
 While the haughty Madame Millionaire
 In her chamber, where the indolent air
 Is heavy with perfume from fragrant urns,
 And the waxen taper drowsily burns,
 With the sumptuous curtains closely drawn,
 Sleeps on her pillow of snowy lawn.

The hours go by, and the pale, wan light
 Comes like a ghost to startle the night;
 Far up on the buildings so grand and high,
 That rear their forms to the morning sky,
 On shaft and column and cornice bold
 God writes his love in letters of gold.

"FROM THE GLARE AND HEAT TO THE WORLD OUTSIDE."

"THE WATCHMAN PACING HIS LONELY BEAT."

A LONELY RIDE.

A DANGEROUS JOURNEY.

IN TWO PARTS—PART II.

AS I struck into the trail and out into the broad valley of the Salinas a sense of freedom relieved me in some degree of the gloom inspired by the last words of this strangely unfortunate man. The stars were shining brightly overhead, but the moon had gone down some time previously. It was just light enough to see the way. A small white object lying in the trail caused the mule to start. In the excitement of my escape I had forgotten about the papers. Here they were, all safe. I had no doubt they had been thus disposed of by the ruffian Jack, during the previous evening when he took occasion to absent himself from the camp. I quickly dismounted and placed the package securely in the leg of one of my boots, then pushed on with all speed to reach a turning-point of the mountains some distance ahead, in order to be out of sight by the dawn of day, which could not be far off. In about an hour I had gained this point, and at the same time the first faint streaks of the coming day began to appear in the eastern sky. The air was peculiarly balmy—cool enough to be pleasant, and deliciously odorous with the herbage of the mountains. Already the deer began to leave their coverts among the shrubbery on the hill-sides, and numerous bands of them stood gazing at me as I passed, their antlers erect, their beautiful forms motionless, as if hewn from the solid rock, but manifesting more curiosity than fear. Thousands of rabbits frisked about in the open glades, and innumerable flocks of quail flitted from bush to bush. The field-larks and doves made the air musical with their joyous hymns of praise to the rising sun; the busy hum of bees rose among the wild flowers by the way-side; all nature seemed to awake from its repose smiling with a celestial joy. In no other country upon earth have I seen such mornings as in the interior of California—so clear, bright, and sparkling—so rich and glowing in atmospheric tints—so teeming with unbounded opulence in all that gives vigor, health, and beauty to animated nature, and inspiration to the higher faculties of man. There is a redundancy of richness in the earth, air, and light unknown even in that land of fascination which is said to possess "the fatal gift of beauty."

Contrasted with the dark spirit of crime that hung over my late encampment, such a morning was inexpressibly lovely. Every breath of air—every sound that broke upon the listening ear—every thought of the vast wild plains and towering mountains that swept around me in the immeasurable distance—inspired vague and unutterable sensations of pleasure and pain—pleasure that I was free and capable of enjoying such exquisite physical and mental luxuries; pain that here, on God's own footstool,

"All but the spirit of man was divine."

As the sun rose, and spread over mountain and valley a drapery of glowing light, giving promise of continued life to the birds of the air and the beasts of the field, I could not but think with sadness how man—made after God's own image, the most perfect of his works, gifted with reason and intelligence—should so strangely turn aside from the teachings of his Maker, and cast away the pure enjoyments so bountifully spread before him. Was it possible that a single created being, however steeped in crime, could be insensible to the soothing and humanizing influences of such a scene?

The unhappy fate of the poor fellow to whom I was so deeply indebted haunted me. He, at least, must have felt the better promptings of his inner nature amidst these beautiful works of a beneficent Creator. Surely such a man could never be utterly lost. There were noble traits in his character that must, some time or other, assert their supremacy. Honorable even in his degradation, he scorned to turn traitor to men whom he despised. His was not a nature formed for cruel and crafty deeds. Frank, manly, and ingenuous in his whole bearing, there was evidence of innate nobility in his misguided sense of honor, and a manifest scorn of deception in his wild outbursts of passion. What could have driven him to this career of crime? What Satanic power was that by which he was enthralled? I could not believe that he was voluntarily bad. That single outburst of emotion as he spoke of his mother would have redeemed him had he been the worst of criminals. A career of dissipation must have brought him to this. He was evidently compromised, but to what extent? Some painful mystery hung over his connection with these bad men—I could not fathom it. The more I reflected upon all I had seen and heard, the more profound became my sympathy; nor is it an affectation of generosity to say that I would have sacrificed much to have saved him. Yet this man's case was not an uncommon one in California. There were many there, even at that early period, and there are still many, who, with the noblest attributes that adorn human nature, have become castaways.

As the day advanced a marked change became perceptible in the character of the country. Passing out from the valley of the Salinas to the right, the trail entered a series of smaller valleys, winding from one to another through a succession of narrow cañons between low, gravelly hills, destitute of shrubbery, and of a peculiarly whitish and barren aspect. The scene was no longer enlivened by bands of deer and smaller game, such as I had seen in the morning; the birds had also disappeared; not a living thing was in sight save a few buzzards hovering in the air over the bleached and sterile hills, and occasionally a coyote or wild-cat skulking stealthily across the trail. Toward noon the earth became like a fiery furnace. The air was scorching. In the narrow passages, where the hills converged into a focus, cutting off every current of air, the refraction of the sun's rays was absolutely terrific. It seemed as if my very clothing must crisp into tinder and drop from my body. The skin peeled from my face and hands; a thick woolen hat was insufficient to keep the fierce and seething heat from my head, and I sometimes feared I would be smitten to the earth. Not knowing the water-holes, or rather having no time to look for them, I was parched with an intolerable thirst. On every eminence I turned to look back, but nothing was in sight save the dreary waste of barren hills that lay behind.

Toward evening, having stopped only a few minutes at a pool of water, my mule began to lag again. I had no spurs, and it was utterly in vain that I urged him on by kicks and blows. His greatest speed was a slow trot, and to keep that up for a few hundred yards at a time required my utmost efforts. By sundown I estimated that the distance to San Miguel must be twelve or fifteen miles. It was a very unpleasant position to be in—pursued, as I had every reason to suppose, by men who would not hesitate to take my life, yet unable to accelerate the speed of my animal. All I could do was to continue beating him.

The country became still more lonesome and desolate as I advanced. The chances of being overtaken momentarily increased. My anxiety to reach San Miguel caused me to forget all the sufferings of fatigue and thirst, and strain every nerve to get my mule over the ground. But the greater the effort the slower he traveled. It was true, I had a pistol and could make some defense. Yet the chances were greatly against me. Unskilled in this sort of warfare, an indifferent rider, unacquainted with the trails by which I might be cut off and surprised, it seemed indeed a very hopeless case, should such an emergency arise. Besides, it would be very little satisfaction to shoot one, or even two men, against whom I felt no enmity, and whose lives were worth nothing to me; and still less to get killed myself. The truth is, I had a particular relish for life; others were interested in it as well as myself, and I did not feel disposed to risk it unnecessarily.

The sun went down at last, and the soft shadows of night began to soften the asperities of the scene. I rode on, never once relaxing my efforts to get a little more speed out of my mule. The moon rose, and innumerable stars twinkled in the sky. The air became delightfully balmy. Long shadows of rocks and trees swept across the trail. Mystic forms seemed to flit through the dim distance, or stand like ghostly sentinels along the way-side. Often I fancied I could see men on horseback stationed under the overhanging rocks, and detect the glitter of their arms in the moonlight. Stumps of trees riven by the storms of winter loomed up among the rocks like grim spectres; the very bushes assumed fantastic forms, and waved their long arms in gestures of warning. The howling of innumerable coyotes and the hooting of the night-owls had a singularly weird effect in the stillness of the night.

It must have been nearly ten o'clock when my mule suddenly stopped, turned around, and set up that peculiar nickering bray by which these animals hail the approach of strangers. As soon as he ceased his unwelcome noise I listened, and distinctly heard the clatter of hoofs in the road, about half a mile in the rear. That my pursuers were rapidly approaching there was now very little doubt. It was useless to attempt to reach San Miguel, which must be still four or five miles distant. I had no time, and resolved at once to make for a little grove some three or four hundred yards to the right. As I approached the nearest trees I was rejoiced to see something like a fence. A little farther on was a gray object with a distinct outline. It must be a house. There was no light; but I soon discovered that I was within fifty yards of a small adobe building. My mule now pricked up his ears, snuffed the air wildly, and absolutely refused to move a step nearer. I dismounted and tried to drag him toward the door. His terror seemed unconquerable. With starting eyes and a wild blowing sound from his nostrils, he broke away and dashed out into the plain. I speedily lost sight of him.

This time I had taken the precaution to secure my papers and pistol on my person. The mule had taken the direction of San Miguel, but even should I be unable to recover him the loss would not be so great as before. However, it was no time to calculate losses. The clatter of hoofs grew nearer and nearer, and soon the advancing forms of two mounted men became distinctly visible in the moonlight. There was no alternative but to seek security in the old adobe. I ran for the door and pushed it open. The house was evidently untenanted. No answer was made to my summons save a mocking echo from the bare walls. My pursuers must have caught sight of me as they approached. I could hear their imprecations as they tried to force their animals up to the door. One of the party—the Colonel, whose voice I had no difficulty in recognizing, said:

"Blast the fellow! what did he come here for?"

The other answered with an oath and a brutal laugh,

"We've got him holed, any how! It won't take long to root him out."

They then dismounted and proceeded to tie their horses to the nearest tree. I could hear them talk as they receded, but could not make out what they said.

While this was going on I had closed the door and was looking for some bolt or fastening when I heard the low fierce growl of some animal. There was no time to conjecture what it was—the next moment a furry skin brushed past, and the animal sprang through an opening in the wall.

A wooden bar was all I could find; but the iron fastening had been broken, and the only way of securing the door was to brace the bar against it in a diagonal position. The floor was of rough hard clay, and served in some sort to prevent the brace from slipping. A few moments of painful anxiety passed. I had drawn my revolver, and stood close against the inner wall, prepared to fire upon the first man that entered. Presently the two men returned, approaching stealthily along the wall, so as to avoid coming in range of the door. The sharp, hard voice of the Colonel first broke the silence.

"Come," said he, "open the door! You can't help yourself now! It is all up with you, my fine fellow!"

I knew the villains wanted to find my position, and made no answer.

"You may as well come out at once," said the Colonel; "you have no chance! There is nobody here to stand by you as there was last night. Your friend is keeping camp with a bullet through his head and a gash in his throat!"

Pressed as I was this news shocked me beyond measure. The unfortunate man who had befriended me had paid the penalty of his life for his kindness!

"Out with you!" roared the Colonel, fiercely—"or we'll burst the door down! Come, be quick!"

Another pause. I heard a low whispering, and stood with breathless anxiety with my finger upon the trigger of my pistol. In that brief period it was wonderful how many thoughts flashed through my mind. I knew nothing of the construction of the house, had no time even to look around and see if there was any back entrance. A faint light through one small window-hole in front, within three feet of the door, was all I could discern. Every nerve was strained to its utmost tension. My sense of hearing was painfully acute. The low whispering of the two ruffians, the faint jingling of their spurs, the very creaking of their boots, as they stealthily moved, was fearfully audible. With an almost absolute certainty of death, without the remotest hope of relief, it was strange how my thoughts wandered back upon the past; how the peaceful fireside of home was pictured to my mind; how vividly I saw the beloved faces of kindred and friends; how all that were dear to me seemed to sympathize in my unhappy fate. Yet it was impossible to realize that my time had come. The whole thing—the camp, the dark, murderous faces, the chase, the blockade—resembled rather some horrible fantasy than the dread truth. Strange, too, that I should have noticed something even grotesque in my situation; run into a hole, as the ruffian Jack had said, like a coyote or a badger. Five minutes—it seemed a long time—must have passed in this way, when I became conscious of a gradual darkening in the room. A low, heavy breathing attracted my attention. I looked in the direction of the window and thought I could detect something moving; but the darkness was so impenetrable that it might be the result of imagination. Should I fire and miss my mark; the flash would reveal my position and be certain destruction. The dark mass again moved. I could distinctly hear the respiration. It must be one of the men trying to get in through the small window-hole. I raised my pistol, took dead aim as near as possible upon the centre of the object, and fired. The fall of a heavy body outside, a groan, an imprecation, was all I could hear, when a tremendous effort was made to force the door, and two shots were fired through it in quick succession. The wood was massive but much decayed; and I saw that it was rapidly giving way before the furious assaults that were made upon it from the outside, evidently with a heavy piece of timber. Another lunge or two of this powerful battering-ram must have borne it from its hinges or shattered it to fragments.

“Hold on, Jack!” said the wounded man in a low voice; “come here, quick! The infernal fool has shot me through the shoulder! I’m bleeding badly.”

The ruffian dropped his bar, as I judged by the sound, and turned to drag his leader out of range of the door. Now was the time for a bold move. Hitherto I had acted on the defensive; but every thing depended on following up the advantage. Removing the brace from the door, I made an opening sufficient to get a glimpse of the two men. The stout fellow, Jack, was stooping down dragging the other toward the corner of the house. I fired again. The ball was too low; it missed his body but must have shattered his wrist; for with a horrible oath he dropped his burden, and staggered back a few paces writhing with pain, his hand covered with blood. Before I could get another shot he darted behind the house. At the same time the Colonel rose on his knee, turned quickly, and fired. The ball whizzed by my head and struck the door. While I was trying to get a shot at him in return, he jumped to his feet and staggered out of range. I thought it best now to rest satisfied with my success so far, and again retired to my position behind the door.

For the next ten or fifteen minutes I could hear, from time to time, the smothered imprecations of the wounded ruffians, but after this there was a dead silence. I heard nothing more. They had either gone or were lying in wait near by, supposing I would come out. This uncertainty caused me considerable anxiety, for I dared not abandon my gloomy retreat. Two or three hours must have passed in this way, during which I was constantly on the guard; but not the slightest indication of the presence of the enemy was perceptible.

Two nights had nearly passed, during which I had not closed my eyes in sleep. The perpetual strain of mind and the fatigue of travel were beginning to tell. I felt faint and drowsy. During the whole terrible ordeal of this night I had not dared to sit down. But now my legs refused to support me any longer. I groped my way toward a corner of the room to lie down. Some soft mass on the ground caused me to stumble. I threw out my hands and fell. What was it that sent such a thrill of horror through every fibre? A dead body lay in my embrace—cold, mutilated, and clotted with blood!

It has been my fortune, during a long career of travel in foreign lands, to see death in many forms. I do not profess to be exempt from the weakness common to most men—a natural dread of that undiscovered region toward which we are all traveling. But I never had any peculiar repugnance to the presence of dead men. What are they, after all, but inanimate clay? The living are to be feared—not the dead, who sleep the sleep that knows no waking. Not this—not the sudden contact with a corpse; not simply the cold and blood-clotted face over which I passed my hand was it that caused me to recoil with such a thrill of horror. It was the solution of a dread mystery. There, in a pool of clotted gore, lay the corpse of a murdered man. No need was there to conjecture who were his murderers.

I rose up, thoroughly aroused from my drowsiness. It was probable others had shared the fate of this man. If so, their bodies must be near at hand. I was afraid to open the door to let in the light, for, bad as it was to be shut up in a dark room with the victim or victims of a cruel murder, it was worse to incur the risk of a similar fate by exposing myself. After somewhat recovering my composure I groped about, and soon discovered that three other bodies were lying in the room: one on a bed—a woman with her throat cut from ear to ear—and two smaller bodies on the floor near by—children perhaps eight or ten years old, but so mutilated that it was difficult to tell what they were. Their limbs were almost denuded of flesh, and their faces and bodies were torn into shapeless masses.

This must have been the finishing work of the animal—a coyote no doubt—that had startled me with a growl, and broken through the window after I had first closed the door. I could also now account for the strange manner in which the mule had snuffed the air, and his unconquerable terror in approaching the house.

Only a few articles of furniture were in the room—a bed, two or three broken stools, a frying-pan, coffee-pot, and a few other cooking utensils, thrown in a heap near the fire-place. There was no other room; nor was there any back entrance, as I had at first apprehended.

It was a gloomy place enough to spend a night in; but there was no help for it. I certainly had less fear of the dead than of the living. It could not be over two or three hours till morning; and it was not likely the two men, who were seeking my life, would lurk about the premises much longer, if they had not long since taken their departure, which seemed the most probable.

I knelt down and commended my soul to God; then stretched myself across the brace against the door, and, despite the presence of death, fell fast asleep. It was broad daylight when I awoke. The sun's earliest rays were pouring into the room through the little window and the cracks of the door. A ghastly spectacle was revealed—a ghastly array of room-mates lying stiff and stark before me.

From the general appearance of the dead bodies I judged them to be an emigrant family from some of the Western States. They had probably taken up a temporary residence in the old adobe hut after crossing the plains by the Southern route, and must have had money or property of some kind to have inspired the cupidity of their murderers. The man was apparently fifty years of age; his skull was split completely open, and his brains scattered out upon the earthen floor. The woman was doubtless his wife. Her clothes were torn partly from her body, and her head was cut nearly off from her shoulders; besides which her skull was fractured with some dull instrument, and several ghastly wounds disfigured her person. The bed-clothes were saturated with blood, now clotted by the parching heat. The two children had evidently been cut down by the blows of an axe. Their heads were literally shattered to fragments. What the murderers had failed to accomplish in mutilating the bodies had been completed by some ravenous beast of prey—the same, no doubt, already mentioned.

I saw no occasion to prolong my stay. It was hardly probable the Colonel and Jack, wounded as they were, would renew their attack. They must have made their way back to camp, or at least retired to some part of the country where they would incur less risk of capture.

It was a bright and beautiful morning as I left the house and turned toward San Miguel. The contrast between the peaceful scene before me and the horrible sight I had just witnessed was exceedingly impressive. The mellow light of the early sun on the mountains; the winding streams fringed with shrubbery; the rich, golden hue of the valley; the cattle grazing quietly in the low meadows bordering on the Salinas River; the singing of the birds in the oak groves, were indescribably refreshing to a fevered mind, and filled my heart with thankfulness that I was spared to enjoy them once more. Yet I could not but think of what I had witnessed in the adobe hut—a whole family cut down by the ruthless hands of murderers who might still be lurking behind the bushes on the wayside. Their dreadful crime haunted the scene, and its exquisite repose seemed almost a cruel mockery. De Quincey somewhere remarks that he never experienced such profound sensations of sadness as on a bright summer day, when the very luxuriance and maturity of outer life, and the fullness of sunshine that filled the visible world, made the desolation and the darkness within the more oppressive. I could now well understand the feeling; and though grief had but little part in it, beyond a natural regret for the unhappy fate of the murdered family, still it was sad to feel the contrast between the purity and beauty of God's creation and the willful wickedness of man.

I had not lost the strong instinct of self-preservation, which, so far at least, through the kind aid of Providence, had enabled me to preserve my life; and in my lonely walk toward San Miguel I was careful to keep in the open valley, and avoid, as much as possible, coming within range of the rocks and bushes. In about an hour I saw the red tile roofs and motley collection of ruinous old buildings that comprised the former missionary station of San Miguel. A gang of lean, wolfish dogs ran out to meet me as I approached, and it was not without difficulty that I could keep them off without resorting to my revolver, which was an alternative that might produce a bad impression where I most hoped to meet with a friendly reception. As I approached the main buildings I was struck with the singularly wild and desolate aspect of the place. Not a living being was in sight. The carcass of a dead ox lay in front of the door, upon which a voracious brood of buzzards were feeding; and a coyote sat howling on an eminence a little beyond. I walked into a dark, dirty room, and called out, in what little Spanish I knew, for the man of the house. "Quien es?" demanded a gruff voice. I looked in a corner, and saw a filthy-looking object, wrapped in a poncho, sitting lazily on a bed. By his uncouth manner and forbidding appearance I judged him to be the vaquero in charge of the place, in which I was not mistaken. With considerable difficulty I made him comprehend that I had lost my mule, and supposed it had strayed to San Miguel.

"Quien sabe?" said the fellow, indifferently.

Could he not find it? I would be willing to reward him. I would give him the blankets. I was an Oficial, and was on my way to San Luis Obispo. To each of these propositions the man returned a stupid and yawning answer, "Quien sabe—who knows?"

Finding nothing to be gained on that point I asked him for something to eat, for I was well-nigh famished with hunger. He pointed lazily to a string of jerked beef strung across the rafters. It required but little time to select a few dry pieces, and while I was eating them the fellow asked me if I had any tobacco. I handed him a plug, which speedily produced a good effect, for he got up and passed me a plate of cold tortillas. When I had somewhat satisfied the cravings of hunger, I asked him, in my broken Spanish, if he had heard of the murder—five persons killed in an old adobe house near by. "Quien sabe?" said he, in the same indifferent tone. "Muchos malos hombres aquí." This was all he knew, or professed to know, of the murder.

"Amigo," said I, "if you'll get my mule and bring him here, I'll give you this watch."

He took the watch and examined it carefully, handed it back, and remarked as before, "Quien sabe?" The glitter of the gold, however, seemed to quicken his perceptive faculties to this extent that he got up from the bed, put on his spurs, took a riata from a peg on the wall, and walked out, leaving me to entertain myself as I thought proper during his absence.

Having finished a substantial repast of jerked beef and tortillas, I went out and rambled about among the ruins for nearly an hour. A few lazy and thriftless Indians, lying in the sun here and there, were all the inhabitants of the place I could see. This ranch must have been a very desirable residence in former times. The climate is charming, except that it was a little warm in summer, and the cattle ranges are richly clothed with grass and very extensive.

In about an hour my friend the vaquero came back, mounted on a Broncho or wild horse, leading after him my mule, with the pack unchanged. From what I could understand he had found the mule entangled by the bridle in the bushes, some three miles on the trail toward San Luis. According to promise, I handed him my watch. He took it and examined it again, then handed it back without saying a word.

"Amigo," said I, "the watch is yours. I promised it to you if you found my mule."

To this he merely shrugged his shoulders.

"Won't you take it? I have no money."

"No, Señor," said he, at length, with a somewhat haughty air, "I am a Spanish gentleman."

"Oh, I beg your pardon. Will you do me the favor, then, to accept a plug of tobacco?"

I opened my pack and handed him a large plug of the finest pressed Cavendish.

"Mil gracias!" said the Spanish gentleman, smiling affably, and making a condescending inclination of the head. "That suits me better. A watch is bad property here. I don't want to be killed yet a while."

Here was a hint of his reason for declining the proffered reward. But he did it very grandly; and I was quite willing to accord to him the title of Señor Caballero to which he aspired, though he certainly looked as unlike the Caballeros described by the learned Fray Antonio Agapida, who went out to make war upon the Moors of Granada, as one distinguished individual can look unlike another.

There was ample reason why I should regard my mule with dissatisfaction. All my misfortunes, so far, had arisen from his defective physical and mental organization (if I may use the term in reference to such an animal); but the fact is, it has been my fate, as far back as I can recollect, to have the worst stock in the country foisted upon me. Never yet, up to this hour, have I succeeded in purchasing a sound, safe, and reliable animal—except, indeed, an old horse that I once owned in Oakland, generally known in the neighborhood as Selim the Steady—a name derived from his unconquerable propensity for remaining in the stable, or getting back to it as soon as ever he left the premises.

SPANISH CABALLERO.

The vaquero, or, as he aspired to be called, the Caballero, offered to barter his Broncho for my mule, and as an inducement set him to bucking all over the ground within a circle of fifty yards, merely to show the spirit of the animal, of which I was so well satisfied that I declined the barter.

Bidding my worthy friend a kindly "Adios," I mounted the mule and pursued my journey toward San Luis. The country, for many miles after leaving San Miguel, was very wild and picturesque. Blue mountains loomed up in the distance; and the trail passed through a series of beautifully undulating valleys, sometimes extensive and open, but often narrowed down to a mere gorge between the irregular spurs of the mountains. Game was very abundant, especially quail and rabbits. I saw also several fine herds of deer, and occasionally bands of large red wolves. It was a very lonesome road all the way to the valley of Santa Marguerita, not a house or human being to be seen for twenty miles at a stretch. Toward evening, on the first day after leaving San Miguel, I descended the bed of a creek to water my mule. While looking for the water-hole, I heard some voices, and suddenly found myself close by a camp of Sonorians. It was too late to retreat, for I was already betrayed by the braying of my mule. Upon riding into the camp I was struck with the savage and picturesque group before me, consisting of some ten or a dozen Sonorians. It is doing them no more than justice to say that they were the most villainous, cut-throat, ill-favored looking gang of vagabonds I had ever laid eyes upon. Some were smoking cigarritos by the fire, others lying all about under the trees playing cards, on their ragged saddle-blankets, with little piles of silver before them; and those that were not thus occupied were capering around on wild horses, breaking them apparently, for the blood streamed from the nostrils and flanks of the unfortunate animals, and they were covered with a reeking sweat.

Probably it may be thought that I exceeded the truth when I asked this promising party if they had seen six "Americanos" pass that way with a pack-train from San Luis, friends of mine that I was on the look-out for. They had seen no such pack-train; it had not passed since they camped there, which was several days ago.

"Then," said I, "it must be close at hand, and I must hurry on to meet it. The mules are laden with mucha plata."

Having watered my mule, I rode on about five miles further, where I reached a small ranch-house occupied by a native Californian family. They gave me a good supper of frijoles and jerked beef, and I slept comfortably on the porch.

Next day I struck into the Valley of Santa Marguerita. I shall never forget my first impression of this valley. Encircled by ranges of blue mountains were broad, rich pastures covered with innumerable herds of cattle; beautifully diversified with groves, streams, and shrubbery; castellated cliffs in the fore-ground as the trail wound downward; a group of cattle grazing by the margin of a little lake, their forms mirrored in the water; a mirage in the distance; mountain upon mountain beyond, as far as the eye could reach, till their dim outlines were lost in the golden glow of the atmosphere. Surely a more lovely spot never existed upon earth. I have wandered over many a bright and beautiful land, but never, even in the glorious East, in Italy, Spain, Switzerland, or South America, have I seen a country so richly favored by nature as California, and never a more lovely valley than Santa Marguerita upon the whole wide world. There is nothing comparable to the mingled wildness and repose of such a scene; the rich and glowing sky, the illimitable distances, the teeming luxuriance of vegetation, its utter isolation from the busy world, and the dreamy fascination that lurks in every feature.

I had passed nearly across the valley, and was about to enter upon an undulating and beautifully timbered range of country extending into it from the foot-hills, when a dust arose on a rise of ground a little to the left and about half a mile distant. My mule, ever on the alert for some new danger, pricked up his ears and manifested symptoms of uncontrollable fear. The object rapidly approached, and without further warning the mule whirled around and fled at the top of his speed. Neither bridle nor switch had the slightest effect. In vain I struggled to arrest his progress—believing this, like many other frights he had experienced on the road, was rather the result of innate cowardice than of any substantial cause of apprehension. One material difference was perceptible. He never before ran so fast. Through brush and mire, over rocks, into deep arroyas and out again, he dashed in his frantic career, never once stopping till by some mischance one of his fore-feet sank in a squirrel-hole, when he rolled headlong on the ground, throwing me with considerable violence several yards in advance. I jumped to my feet at once, hoping to catch him before he could get up, but he was on his feet and away before I had time to make the attempt. It now became a matter of personal interest to know what he was running from. Upon looking back I was astonished to see not only one object, but four others in the rear, bearing rapidly down toward me. The first was a large animal of some kind—I could not determine what—the others mounted horsemen in full chase. Whatever the object of the chase was, it was not safe to be a spectator in the direct line of their route. I cast a hurried look around and discovered a break in the earth a few hundred yards distant, toward which I ran with all speed. It was a sort of mound rooted up by the squirrels or coyotes, and afforded some trifling shelter, where I crouched down close to the ground. Scarcely had I partially concealed myself when I heard a loud shouting from the men on horseback, and, peeping over the bank, saw within fifty or sixty paces a huge grizzly bear, but no longer retreating. He had faced round toward his pursuers, and now seemed determined to fight. The horsemen were evidently native Californians, and managed their animals with wonderful skill and grace. The nearest swept down like an avalanche toward the bear, while the others coursed off a short distance in a circling direction to prevent his escape. Suddenly swerving a little to one side, the leader whirled his lasso once or twice around his head and let fly at his game with unerring aim. The loop caught one of the fore-paws, and the bear was instantly jerked down upon his haunches, struggling and roaring with all his might. It was a striking instance of the power of the rider over the horse, that, wild with terror as the latter was, he dared not disobey the slightest pressure of the rein, but went through all the evolutions, blowing trumpet-blasts from his nostrils and with eyes starting from their sockets. Despite the strain kept upon the lasso, the bear soon regained his feet and commenced hauling in the spare line with his fore-paws so as to get within reach of the horse. He had advanced within ten feet before the nearest of the other horsemen could bring his lasso to bear upon him. The first throw was at his hind-legs—the main object being to stretch him out—but it missed. Another more fortunate cast took him round the neck. Both riders pulled in opposite directions, and the bear soon rolled on the ground again, biting furiously at the lassos, and uttering the most terrific roars. The strain upon his neck soon choked off his breath, and he was forced to let loose his grasp upon the other lasso. While struggling to free his neck, the two other horsemen dashed up, swinging their lassos, and shouting with all their might so as to attract his attention. The nearest, watching narrowly every motion of the frantic animal, soon let fly his lasso and made a lucky hitch around one of his hind-legs. The other following quickly with a large loop swung it entirely over the bear's body—and all four riders now set up a yell of triumph and began pulling in opposite directions. The writhing, pitching, and straining of the powerful monster were now absolutely fearful. A dust arose over him, and the earth flew up in every direction.

LASSOING A GRIZZLY.

Sometimes by a desperate effort he regained his feet, and actually dragged one or more of the horses toward him by main strength; but whenever he attempted this the others stretched their lassos, and either choked him or jerked him down upon his haunches. It was apparent that his wind was giving out, partly by reason of the long chase, and partly owing to the noose around his throat. A general pull threw him once more upon his back. Before he could regain his feet, the horsemen, by a series of dextrous manœuvres, wound him completely up; so that he lay perfectly quiet upon the ground, breathing heavily, and utterly unable to extricate his paws from the labyrinth of lassos in which he was entangled. One of the riders now gave the reins of his horse to another and dismounted. Cautiously approaching, with a spare riata, he cast a noose over the bear's fore-paws, and wound the remaining part tightly round the neck, so that what strength might still have been left was speedily exhausted by suffocation. This done, another rider dismounted, and the two soon succeeded in binding their victim so firmly by the paws that it was impossible for him to break loose. They next bound his jaws together by means of another riata, winding it all the way up around his head, upon which they loosened the fastening around his neck so as to give him air. When all was secure, they freed the lassos and again mounted their horses. I thought it about time now to make known my presence and stood up. Some of the party had evidently seen me during the progress of the chase, for they manifested no surprise; and the leader, after exchanging a few

"Buenas días, Señor!" He then informed me, as well as I could understand, that he had sent a man to catch my mule, and it would be back presently. While we were endeavoring to carry on some conversation in reference to the capture of the bear, during which I made out to gather that they were going to drag him to the ranch on a bullock's hide and have a grand bullfight with him in the course of a few days, the vaquero returned with my mule.

I had a pleasant journey of thirty-five miles that day. Nothing further occurred worthy of record. When night overtook me I was within fifteen miles of San Luis. I camped under a tree, and, notwithstanding some apprehension of the Sonorians, made out to get a good sleep.

Next morning I was up and on my way by daylight. The country, as I advanced, increased in picturesque beauty, and the hope of soon reaching my destination gave me additional pleasure. A few hours more, and I was safely lodged with some American friends. Thus ended what I think the reader must admit was "a dangerous journey."

A few days after my arrival in St. Luis I went, in company with a young American by the name of Jackson, to a fandango given by the native Californians. The invitation, as usual in such cases, was general, and the company not very select. Every person within a circle of twenty miles, and with money enough in his pockets to pay for the refreshments, was expected to be present. The entertainment was held in a large adobe building, formerly used for missionary purposes, the lower part of which was occupied as a store-house. A large loft overhead, with a step-ladder reaching to it from the outside, formed what the proprietor was pleased to call the dancing-saloon. In the yard, which was encircled by a mud wall, were several chapadens, or brush tents, in which whisky, gin, aguardiente, and other refreshments of a like nature, for "ladies and gentlemen," were for sale, at "two bits a drink." A low rabble of Mexican greasers, chiefly Sonoranians, hung around the premises in every direction, among whom I recognized several belonging to the gang into whose encampment I had fallen on my way down from Santa Marguerita. Their dirty serapas, machillas, and spurs lay scattered about, just as they had dismounted from their mustangs. The animals were picketed around in the open spaces, and kept up a continual confusion by bucking and kicking at every straggler who came within their reach. Such of the rabble as were able to pay the entrance-fee of "dos reales" were sitting in groups in the yard, smoking cigarritos and playing at monté. A few of the better class of rancheros had brought señoritas with them, mounted in front on their saddles, and were wending their way up the step-ladder as we entered the premises.

I followed the crowd, in company with my friend Jackson, and was admitted into the saloon upon the payment of half a dollar. This fund was to defray the expense of lights and music.

On passing through the door-way I was forcibly impressed with the scene. Some fifty or sixty couples were dancing to the most horrible scraping of fiddles I had ever heard—marking the time by snapping their fingers, whistling, and clapping their hands. The fiddles were accompanied by a dreadful twanging of guitars; and an Indian in one corner of the saloon added to the din by beating with all his might upon a rude drum. There was an odor of steaming flesh, cigarritos, garlic, and Cologne in the hot, reeking atmosphere that was almost suffocating; and the floor swayed under the heavy tramp of the dancers, as if every turn of the waltz might be the last. The assemblage was of a very mixed character, as may well be supposed, consisting of native Californians, Sonoranians, Americans, Frenchmen, Germans, and half-breed Indians.

Most of the Mexicans were rancheros and vaqueros from the neighboring ranches, dressed in the genuine style of Caballeros del Campaña, with black or green velvet jackets, richly embroidered; wide pantaloons, open at the sides, ornamented with rows of silver buttons; a red sash around the waist; and a great profusion of gold fillagree on their vests. These were the fast young fellows who had been successful in jockeying away their horses, or gambling at monté. Others of a darker and lower grade, such as the Sonoranians, wore their hats and machillas just as they had come in from camp; for it was one of the privileges of the fandango that every man could dress or undress as he pleased. A very desperate and ill-favored set these were—perfect specimens of Mexican outlaws.

The Americans were chiefly a party of Texans, who had recently crossed over through Chihuahua, and compared not unfavorably with the Sonoranians in point of savage costume and appearance. Some wore broadcloth frock-coats, ragged and defaced from the wear and tear of travel; some red flannel shirts, without any coats—their pantaloons thrust in their boots in a loose, swaggering style; and all with revolvers and bowie-knives swinging from their belts. A more reckless, devil-may-care looking set it would be impossible to find in a year's journey. Take them altogether—with their uncouth costumes, bearded faces, lean and brawny forms, fierce savage eyes, and swaggering manners—they were a fit assemblage for a frolic or a fight. Every word they spoke was accompanied by an oath. The presence of the females imposed no restraint upon the subject or style of the conversation, which was disgusting to the last degree. I felt ashamed to think that habit should so brutalize a people of my own race and blood.

Many of the señoritas were pretty, and those who had no great pretensions to beauty in other respects were at least gifted with fine eyes and teeth, rich brunette complexions, and forms of wonderful pliancy and grace. All, or nearly all, were luminous with jewelry, and wore dresses of the most flashy colors, in which flowers, lace, and glittering tinsel combined to set off their dusky charms. I saw some among them who would not have compared unfavorably with the ladies of Cadiz—perhaps in more respects than one. They danced easily and naturally; and, considering the limited opportunity of culture they had enjoyed in this remote region, it was wonderful how free, simple, and graceful they were in their manners.

The belle of the occasion was a dark-eyed, fierce-looking woman, of about six-and-twenty, a half-breed from Santa Barbara. Her features were far from comely, being sharp and uneven; her skin was scarred with fire or small-pox; and her form, though not destitute of a certain grace of style, was too lithe, wiry, and acrobatic to convey any idea of voluptuous attraction. Every motion, every nerve seemed the incarnation of a suppressed vigor; every glance of her fierce, flashing eyes was instinct with untamable passion. She was a mustang in human shape—one that I thought would kick or bite upon very slight provocation. In the matter of dress she was almost Oriental. The richest and most striking colors decorated her, and made a rare accord with her wild and singular physique; a gorgeous silk dress of bright orange, flounced up to the waist; a white bodice, with blood-red ribbons upon each shoulder; a green sash around the waist; an immense gold-cased breast-pin, with diamonds glittering in the centre, the greatest profusion of rings on her fingers, and her ears loaded down with sparkling ear-rings; while her heavy black hair was gathered up in a knot behind, and pinned with a gold dagger—all being in strict keeping with her wild, dashing character, and bearing some remote affinity to a dangerous but royal game-bird. I thought of the Mexican chichilaca as I gazed at her. There was an intensity in the quick flash of her eye which produced a burning sensation wherever it fell. She cast a spell around her not unlike the fascination of a snake. The women shunned and feared her; the men absolutely worshiped at her shrine. Their infatuation was almost incredible. She seemed to have some supernatural capacity for arousing the fiercest passions of love, jealousy, and hatred. Of course there was great rivalry to engage the hand of such a belle for the dance. Crowds of admirers were constantly urging their claims. It was impossible to look upon their excited faces and savage rivalry, knowing the desperate character of the men, without a foreboding of evil.

"Perhaps you will not be surprised," said Jackson, "to hear something strange and startling about that woman. She is a murderess! Not long since she stabbed to death a rival of hers, another half-breed, who had attempted to win the affections of her paramour. But, worse than that—she is strongly suspected of having killed her own child a few months ago, in a fit of jealousy caused by the supposed infidelity of its father—whose identity, however, can not be fixed with any certainty. She is a strange, bad woman—a devil incarnate; yet you see what a spell she casts around her! Some of these men are mad in love with her! They will fight before the evening is over. Yet she is neither pretty nor amiable. I can not account for it. Let me introduce you."

As soon as a pause in the dance occurred I was introduced. The revolting history I had heard of this woman inspired me with a curiosity to know how such a fiend in human shape could exercise such a powerful sway over every man in the room.

Although she spoke but little English, there was a peculiar sweetness in every word she uttered. I thought I could detect something of the secret of her magical powers in her voice, which was the softest and most musical I had ever heard. There was a wild, sweet, almost unearthly cadence in it that vibrated upon the ear like the strains of an Æolian. Added to this, there was a power of alternate ferocity and tenderness in her deep, passionate eyes that struck to the inner core wherever she fixed her gaze. I could not determine for my life which she resembled most—the untamed mustang, the royal game-bird, or the rattlesnake. There were flitting hints of each in her, and yet the comparison is feeble and inadequate. Sometimes she reminded me of Rachel—then the living, now the dead, Queen of Tragedy. Had it not been for a horror of her repulsive crimes, it is hard to say how far her fascinating powers might have affected me. As it was, I could only wonder whether she was most genius or devil. Not knowing how to dance, I could not offer my services in that way; and after a few commonplace remarks withdrew to a seat near the wall. The dance went on with great spirit. Absurd as it may seem, I could not keep my eyes off this woman. Whichever way she looked there was a commotion—a shrinking back among the women, or the symptoms of a jealous rage among the men. For her own sex she manifested an absolute scorn; for the other she had an inexhaustible fund of sweet glances, which each admirer might take to himself.

At a subsequent period of the evening I observed, for the first time, among the company a man of very conspicuous appearance, dressed in the picturesque style of a Texan Ranger. His face was turned from me when I first saw him; but there was something manly and imposing about his figure and address that attracted my attention. While I was looking toward him he turned to speak to some person near him. My astonishment may well be conceived when I recognized in his strongly-marked features and dejected expression the face of the man "Griff," to whom I was indebted for my escape from the assassins near Soledad! There could be no doubt that this was the outlaw who had rendered me such an inestimable service, differently dressed, indeed, and somewhat disfigured by a ghastly wound across the temple; but still the same; still bearing himself with an air of determination mingled with profound sadness. It was evident the Colonel had misinformed me as to his death. Perhaps, judging from the wound on his temple, which was still unhealed, he might have been left for dead, and subsequently have effected his escape. At all events, there was no doubt that he now stood before me.

I was about to spring forward and grasp him by the hand, when the dreadful scene I had witnessed in the little adobe hut near San Miguel flashed vividly upon my mind, and, for the moment, I felt like one who was paralyzed. That hand might be stained with the blood of the unfortunate emigrants! Who could tell? He had disavowed any participation in the act, but his complicity, either remote or direct, could scarcely be doubted from his own confession. How far his guilt might render him amenable to the laws I could not of course conjecture. It was enough for me, however, that he had saved my life, but I could not take his hand.

While reflecting upon the course that it might become my duty to pursue under the circumstances, I observed that he was not exempt from the fascinating sway of the dark señorita, whose face he regarded with an interest even more intense than that manifested by her other admirers. He was certainly a person calculated to make an impression upon such a woman; yet, strange to say, he was the only man in the crowd toward whom she evinced a spirit of hostility. Several times he went up to her and asked her to dance. Whether from caprice or some more potent cause I could not conjecture, but she invariably repulsed him—once with a degree of asperity that indicated something more than a casual acquaintance. It was in vain he attempted to cajole her. She was evidently bitter and unrelenting in her animosity. At length, incensed at his pertinacity, she turned sharply upon him, and leaning her head close to his ear, whispered something, the effect of which was magical. He staggered back as if stunned, and gazing a moment at her with an expression of horror, turned away and walked out of the room. The woman's face was a shade paler, but she quickly resumed her usual smile, and otherwise manifested no emotion.

This little incident was probably unnoticed by any except myself. I sat in a recess near the window, and could see all that was going on without attracting attention. I had resolved, after overcoming my first friendly impulses, not to discover myself to the outlaw until the fandango was over, and then determine upon my future course regarding him by the result of a confidential interview. I fully believed that he would tell me the truth, and nothing but the truth, in reference to the murder of the emigrants.

The dance went on. It was a Spanish waltz; the click-clack-clack of the feet, in slow-measured time, was very monotonous, producing a peculiarly dreamy effect. I sometimes closed my eyes and fancied it was all a wild, strange dream. Visions of the beautiful country through which I had passed flitted before me—a country desecrated by the worst passions of human nature. Amidst the rarest charms of scenery and climate, what a combination of dark and deadly sins oppressed the mind! What a cess-pool of wickedness was here within these very walls!

Half an hour may have elapsed in this sort of dreaming, when Griff, who had been so strangely repulsed by the dark señorita, came back and pushed his way through the crowd. This time I noticed that his face was flushed, and a gleam of desperation was in his eye. The wound in his temple had a purple hue, and looked as if it might burst out bleeding afresh. His motions were unsteady—he had evidently been drinking. Edging over toward the woman, he stood watching her till there was a pause in the dance. Her partner was a handsome young Mexican, very gayly dressed, whom I had before noticed, and to whom she now made herself peculiarly fascinating. She smiled when he spoke; laughed very musically at every thing he said; leaned up toward him, and assumed a wonderfully sweet and confidential manner. The Mexican was perfectly infatuated. He made the most passionate avowals, scarcely conscious what he was saying. I watched the tall Texan. The veins in his forehead were swollen; he strode to and fro restlessly, fixing fierce and deadly glances upon the loving couple. A terrible change had taken place in the expression of his features, which ordinarily had something sweet and sad in it. It was now dark, brutish, and malignant. Suddenly, as if by an ungovernable impulse, he rushed up close to where they stood, and drawing a large bowie-knife, said to the woman, in a quick, savage tone,

"Dance with me now, or, damn you, I'll cut your heart out!"

She turned toward him haughtily—"Señor!"

"Dance with me, OR DIE!"

"Señor," said the woman, quietly, and with an unflinching eye, "you are drunk! Don't come so near to me!"

The infuriated man made a motion as if to strike at her with his knife; but quick as lightning the young Mexican grasped his uprisen arm and the two clenched. I could not see what was done in the struggle. Those of the crowd who were nearest rushed in, and the affray soon became general. Pistols and knives were drawn in every direction; but so sudden was the fight that nobody seemed to know where to aim or strike. In the midst of the confusion a man jumped up on one of the benches and shouted,

"Back! Back with you! The man's stabbed! Let him out!"

The swaying mass parted, and the tall Texan staggered through, then fell upon the floor. His shirt was covered with blood, and he breathed heavily. A moment after the woman uttered a low, wild cry, and, dashing through the crowd—her long black hair streaming behind her—she cast herself down by the prostrate man and sobbed,

"O cara mio! O Deos! is he dead! is he dead!"

"Who did this? Who stabbed this man?" demanded several voices fiercely.

"No matter!" answered the wounded man, faintly. "It was my own fault; I deserved it!" and, turning his face toward the weeping woman, he said, smiling, "Don't cry; don't go on so!"

There was an ineffable tenderness in his voice, and something indescribably sweet in the expression of his face.

"O Deos!" cried the woman, kissing him passionately. "O cara mio! Say you will not die! Tell me you will not die!" And tearing her dress with frantic strength she tried to stanch the blood, which was rapidly forming a crimson pool around him.

The crowd meantime pressed so close that the man suffered for want of air, and begged to be removed. Several persons seized hold of him, and, lifting him from the floor, carried him out. The dark señorita followed close up, still pressing the fragments of her blood-stained dress to his wound.

Order was restored, and the music and dancing went on as if nothing had happened.

I had no desire to see any more of the evening amusements.

Next day I learned that the unfortunate man was dead. He was a stranger at San Luis, and refused to reveal his name, or make any disclosures concerning the affray. His last words were addressed to the woman, who clung to him with a devotion bordering on insanity. When she saw that he was doomed to die, the tears ceased to flow from her eyes, and she sat by his bedside with a wild, affrighted look, clutching his hands in hers, and ever and anon bathing her lips in the life-blood that oozed from his mouth.

"I loved you—still love you better than my life!"

These were his last words. A gurgle, a quivering motion of the stalwart frame, and he was dead!

At an examination before the Alcalde, it was proved that the stabbing must have occurred before the affray became general. It was also shown that the young Mexican was unarmed, and had no acquaintance with the murdered man.

Who could have done it?

Was it the devil-woman? Was this a case of jealousy, and was the tall Texan the father of the murdered child?

Upon these points I could get no information. The whole affair, with all its antecedent circumstances, was wrapped in an impenetrable mystery. When the body was carried to the grave, by a few strangers including myself, the chief mourner was the half-breed woman—now a ghastly wreck. The last I saw of her, as we turned sadly away, she was sitting upon the sod at the head of the grave, motionless as a statue.

Next morning a vaquero, passing in that direction, noticed a shapeless mass lying upon the newly-spaded earth. It proved to be the body of the unfortunate woman, horribly mutilated by the wolves. The clothes were torn from it, and the limbs presented a ghastly spectacle of fleshless bones. Whether she died by her own hand, or was killed by the wolves during the night, none could tell. She was buried by the side of her lover.

Soon after these events, having completed my business in San Luis, I took passage in a small schooner for San Francisco, where I had the satisfaction in a few days of turning over ten thousand dollars to the Collector of Customs.

I never afterward could obtain any information respecting the two men mentioned in the early part of my narrative—the Colonel and Jack. No steps were taken by the authorities to arrest them. It is the usual fate of such men in California sooner or later to fall into the hands of an avenging mob. Doubtless they met with a merited retribution.

Eleven years have passed since these events took place. Many changes have occurred in California. The gangs of desperadoes that infested the State have been broken up; some of the members have met their fate at the hands of justice—more have fallen victims to their own excesses. I have meanwhile traveled in many lands, and have had my full share of adventures. But still every incident in the "Dangerous Journey" which I have attempted to describe is as fresh in my mind as though it happened but yesterday.

VIEW FROM THE BLUFFS AT CATAWISSA.

THE CATAWISSA RAILROAD.

PENNSYLVANIA has long been celebrated for the magnificence of the scenery afforded by the Alleghanies and the Blue Ridge, and by the valleys of the Susquehanna, Alleghany, Monongahela, Delaware, and Schuylkill rivers. Since the completion of the various lines of railway throughout the State, the facilities for visiting these mountains, valleys, and rivers have become entirely within the reach of all, especially the residents of the populous cities of our sea-board.

The Catawissa Railroad, with the roads directly connected with it, for one hundred and nineteen miles passes through the valleys and over the mountains of the Blue Ridge; commencing at Port Clinton, on the line of the Philadelphia and Reading Railroad, and terminating at Williamsport, the county seat of Lycoming County. The lower portion of the road is that of the Little Schuylkill Railroad Coal and Navigation Company, which is principally engaged in the transportation of coal from the Tamaqua District, being an important feeder to the Philadelphia and Reading Railroad. The northern portion has largely aided in the development of the immense lumber traffic of the west branch of the Susquehanna River; Williamsport being surrounded by extensive steam saw-mills, cutting many millions of feet annually of most excellent timber, flooring, scantling, laths, and pickets from the rafts of logs floated down from the forests in the northwest section of the State.

The central portion of the Catawissa Road is that which affords the most characteristic scenery. The view of the Schuylkill River at Port Clinton will give the traveler, as he alights from the cars of the Philadelphia and Reading Railroad, a foretaste of the rich treat in store for him. The river, gracefully winding southwardly from the town, is lost to sight behind the mountain through which the railroad tunnel has been cut. Its waters, of a bright-green color, completely landlocked, and calm as a lake, are only rippled by the slowly-lagging canal-boat laden with coal, which at intervals is dispatched from the coal "shutes" just on the other side, or coming from farther up stream, is bearing its freight of black diamonds to Philadelphia or New York and a market. Looking up stream, a very substantial bridge spans the river over which the Little Schuylkill Railroad crosses; and the route now for twenty miles follows the river of that name in its tortuous windings.

The banks of this river are fringed with the rank undergrowth peculiar to mountain streams. The tall pine-trees rear their stately forms upon either side, and here and there a bit of cleared land indicates the presence of thrift and industry, the out-buildings and tenement-houses giving evidence of the pursuit of a home under difficulties. At the town of Ringgold, just ten miles on the journey, the tank of the engine is replenished with wood and water. There is nothing special to note other than the reminiscence of the Mexican war and the brave commander of the battery which bore his name, afforded by the mention of this station.

Approaching the thriving borough of Tamaqua the traveler obtains, in many instances, his first correct impressions with reference to the anthracite coal region of Pennsylvania. Vast piles of the refuse coal and dirt from the mines, covering miles in extent, are seen upon either hand. They are a source of immense loss to the operator or miner. The valley at and in the immediate vicinity of Tamaqua being so narrow, and the surface of the level land being consequently so circumscribed, it has been necessary to follow down the stream for miles to find a place to dump the large quantities of dirt from the mines. These piles of refuse would appear, to the casual observer, to be of great value, the presence of coal in greater or less quantities being unmistakable. And so they would be fortunes for hundreds of people if in New York or Philadelphia; but the cost of transportation thitherward would far more than absorb the value of the portion of coal which they contain.

In passing these huge dirt heaps, the question of profit and loss, to the mind accustomed to such problems, most naturally comes up; and the hardships, the toils, and the losses of the miner are most vividly portrayed, when it is considered that it has cost him full as much to produce each ton of this refuse which is thrown aside as utterly valueless, as it has done to produce the ton of coal ready for market, and for which he is so sparingly paid.

About a mile below the town the opening or mouth of a mine, with its out-buildings, machinery, side-tracks, horses, mules, and drivers, furnishes a fair specimen of over one hundred and fifty just such extensive operations as are daily going on within a circuit of fifty miles from Tamaqua.

Fifteen miles to the eastward the Lehigh Coal and Navigation Company have their extended and varied coal-fields, the thriving borough of Mauch Chunk being its mercantile and shipping point. About the same distance northwardly the Hazelton Coal Company, with other operations of newer organization, produce large quantities of coal; while to the eastward, within a range of twenty-five miles, the Pottsville, Minersville, and Ashland districts are dotted with openings, giving forth annually several hundreds of thousands of tons of anthracite.

COAL SHUTES, BELOW TAMAQUA.

The immediate surroundings of the opening of a coal-mine in full operation present a busy scene. The constant puffing of the pit engine, as it toils and labors in hoisting the coal-buckets from the bottom of the mine, or as it draws up upon the inclined plane the small mine cars loaded with the miner's products, reminds the traveler who has been on the Western waters of the lullaby those high-pressure steamboats afford in their hoarse cough, which never forsakes him while on board.

The large frame building, which inclines from a considerable elevation toward the tracks, covers the system of screens and "shutes" which clean and separate the different sizes of coals for steam, heating, and household purposes, after the larger lumps have been passed through the rollers or "breakers," as they are called, contained in the tower-like structure which surmounts all.

The breakers are rapidly driven by a separate engine from the pit machinery, and the crushing of the coals with the revolving of the large iron screw below, the running of the coals from shutes to the cars, the yelling of drivers as they urge their mules at their work, all combine to make a hideous noise entirely peculiar and never to be forgotten.

The town of Tamaqua is a very thrifty, interesting place, contains a number of churches, school-houses, banks, etc., and its interests, its hopes and fears alike, are dependent upon the coal-trade. The machine shops of the Little Schuylkill Railroad Company are here located; and in these identical shops there stands to-day, exempt from duty, the original engine imported by the Company nearly thirty years ago—one of the first, if not the very first, locomotive engines brought out from England to this country; and there still lives, in the borough of Tamaqua, the identical machinist who came out along with the wonderful machine to put it together and run it. The Little Schuylkill Railroad was the pioneer railroad in Pennsylvania, and the boiler of this locomotive was hauled upon a wagon drawn by horses the entire distance, eighty miles, from Philadelphia to Port Clinton, by turnpike; and all this within the memory of man. When we reflect that, to-day, more than four thousand locomotives of American manufacture are in daily use in the United States alone, and over twenty-eight thousand miles of railway are constantly traversed by them, it is surely a matter in itself of great interest to behold the imported engine of thirty years ago, and the man who came along with this great reformer to put it together for use.

The various coal-mines in the vicinity of Tamaqua will well repay the traveler to sojourn among and carefully visit them. The superintendents of these subterranean scenes of life are generally courteous, and happy to afford every opportunity to those in search of knowledge or pleasure to gratify their desires. True, it requires some nerve, more faith, and a total disregard to a temporary soiling of the hands, face, and clothes. Besides these prerequisites, the seeker for knowledge should have a guide in the person of the superintendent, or some one who is perfectly familiar with the special premises about to be visited.

Powder in large quantities, of coarse grain, is used in mining coal; and were it not for the perfect system of ventilation connected with every well-regulated mine, the air inside would be entirely insufferable from the impregnation of sulphur fumes arising from the frequent blasts. This ventilation also serves to carry off "the fire-damp" which collects in the mines. It also serves to free the galleries and tunnels of the carbonic acid and other deadly gases. The visitor to the inside of a coal-mine will be struck with the free circulation of pure air away below the surface of the earth.

In the vicinity of Tamaqua there is a burning mine, which many years ago caught fire in one of the galleries from a fire ignited by some of the workmen to warm themselves by. Through some means or other the fire was left to burn in contact with the coal, which was of a highly combustible character, and communicating with large quantities of coal contiguous to it, the fire became of such magnitude as to be beyond the power or control of man, and no human agency has since been devised to quench it. The exact extent of its bounds is unknown; but like a volcano, it is a dreaded locality, and conjecture alone can approach the amount of the immense loss occasioned by this singular and uncommon accident. The direction from Tamaqua of the "Burning Mine" is known to every urchin of the place; and the traveler will have the opportunity to visit—at a safe distance—the mouth of the pit.

Leaving Tamaqua, the Little Schuylkill Railroad soon terminates and the Catawissa Railway commences. The transition from one road to the other is, however, unknown to the occupant of the cars, the gauge of track being precisely the same, and the roads for all traveling and freight intents and purposes one and the same. The grade of the road now becomes steeper than at any portion of it heretofore traversed; and the traveler is reminded, by the rapid falls of water of the mountain stream, now narrowing on the right as he proceeds, that the mountain is being climbed by the engine and train.

Nearly ten miles of heavy grade, full sixty feet to the mile, of such journeying and the Quaquake Valley is spread out far down the mountain side. Extending for many miles far away to the eastward, the valley is inclosed by range upon range of mountains, until all is lost in the haze of extreme distance.

As the railway winds around the mountain side the junction of the Quaquake Valley Road is soon reached, where the connection of a line of railway to New York city, hereafter referred to, is made. After passing the short tunnel a few miles further on, the road enters one of those gloomy pine forests so peculiarly American. Huge masses of conglomerate rock crown the summit of the mountain, ponderous boulders lie scattered at the base, bespattered with the black and gray lichen; while the pines, dark, tall, and sinewy, seem to keep a grim watch over all. A feeling of awe steals over the mind while passing through this forest, giving all the more zest for the brightness and beauty which so soon follows.

The summit of the mountain is reached, and here the Little Schuylkill River has its birth. A bit of rude masonry on the west side of the road marks the spot where the young waters come gurgling forth from their dark confinement, and joyously go babbling on their way over snow-white pebbles, and under banks of moss and fern, to swell the great tide of the Delaware. This spot is one of peculiar interest to the tourist: the whole scene is particularly romantic. The spring, surrounded by dark hazel bushes, with here and there a stately pine-tree to relieve the back-ground, makes up a choice picture; while off to the eastward a rocky spur of the mountain, with the entrance to the tunnel in its blackness clearly defined, adds to the wildness of the locality.

Passing through this tunnel at the summit, the first view of the beautiful Valley of the Catawissa Creek is obtained—Catawissa, an Indian word, signifying "pure water." The creek has its rise in the tunnel in the form of a freely flowing spring, and is followed by the railroad, through its whole length, to its confluence with the Susquehanna. This occurs at the town of Catawissa, some thirty miles distant. From this point the views from the road present a series of grand panoramic pictures of the highest type of mountain scenery. Looking backward from the curve at Sweet Spring Hollow (a few miles further on) a double valley is seen, formed by a secondary range of hills intersecting the valley from Summit Tunnel to this point. The mountains here attain their greatest altitude; and their ever-varying forms, with occasional glimpses of the sparkling Catawissa, caught through the light and graceful foliage of the mountain birch, form a series of charming pictures.

After passing Beaver Station, some three or four miles distant, there is presented a most striking and characteristic view from Stranger's Hollow. This is of a deep mountain gorge through which the Catawissa is seen hurriedly making its way over its rocky bed. The whole scene is particularly wild, and the surroundings give less evidence of the footprints of man than perhaps any other portion of the road.

Further on, at Maineville, there is a gap in the mountain chain, which, although not so grand as the Delaware or Lehigh Gaps, presents a very beautiful view. Approaching the mountain upon the west side of the Gap, the railroad track crosses a narrow ravine upon a substantial bridge supported by stone piers, immediately beneath which, to the eastward, is located the town of Maineville. Looking through the Gap, a most beautiful highly cultivated valley brightens up the picture, which, at a distance of a mile or more, as the train approaches the bridge, seems to be framed by the mountains on either side. The view from the bridge, looking toward the Nescopeck and M'Cauley Mountains in the distance, is also very lovely.

The village of Maineville is a quaint, quiet, finished town that seems to have always been as it now is, and as if determined to remain so, looking up at each passing train with a wonder that never seems to grow less. Equally astonished seems the hitherto boisterous Catawissa, here for the first time checked in its freedom by the milldam. It seems illy to bear the impost it is now for the first time compelled to pay to the buckets of an uncovered, undershot mill-wheel belonging to the miller of Maineville.

Seven miles further on the ancient town of Catawissa is located—upon the banks of the beautiful Susquehanna, at its confluence with the Catawissa Creek. Several churches, an excellent hotel, and a most hospitable resident population are the attractions of Catawissa proper; while it is the centre of some of the most sublime views along the whole line of this road. The mountain views and scenery, heretofore relieved by the waters of the Catawissa Creek, are now accompanied by the gracefully winding waters of the Susquehanna.

The view looking up the river from the bluffs a short distance below the town, has been pronounced inferior to none, in point of beauty, in this country. At an elevation of two hundred feet perpendicular, which is readily attained by an easy ascending path just back of the town, a most beautiful panoramic view of the North Branch of the Susquehanna, with the island, bridges, canal, railroad, etc., is obtained. The island seen from the bluff is named the Catawissa Island, a most delightfully-shaded retreat from the summer sun, while the cool breezes constantly wafted from the river contribute to make it most desirable to visit. The canal seen to the westward, winding its way around the base of the mountain, is the "North Branch Canal," formerly the property of the State of Pennsylvania, but recently disposed of to private individuals, in accordance with an act of Legislature providing for the sale of all public improvements, canals, and railroads. Looking up to the bend of the river, the Catawissa Railroad Bridge is in view; and nearer, below the island, the County Bridge, one of the old-timed, covered wooden structures, with stone piers, crosses the river in front of the town.

Many years gone by the red men of the forest used to come to this point of the river, below and about the island, as a favorite fishing-ground. Salmon, large and plenty, abounded here; and even forty years ago it was no uncommon occurrence to catch salmon in their seine while fishing for shad at this very point. The Susquehanna has long since, however, been without the excellent fish which once abounded in her waters. The building of dams, canals, etc., frightened off the fish, so that they ceased frequenting the former streams and localities, and are now, particularly the salmon, entirely foreign to the waters of the State of Pennsylvania.

Back of the town of Catawissa, from the top of the mountain looking due east, we have a most magnificent view of the Catawissa Valley, with the meandering course of the creek before us for fifteen miles, winding in the dim distance like a silver thread. This is another characteristic scene, and one that has attracted the attention of artists ; a work of great merit, taken from this identical landscape, having been produced by the artist Moran, of Philadelphia, which attracted considerable attention and elicited the highest encomiums from connoisseurs at the recent artists' reception of Philadelphians. The time chosen in his picture is the fall of the year—the forests tinged with gold and crimson—the first coloring of leaves by early frost, most beautifully delineated, greatly heightening the effect of the picture. The railroad, in sight all the way up the valley, furnishes, at times, the only lifelike object, when the train of cars with its engine, and white, puffing steam ascending, gives something moving to relieve the dull quiet, under certain conditions of the atmosphere, inseparably connected with so extended a view.

Ascending the mountain-slope to the north of Catawissa, a very striking view of the town and surroundings is obtained, not to be secured from the other eminences. The town is located on a flat piece of land between the mountains, extending down to the banks of the Susquehanna. Looking downward, the County Bridge, below the island, stretches across the stream ; the railroad, winding southwardly from the bridge just beyond, enters the town at the foot of the mountain. Looking upward, or northwardly, the bridge of the railroad is very near to us, while beyond, the very pleasant town of Bloomsburg is in sight. Farther on are gracefully-sloping hills, dotted with farms, while the great North Mountain, dim from distance, closes the scene.

Leaving Catawissa, distant three miles the town of Rupert is located, at the junction of the Catawissa and the Lackawanna and Bloomsburg railroads. This latter railroad takes the tourist to the historical and romantic valley of Wyoming.

Seven miles beyond Rupert the town of Danville is reached. Danville is the site of the extensive iron-works of the Montour Iron Company, which has for many years past been heavily engaged in the manufacture of railway iron. A large number of men are constantly employed by this Company ; and the close proximity to furnaces of heavy capacity enables the mills to produce very large quantities of rails. Of late years the practice has obtained more than ever among the managers of the railway companies throughout the United States of re-rolling the rails heretofore disposed of as old rails, and credited at a sometimes nominal rate ; whereas, under the existing state of things, the rails are reproduced and made to last many years. The Montour Company are, next to the Cambria Iron-Works, the largest in the State of Pennsylvania.

Further on the road reaches Milton, Pennsylvania. This is a very thriving town of small extent at the junction of the Sunbury and Erie Railway Company. The cars of the Northern Central Road, from Baltimore and Harrisburg, also are joined to the train, and proceed on to Williamsport, the terminus of the line of the Catawissa Railroad.

Williamsport possesses a new and substantially-built court-house, several hotels, a number of churches of various denominations, and a seminary of learning which has a wide reputation. Its location is very healthy—upon the right bank of the Susquehanna River. It has regularly laid-out streets, which are lighted with gas, and the houses supplied with the purest water, conveyed from a stream upon the mountain back of the borough. The railroad running to Elmira here terminates, and from the several railroads the influx of strangers at times is quite large. In the summer season there could be no more delightful or healthful resort selected than this very town of Williamsport. The facilities of obtaining the dailies of the cities, with ease of egress or access, make it peculiarly desirable; while the mountain streams, on the line of the Catawissa Railroad, and also upon the Elmira Road, near to the town, afford the most satisfactory gratification to the followers of Isaak Walton.

The vast lumbering interests centering at this point afford employment to large numbers of men in the various capacities of sawyers, engineers, canal boatmen, raftsmen, etc. The mills themselves are extensive affairs in their line, and will well repay a visit. The large number of logs—saw-logs—necessary to carry on the business, on the scale upon which it is conducted in this immediate vicinity, renders a systematic protection of the various interests a matter of necessity.

The manner of identifying the logs of the several parties engaged in sawing lumber is simple. The name, or private mark, of the parties owning the logs is branded by a heavy blow from an iron marker upon the logs at the point where they are first thrown into the river—away up in the wild woods of the interior. There are organizations, entitled "Boom Companies," who have the means provided at the several sawing points along the river in the way of long booms, or logs, chained together at their ends, and thus strung across the river at intervals to interrupt the passage of the logs. The logs owned at any given point being secured and fastened, either in the milldam or in a raft to the shore, the balance are let loose to float down to the next boom company, and so each and every of the owners gets his own.

The sawing of lumber into various shapes or sizes is a very interesting process to the novice, and many hours may be well employed in studying the various operations of the improved machinery at Williamsport introduced into this branch of mechanics.

The lumber, when sawed, is forwarded by railroad to New York, Philadelphia, and the various stations along the line of the several roads leading to the cities. Also, by means of canal transportation, large quantities go forward during the season of navigation. The capital invested in the lumber milling business is very heavy, and heretofore the results have been in a great degree satisfactory to the parties concerned.

Thus the coal-mining at the lower portion of the Catawissa Road, and the lumber milling at the upper portion of it, afford a world of pleasure and information when coupled with the very grand views in nature with which the route abounds. The various approaches to the Catawissa Railroad are in themselves very interesting and pleasant rides; and leaving New York, or Philadelphia, or Baltimore, the mountain scenery is reached in less than seven hours from either point—rendering it quite possible to view the whole in one day, and return the next. The routes from New York are by the New Jersey Central Railroad to Easton, Pennsylvania, thence by the Lehigh Valley and Quaquake Valley railroads to Quaquake Junction; or by the same to Easton, by the East Pennsylvania Railroad to Reading, Pennsylvania, thence to Port Clinton. Or by the New York and Erie Railroad to Elmira, Chemung County, New York, thence via Williamsport Railroad to Williamsport. The routes from Philadelphia are by way of the Philadelphia and Reading Railroad to Port Clinton direct.

ELECTIONEERING IN MISSISSIPPI.

ROUGH RIDING DOWN SOUTH.

A LONG the Gulf of Mexico, or what the United States Coast Survey styles the Mississippi Sound, extending across the State of Mississippi, with a depth in the interior of about one hundred miles, there lies a region of country usually denominated the Pine Woods. The soil is sandy and thin, producing small crops of rice, potatoes, and corn, a little cotton, indigo, and sugar-cane, for home consumption. But it sustains a magnificent pine forest, capable of supplying for centuries to come the navies of the world. The people are of primitive habits, and are chiefly lumbermen or herdsman. Exempt from swamps and inundation, from the vegetable decomposition incidental to large agricultural districts, fanned by the sea-breeze and perfumed by the balsamic exhalations of the pine, it is one of the healthiest regions in the world. If the miraculous fountain, in search of which the brave old Ponce de Leon met his death in the lagoons of Florida in 1512, may be found any where, it will be in the district I am now wandering over. I have never seen so happy a people. Not afflicted with sickness or harassed by litigation; not demoralized by vice or tormented with the California fever; living in a state of equality, where none are rich and none in want; where the soil is too thin to accumulate wealth, and yet sufficiently productive to reward industry; manufacturing all that they wear; producing all they consume; and preserving, with primitive simplicity of manners, the domestic virtues of their sires. Early marriages are universal. Fathers yet infants in law, and happy grandams yet in the vigor of womanhood, may be found in every settlement; and numerous are the firesides around which cluster ten or a dozen children, with mothers still lovely and buoyant as in the days of their maiden bloom.

Leaving the Gulf shore at Pascagoula for the interior, in a couple of hours the traveler finds himself on the banks of a broad, deep, beautiful river, the Escatawba, curving gently down to mingle with the ocean. It flows through a forest of colossal growth. Many of these hoary Titans were overthrown by the great hurricane of '52, which began at 10 A.M., August 24, and blew with increasing fury until 12 M. next day, raging with undiminished violence until 12 at night, when it began to abate. It tore away whole masses of bluff on the sea-shore, dug up the earth from the roots of trees, blew down the potato hills as it swooped along the surface, and prostrated forests in its mad career.

Here, at what is now called Elder's Ferry, once stood the lodge of the last chieftain of the Pascagoulas. His warriors had all perished in the fatal wars with the Muscogees of Alabama. Sole survivor of the last conflict, the enemy still upon his trail, he led the women and children from the Escatawba to the sea, preferring death in its much loved waters to captivity and slavery. You have heard of the mysterious music which at midnight chimes along these shores; a low, lute-like strain, sometimes a vesper hymn, sometimes like a harp-string breaking. When the winds and surges sleep, in the still hours of night, I have often heard this plaintive anthem; and tradition says it is the death-chant of the Pascagoulas that wails along the sea.

The Indian village stood on a picturesque bluff, the gentle river, flowing through prairies of verdure, margined by aged oaks that lift their heads among the clouds and bathe their mossy beards in the silver spray beneath. The country spreads out into a continuous meadow of boundless extent, on every side dotted with little islets of palm-like trees. At intervals a serpentine line of ravine comes sweeping along, fringed with dwarf laurel, myrtle, jasmine, and other parasites, and the whole plain around is embroidered with flowers of every hue. Ah! it is pleasant to bivouac in these solitary plains, the quiet stars smiling upon you, and the fragrant winds singing in the trees around. There is a charm in these grand old woods—in these laughing waters—in these remote retreats, where only an echo of the storms of life is heard. No wonder the imaginative ancients peopled them with divinities: for here, at every step, one can but feel the presence of a God; and the feeling chastens and refines the heart. It is not in your gorgeous temples, with coquettish eyes and Shylock countenances around, and vanity peeping out even from the pulpit, that one truly feels the sentiment of religion in its humanizing and exalting influences.

By the road-side, near the ruins of a rude country meeting-house, long since deserted, may be seen a solitary grave. Years ago a wanderer, once favored by fortune, high in the profession of the law, died near this spot, the wretched victim of a debasing vice. His body, his bottle, and the last lines he ever penned were found near where he now sleeps:

Pilgrim, wheresoe'er thou stray.
Pause here upon thy weary way.
Take this relic if thou may,
And for its thirsty owner pray.
Fatal gift, when overflowing!
Oh, that man should ever knowing,
Servant be to liquor's spell,
Sorcery from the caves of hell!

Touch not—'tis poisonous to thee;
Taste not—alas, it ruined me!
The unclean thing forever shun,
Or thou, O pilgrim, art undone!

In this silent house of grace
Seek thy Maker, face to face;
Ask thy conscience, if thou wilt,
Dost thou good, or dost thou ill?

Lonely now my way I go,
Lingering through my life of woe;
Stranger, for the lost one pray,
And God will bless thee every day.
On thy hearth-stone he will fling
Countless blessings following,
In thy spring time, in thy age,
Every day of life's brief page;
In thy health, and in thy store,
Grace and goodness evermore!

Crossing the Chickasawha River I took refuge from the noonday sun in the hospitable dwelling of Mr. R—. It is perched on an elevated bluff. Far down in a field below, on the river-side, his servants had been at work, and might now be seen winding up a zigzag path toward the house, to get the mid-day meal. A group of tiny darkeys were sitting under the trees in the yard awaiting their mothers. Suddenly a little cloud gathered on the horizon—there was a single burst of thunder—a single flash that blinded me for a moment—and then, oh what a shriek of agony from the wretched mothers! Three of the children had been killed by the fatal bolt. Never, ah never shall I forget that sight of sorrow, and the wailings of those broken hearts! I have seen the strong man crushed; the fond mother swooning over the loss of her first-born; the young and beautiful, just stepping into life on a pathway of flowers, stung by the serpent, and snatched away, leaving for the survivors, in the dim future, only a long despair; but never had I witnessed the intense grief of these simple slaves. All that they had to live for was wrapped up in the stricken infants that now, all lifeless, they pressed to their distracted bosoms.

Leaving the scene of sorrow, I entered the great pine forest that leads to the town of Augusta. The woods were on fire. The road lies on a high ridge or backbone, and at short intervals on each side there are lateral ridges running down into deep reed-brakes below. Along one of these vertebræ, on my left, a mighty volume of smoke and flame and eddying leaves came rolling rapidly toward me. The road itself, but rarely traveled at this season of the year, was covered several inches deep with pine straw, which was soon in a blaze. There was literally "a fire in my rear." Dashing forward, I meant to drive down a ridge on my right until the road should be cleared, but the flames, swept by the whirling winds, had by this time burst out there, and came surging into the sea of fire just behind me. I had no choice but to run for it. Though noonday, it was as black as midnight. The smoke of one hundred thousand acres of combustibles was around me. The roar of the devouring element, like the boom of a tremendous surf, was above me. The flames were protruding, like the tongues of boa constrictors, on each side of me, melting the varnish of my buggy and crisping my whiskers; and, ever and anon, the crash of a falling pine, uprooted by the fire, seemed to be discharging minute-guns in token of my distress. On rushed the fiery torrent—flank and rear—up hill and down—and on I drove, at a killing gait, only ten paces in advance; my carpet-bag smoking, my hat and coat singed, my face and hands charred, when suddenly the wind shifted, and the flaming dragon plunged away to the left, hissing through the crackling reed-brakes, and shaking his terrible crest among the lofty trees.

Exhausted by this frightful contention, I was glad to find shelter at the wayside inn of my worthy friend, Mr. Hiram Breeland, of Greene County. He is famous for peach and honey; for river trout, venison steaks, and fried chicken, and indeed for every thing that a weary traveler covets. His wife is a model in her way. They have had eighteen children, and are yet a young and handsome couple. Far and near this is known as "the musical family." Six daughters in the bloom of life, richly dowered with those perfections that men sigh for and never forget, possess rare musical gifts; and their concerts with voice and violins are really enchanting. Excited and nervous after the fiery ordeal I had passed, they soothed my soul with melody, and my slumbers with charming dreams. Long after the witching hour of night, in the delicious delirium between sleeping and waking, the tinkle of the guitar and a sweet voice, softer than a sigh, mingled with the lullaby of the winds in the tops of the aged pines.

Their names are in harmony with their music. What can be more melodious than Elizabeth Amanda, Priscilla Brunetta, Louvena Annetta, Martha Miranda, Zelphi Emmeline, and Sophronie Angelina?

This house has been a favorite stopping-place for candidates for many years, and Breeland is pretty well posted up with anecdotes.

When Harry Cage and Franklin E. Plummer were canvassing for Congress they came here together, and Cage began to joke and sport with the children, much to the mother's delight. But can't find any thing to spank!"

It is hardly necessary to say that Cage "incontinently caved in," and refused to travel any farther with the Yankee wagon-boy.

"Plummer was hard pressed sometime after this, being charged with sundry matters affecting his integrity. He deliberately sat down and wrote an account of his visit to my house, charging that he had attempted to swindle me, had behaved with gross indecorum to my family, and had been kicked out of doors. This he contrived to have published, and it went the round of the papers, creating great excitement. He called on me for my certificate, which, of course, was promptly given, for I was surprised and indignant at such a slander. The reaction was tremendous; and after this nobody in this section would believe any thing against Plummer."

When the Hon. Powhatan Ellis, a very finished gentleman, was traveling through this district electioneering for some office, he lost his Plummer soon won her heart. He picked up the little wee one, just then toddling about, placed it across his lap, turned up its little petticoats, and began to search for red bugs!

Next morning Cage stole out before day, went to the wood-pile, cut a turn of wood, determined to win the "old lady's" favor by making her fire, while Plummer, as he fancied, lay snoring in bed. While toiling up the hill with his load, what was his astonishment to see the old 'un milking her cow, and Plummer holding off the calf by the tail!

A day or two after this, said Squire B., Cage made a tip-top speech at Greene Court House. It was hard to beat, and Plummer knew it. So when he got up he said: "Fellow-citizens, I would answer the gentleman's argument if there was any argument to answer. It reminds me of an honest couple down in my county who are troubled with a very small specimen of a child that cries all night. The husband, much tormented, complained that he could not get a moment's sleep. "Spank it, then," says the wife. He fumbled about, but the child continued to cry. "Well, why don't you spank it?" says she. "Because," said he, "I portmanteau in attempting to ford a creek. Plummer immediately advertised its contents: "6 ruffled shirts, 6 cambric handkerchiefs, 1 hair-brush, 1 tooth-brush, 1 nail-brush, 1 pair curling tongs, 2 sticks pomatum, 1 box pearl-powder, 1 bottle Cologne, 1 do. rose-water, 4 pairs silk stockings, and 2 pairs kid gloves." This defeated the Judge. He was set down as a born aristocrat and "swelled head."

Plummer was a poor young lawyer, boarding, or loafing, at a tavern in Westville, when he announced himself for Congress. He hadn't a single "red" in his pocket. He opened the canvass in Benton, put up at the best hotel, dined a dozen friends every day, and opened a very liberal account at the bar. On the third day, when about to depart, he cried out to the crowd, "Gentlemen, I wish to make my public acknowledgments to our generous landlord. He has treated me like a prince; he has feasted my friends; his tipple has run freely. Sir," said he, turning to the landlord, "if you ever come to my town don't go to a hotel: put up with me; I shall be proud to reciprocate your hospitality!" With these words he vaulted on his horse, and was out of sight before the astonished Boniface could "say turkey" about his bill.

While sojourning at this pleasant retreat it was agreed, one day, that we should go out on a deer-drive. I was wrapping up a lunch to put in my pocket, and said to my boy Tom, "Well, Tom, how about this butter? I can't put it in my pocket." "No, massa," said Tom, "him run away. But you kin eat him 'fore you go!"

On a deer-drive in the South one man follows the hounds in the thickets or reed brakes where the herds usually feed, while three or four others take their stands at various points which they are expected to cross in their flight. The dogs soon broke cover; a noble doe came bounding by me. I fired and missed; but passing on, the Squire, who is a noted shot, brought her down. The outcries of the huntsman soon called us down to the brake, and there we saw a most extraordinary spectacle. Two bucks of the largest size in deadly combat, their branching antlers so interlocked that neither could use them against the other. The ground was torn up all around; their sides were dripping blood; and they had evidently fought long before this singular union of their weapons terminated the combat. Their furious struggles at our approach only united them more closely; and thus they would have perished. The hunters shot them, and informed me that they had often found the skeletons of bucks that had thus died, their horns so locked that no ingenuity could undo them.

The buck is a timid animal until wounded. He then stands at bay, and is dangerous to approach. He is the sworn enemy of the rattlesnake. When he perceives one, he walks around it until it throws itself into a coil, and then the buck vaults into the air and comes down upon it with his pointed hoofs. Not content with killing it, he stamps it into shreds. Those noxious reptiles always multiply as the deer diminish.

Speaking of rattlesnakes, my friend Colonel Wilkins, of Green Court House, tells me that he was once rolling logs in a piece of new ground on the Bigbee River, near Bladen Springs, when one of his men cried out, "Here's a rattlesnake!" Presently another sung out; and all round the "clearing" they kept up the cry, until the Colonel, quite angry, cried out, "Let the logs alone, and all of you go to snaking!" They piled up fifty-three in the course of the evening.

I once went to purchase a country seat on the bayou of St. John, in the vicinity of New Orleans, belonging to Mr. Michel, who had gone to France. It was occupied by Mr. Creecy, an old Vicksburg editor. Strolling into the garden, I was about to step toward an orange hedge to gather a few leaves, when he said "Look out for snakes!" "What," said I, "have you snakes here?"

"Walk this way," said Creecy. He led me to a point where three or four ditches, communicating with the bayou and with the swamp, intersected, and I counted a dozen dead moccasins lying about, and some twenty navigating the different ditches. "This is our only game," said he. "I shoot moccasins every afternoon!"

Mr. Michel lost an excellent purchaser for his place, and my brother editor held on until the snakes fairly run him out of the house.

There was once a man by the name of Gallendee living in Hancock county, who was, perhaps, rather unjustly suspected of hog stealing. He came running in from the woods one day shouting murder, the shirt fairly whipped off his back. He assured me it had been done by a coach-whip snake that had wrapped itself round his leg and thrashed him over the shoulders; but uncharitable people suspected it had been done by Judge Lynch!

The same man went to the late Judge Daniel to complain of these accusations, and to ask his advice. "Well," said the Judge, "I will tell you what to do. If you feel innocent, face these charges like a man. But if you are guilty, get into Louisiana as soon as you can." That evening his client crossed Pearl River, and became a citizen of our sister State.

Having recruited at this pleasant anchorage, I bid adieu to my friend Breeland, and set out for the village of Augusta, bowling merrily along in my blood-red buggy. The road is beautiful, roofed over with trees and tendrils, and the air fragrant with the breath of flowers. There was, however, one drawback to my comfort—myriads of flies of every species, that swarmed around and ravenously cupped the blood from my horse. It was what is appropriately termed here "fly time"—that is to say, the period when this numerous family of scourges have it all their own way, and neither man nor beast can sojourn in the woods without much suffering. Now the deer plunge into deep pools and lakes, leaving only their heads exposed, and browse only during a portion of the night while these insects sleep. The cattle from a thousand hills seek the abodes of man, and huddle around some smoking pine or in some open field to escape their tormentors.

On a sudden curve of the road I found myself near one of these "stamping grounds," and a simultaneous roar from five hundred infuriated animals gave notice of my danger. It is well known that the Spanish matadores provoke the wounded bulls in the arena by flaunting the moleta or blood-red flag in their faces. It was the vermilion of my buggy that excited this bellowing herd. They snuffed the air, planted their heads near the ground, tore it up with their hoofs and horns, and glared at me with savage eyes. The fierce phalanx blocked the road, and it was the "better part of valor" to retreat. The instant I wheeled the pursuit commenced. A cloud of dust enveloped them, and the trampling of their feet was like the roll of thunder. My horse dashed forward frantic with terror, and on they plunged on every side, crushing down the brush-wood in their course, goring and tumbling over each other, filling the forest with their dreadful cries, and gathering nearer and nearer in the fearful chase. The struggle now became desperate. In five minutes we should have been overturned and trampled to death; but at this juncture Tom threw out my overcoat, and with an awful clamor they paused to fight over it, and to tear it into shreds. Driving at full speed, I directed Tom to toss out the cushion. The infuriated devils trampled it into atoms, and came charging on, their horns clashing against the buggy, and ripping up the ribs of my horse. At this fearful moment we were providentially saved. A huge oak, with a forked top, had fallen by the wayside, and into this I plunged my horse breast-high, and he was safe, the back of the buggy being then the only assailable point. At this the whole column made a dash, but I met the foremost with six discharges from my revolver; two bottles of Cognac were shattered on their foreheads; next a cold turkey; and, finally, a bottle of Scotch snuff—the last shot in the locker! This did the business. Such a sneezing and bellowing was never heard before; and the one that got the most of it put out with the whole troop at his heels, circling round, scenting the blood of the wounded, and shaking the earth with their thundering tramp.

I was now fairly in for it, and made up my mind to remain until night, when I knew they would disperse. I was relieved, however, by the approach of some cattle-drivers, who, galloping up on shaggy but muscular horses, with whips twenty feet long, which they manage with surprising dexterity, soon drove the belligerent herd to their cow-pens, for the purpose of marking and branding. This is done every year in "fly time." The cattle ranging over an area of thirty square miles are now easily collected, driven to a common pen or pound, when the respective owners put their mark and brand on the increase of the season. Thus this Egyptian plague is turned to a useful purpose.

I was now approaching the ancient village of Augusta, once the stamping-ground of the famous Coon Morris. Being advised to take a near cut when within three miles, I turned to the right and drove ahead through leafy by-paths and across deserted fields grown over with stunted pines. For three hours I drove about, describing three segments of a circle, and finally got back to the point I started from. [Nota bene: Let all travelers stick to the beaten road, for in this country one may travel twenty miles without meeting a traveler or a finger-board.] The country through which I passed was poor, the population sparse, and no indications of the proximity of a town that I had heard of for twenty-five years. I drove on, however, expectation on tip-toe, the sun pouring down vertically, and my flagging steed sinking above his fetlocks in the sand, when, lo! the ancient village stood before me—an extensive parallelogram, garnished round with twelve or fifteen crumbling tenements, the wrecks of by-gone years! Not a tree stood in the gaping square for the eye to rest upon; the grass was all withered up; the burning sun fell on the white and barren sand as on a huge mirror, and was reflected back until your cheeks scorched and your eyes filled with tears. Even of these dilapidated houses several were unoccupied, and we drove round two-thirds of the square before we could find a human being to direct us to the tavern. It was a log-cabin, with one room, a deal table, some benches and cots, and a back shed for kitchen. Stable there was none, nor bar, nor servant, nor landlord visible. I turned my horse on the public square and took peaceable possession of the establishment. Nobody was to be seen. I was hungry and fatigued. The idea of a town once famous, and its hundred-and-one little comforts for the traveler, had buoyed me up during the morning drive, and fancy had diagramed something very different from what I was then realizing. In a few hours, however, the bachelor landlord came in. Not expecting company he had gone out on a foraging expedition. He feasted us on delicious venison, and, being a Virginian, soon concocted an ample julep. The mint grew near the grave of a jolly lawyer, a son of the "Old Dominion," who died there a few years before. No man can live in such a place without losing his energies. The mind stagnates, and in six months one would go completely asleep. I never saw such a picture of desolation. All was silence and solitude. In reply to my inquiry, my old friend, Colonel Mixon, said that times were dull; there was a little activity in one line only; and hobbling off he soon returned with a pair of babies in his arms—twin gems, plump, blue-eyed, rosy-cheeked, hanging around his neck like flowers on the stump of a storm-battered oak. Counselor Barrett, who seemed thoroughly posted in this branch of statistics, informed me that, during the last twelve months, thirteen matrons of that vicinity had produced doublets! The Colonel said that any disconsolate pair who would board with him six months, and drink from a peculiar spring on the premises, without having their expectations realized, should have a free ticket at his table for sixty days to try it again.

These infant phenomena, however, are by no means confined to Perry County. East Mississippi every where is equally prolific. In the Paulding Clarion I read the following, from the Rev. Marmaduke Gardiner, of Clarke County:

"FALLING SPRING, Feb. 2.

"More than one hundred persons have visited my house since Saturday last, for the purpose of seeing three beautiful boy babies which my wife gave birth to on the 28th ult. One weighs $7\frac{1}{2}$, the others $6\frac{1}{2}$ each, and are perfectly formed. We have named them Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. I married my wife twenty years ago, and she has given me nine sons and nine daughters, but no triplicates until the last."

Married couples in search of heirs often cross the Atlantic, or drug themselves with nostrums and stinking mineral waters, when a single summer in these pine-woods would accomplish what they desire without extraordinary efforts, and at one-twentieth of the expense.

The old town next day presented a more lively scene. That certain premonitory of a piny-woods' gathering, the beer and ginger-bread cart, came rumbling into the square. — Rickety vehicles, of odd shapes, laden with melons, trundled along behind. A corner shanty displayed several suspicious-looking jugs and kegs. Buck negroes, dressed in their holiday suits, strode in, looking about for the candidates as one would for the giraffe. No candidate except the Hon. Robert J. Walker had visited the defunct town for years. It was quite an event. Finally, the stout sovereigns from the country came in, and the comedy commenced. The largest portion of the crowd was in the court-house to hear the orators, but a pretty considerable group was posted about the doggerly. A number were playing "old sledge" on the heads of empty whisky barrels, and others were discussing the preliminaries of a quarter race.

Three of the candidates had spoken, when the late Judge Mitchell (formerly a well-known Member of Congress from Tennessee) rose. After an elaborate reply to the arguments of two of them, he turned to the third, and laying his hand on his head, said, "I have only one word to say in answer to my young friend. He has a leetle soft spot right here, and it is mushy all round it."

When R. J. Walker was canvassing against George Poindexter for the Senate, he was accompanied, said Colonel Mixon, by a queer fish, one Isaac M'Farren, a fellow of infinite jest, and whose countenance was a comedy of itself. On a certain occasion they put up with a new settler, and had to sleep on the floor, while the man and his wife occupied a bunk in the same room. A very buxom damsel slept in a small kitchen near by. Mac had cast sheep's-eyes at her, and being uncomfortable on the floor, concluded to go and whisper a few soft nothings in her ear. He slipped out very quietly; but it being a crispy and frosty night, the door of the kitchen creaked upon its hinges, and the woman exclaimed, "Husband! husband! one of them men's arter Sally!" He sprang up, seized his rifle, and was rushing out, when Mr. Walker seized his arm. M'Farren hearing the noise, appeared at the other door rather en désabillé. "Je-men-y!" cried the man, and cocked his rifle. Mr. Walker threw it up, and Mac, running forward, seized him by the hand, exclaiming, "Sir, it is only a frolic and an indiscretion; I am a man of honor, incapable of injuring sleeping innocence. Sir, I throw myself on your generosity. I see that you belong to the honorable fraternity of free and accepted masons. Brother, I give you the right hand of fellowship!" The man was overwhelmed with this volubility, and flattered at the notion of being mistaken for a mason. He accompanied the party over the county, but finally voted the Poindexter ticket, because Walker would persist in running when M'Farren was the proper man for the place!

"I was in —," said Counselor Barrett, "when Governor —, who was a candidate for re-election, came there. The county had been recently organized, and few of the people had been there long enough to vote under the Constitutional provision which requires six months' residence in the county and twelve in the State. They were anxious to vote, and got up a petition to the Board of Police (which has the supervision of elections) to dispense with the requisitions of the Constitution."

"Did the Board comply with the petition?"

"I can't exactly say," said the Counselor; "but as they all voted, I presume the order was duly made. The best of the joke was, the Governor signed the petition!"

Next day the Counselor accompanied me a few miles on my way. Showing me a road running down toward the swamp, he inquired if I knew how that road came to be made. On replying that I did not, he said: "Some years ago I was down in that swamp with some fellows after wild hogs. I was standing on the edge of it hallooing on the hounds, my gun resting against a tree, when out rushed an enormous boar and charged right at me. I could only straddle my legs to escape his furious onset; but as he passed under, being rather low in the crotch, I found myself astride of him. Almost unconscious from terror, I involuntarily seized his tail, and stuck my heels under his shoulders. At every stride he took my spurs goaded him on. Thus he ran some three miles through the brushwood, making a clean sweep as he went, but finally fell exhausted, when I dispatched the monster with my bowie-knife. The road is now used for hauling timber from Leaf River swamp, and is called Barrett's trail."

The country through which I am journeying is sparsely settled, and is only adapted to grazing. Its surface undulates like the roll of the ocean, and hill and valley are covered with luxuriant grass and with flowers of every hue. Herds of cattle stand in the plashy brooks. Red deer troop along the glades; wild turkeys run before you along your road, and the partridge rises from every thicket. But for these the solitude would be painful. Settlements are often twenty miles apart; the cheering mile-post and gossiping wayfarer are rarely met with. The gaunt pines have a spectral aspect, and their long shadows fall sadly upon the path. At nightfall, when the flowers have faded away, no fire-flies gem the road; one hears no tinkling bell; the robber owl skims lazily by; fantastic shades chase each other into deeper gloom; and instead of "the watch-dog's cheerful cry," the "wolf's long howl" comes from the reed-brakes, and is echoed by its prowling mate on the neighboring hills.

The day was dark and lowering. For weeks nor rain nor gentle dews had refreshed the calcined earth. A heavy cloud hung overhead, and its pent-up fury burst upon the forest. The few birds that tenant these silent woods flew screaming to their eyries; some cattle dashed across the hills for shelter. The whole wilderness was in motion. The pines swayed their lofty heads, and the winds shrieked and moaned among the gnarled and aged limbs. A few old ones fell thundering down, casting their broken fragments around; and then the hurricane rushed madly on, tearing up the largest trees, and hurling them like javelins through the air. The sky was covered as with a pall; and lurid flashes, like sepulchral lights, streamed and blazed athwart it. The earthquake voice of nature trembled along the ground, and, ere its running echoes died away, came again, crash after crash thundering forth. But at length, as though weary of the agony, it paused, and the phantom clouds scudded away. The scene around was appalling! Hundreds of trees lay prostrate, while, here and there, others stood shivered by the bolt of heaven and smoking with its fires. God preserve me from another ride through these giant pines in such a tempest!

MADELEINE SCHAEFFER.

I.

AT twenty years old Madeleine Schaeffer found herself three against Fate, as Descartes against the murderous sailors: God, I, and my sword—the last a weapon whose fine edge the dull armor of her opponent had already partly turned. In other parlance, she had not a friend in the world, and had forgotten how to make one. Born in the faith that the race of Schaeffer crowned humanity, and that, owing to their rare condescension, the rest of creation shared sunlight and starlight, dew and rain, it was a stern teacher that wrought a new creed. In her native village her father ruled supreme, and art and wealth had done their best to make his daughter worthy of her blood; culture and accomplishment could hardly go further. When at length he looked upon his work, and saw that it was good, there came a great gap into his life—he had met with fulfillment. It was then that a malevolent deity whispered at his ear. His daughter's fortune—was it at all equal to what such a creature had the right to demand? Were there not flocks of golden fleece rambling about the earth, whose rightful shepherds were Schaeffers? And so the simple old country-born-and-bred aristocrat plunged into the vortex of speculation. An excellent nut for Wall Street to crack, and they found the meat sweet! One day he came home to Madeleine with Ruin as plainly lettered on his face as Dante's Omo. It was impossible for him to stay and front the vassals of his little burgh, and so they fled before the sheriff to the city; and there, after two years of hard struggle and much want, the old man died. What little remained in the purse Madeleine spent in conveying the dear form to its rest—that last in the long row of ancestral graves whose sunken stones, wreathed with wild-brier vines and wrought with lichens, slanted and crumbled before the sun and wind of two centuries. Then the coach deposited her at the station once more just as the great, panting train came in. Her foot was on the step before thought struck her, and she paused to ask herself what was to be sought in the city—what but blanker ruin faced her in those swarming lanes? Madeleine drew her shawl about her and moved away. As well die here as there; at least the autumn leaves would drift and mound above her—and the train thundered by. She turned under the late, dull sky, and once more mechanically sought her father's grave. But she did not enter the inclosure, only sat on the low gate-stone, like a sad sphinx to question the passers-by, while twilight hastened up to wrap her in its shadows.

"He that overcometh, the same shall be clothed in white raiment," she sighed through the stillness.

"Because thou hast kept the word of my patience, I also will keep thee from the hour of temptation," said another voice.

Madeleine started; she did not know that she had spoken; and looking up through the gray dampness she saw the old clergyman standing above her. He took her home with him, and had her put to bed and to sleep, and allowed her the refuge of torpor and grief. A friend of his knew of some gay Southern travelers who, at the North in the summer, had desired a governess. A letter came and went with its swift white wings, and Madeleine was checked and ticketed on her way to the Carolinian coast—kindness which the good, glad-giving man could ill afford since the generous Schaeffer tithe had failed him.

A weary journey both by nights and days—clattering over leagues of pine barrens—coaching through everglades that were sloughs of despond—skirting luxury, unthrift, and squalor—at length they plunged into an almost unbroken forest, hung with long veils of bleached moss, and Madeleine found herself the solitary female on the deck of a crazy little steamer bound down river. She drew her veil over her face, and sat apart on the deck, for there remained no great distance before her. Approaching it, her future, that she had kept resolutely out of mind, now rose and refused to be dwarfed. It was an ugly sight to her; her sensitive pride, her inborn hauteur recoiled: yet it was work, and to meet it she summoned endurance. Sitting there, she watched the banks of the narrow channel down which the steamer was shooting—banks which, in spite of the early autumn, were yet dense with lofty greenery, and often gorgeous in the floral garniture of riotous vines—still wild and virgin as when the river first burst its way between them. Here the engines stopped for food; or here the bows were half shoved in toward shore, and a long-limbed young man, rifle in hand, leaped on deck; or here there was fretting delay over piles of waiting cotton-bales; and here the little steamer went on her noisy way again. It was all very tiresome, and Madeleine turned to discover the nationality of her companions—an uproarious set of tobacco-feoffs for the most part. In one spot they threw the dice; in another, bartered and discussed the merits of crops, human and cotton; in a third, loud words, picturesque gestures, and angry eyes betrayed the political quarter of that microcosm. In the centre of this group, leaning on his gun, stood the young man who had lately leaped on board, hailed with a halloo. His shooting-clothes of some very coarse and thick stuff—his heavy boots—the hat slouched over his face—these things allowed him no exalted station; but there was a certain air in his manner of wearing them that said autocrat as distinctly as ermined velvet and jeweled orders could have done. Boon companion of them every one, he yet seemed to surround himself with a personal atmosphere which none of these creatures could penetrate; his brief and curt harangue, received with acclamatory acquiescence, had been uttered like a ukase. If, as he stood there, leaning in this lordly way upon his gun, his cigar, with its faintly-curling wreath, held carelessly away between downward fingers—if, standing so, he vouchsafed a sentence, it was rather tossed at them than spoken; and this fawning public of his, like any other spaniel, seemed to relish his thrusts better than another man's caress. But since she understood nothing, this, too, soon wearied, and, in despite of her tremor, she gladly greeted the sight of her little box thrown upon a landing where overhanging boughs darkened the stream, and a plank flung out on which she was to walk ashore. The tall young man with the rifle preceded, and, with a bow, offered a hand to assist her—a hand not much in accordance with the rest of him, and gleaming with a singular ring. Directly afterward he disappeared. Within a yard or two Madeleine now discovered an old coach awaiting her, and the driver having, satisfactorily to his own understanding, decided upon her identity in the affirmative, she was conducted at a funereal pace toward her final destination. The road was a causeway built above the dykes of broad rice-fields that every where, as far as eye could see, were green with the rank malarial tinge of a new, rich, second springing, although already stacked with the abundant harvest. At length they entered under a broad avenue of ancient oaks, a magnificent growth, huge and columnar, with vast arches and cathedral spaces. The pendent sheets of misty moss—the wild and brilliant parasites, whose blossoms fluttered like splendid wings in the dark and polished leafage—the carpet of dazzling verdure, sprinkled with shifting sun and shadow from its emerald under-sky, made a scene that filled Madeleine's soul with rest; and when, weary of gazing, she leaned back with closed eyes, the lofty murmur among the waving boughs seemed to sing the very strain of her dreams. She would have been content to jolt on under this antiphonal vault forever; but, as nothing is eternal, there came an end to leisure and pleasure in the shape of a large and irregular house, not in particular repair, and singularly weather-stained, half covered with vines, and backed with a lofty grove of sycamore and cypress, and, beyond, a dim line of sea.

Mrs. Ediston met her with a brood of little Edistons clinging about her skirts, and in ten minutes Miss Schaeffer had found her level for so long as she should teach beneath that lintel. Weary at heart, she gladly availed herself of permission to retire, and to dull with sleep the first edge of service.

It was early on the next morning when she awoke. Unpacking and arranging her slight wardrobe, she then made the most elaborate toilet of her life. A glance, a word, had taught her what to expect of Mrs. Ediston: white, but a servant. The haughty Schaeffer blood ill brooked it. But there is a pride far more tremendous than any other—that of proud humility, and behind this the girl intrenched herself beyond reach of all of Mrs. Ediston's arrows. From her few dresses, once rich, now turned and pieced, she chose the plainest, and bound her throat and wrists with a narrow linen. But first, all those drooping veils of darkest hair that yesterday hung their ever-changing shadows about her face, that waving and waving below the soft, round chin, had at length broken into globy masses of curl, she combed out and brushed straight along the brow, to be coiled behind in one heavy knot. It is true there was thus left exposed an ear delicate and pink as any faintly-tinged whorl, and an outline fine and soft enough for a Madonna; yet one scarcely notices such things in a dependent. Moreover want, and care, and grief had somewhat sharpened them all; and thus attired, pale through fatigue, and with no lovely expression in the curves of those reticent lips, certainly no one would have accused Miss Schaeffer of beauty.

Some dozen years before this epoch Mr. Roanoke the elder had died, leaving his youngish widow and her son well provided with stocks, mortgages, and railroad bonds, and his estate to a son by a previous marriage. On the estate, however, the widow continued to reside for a part of every year, traveling during the spring and summer. In one of these journeys she met with an admirer who speedily made her Mrs. Ediston, and returned with her to manage her step-son's affairs. This son, in process of education at the North, afterward chose to bury himself on one of the few rice-lands on the Mississippi, a maternal inheritance, leaving Mrs.

Ediston for the present in undisputed possession. But on the death of Mr. Ediston the vast outdoor arrangements of a plantation proved too much for her skill, and Mr. Geoffrey Roanoke returned to his ancestral acres. It was to this young man, then, that Mrs. Ediston presented Miss Schaeffer as she entered the breakfast-room that morning—presented as to a potentate. Mr. Roanoke was deep in his newspaper, but glancing up, he rose, bowed, and extended his hand after a moment's deliberation, with that chivalrous deportment due to any woman. Miss Schaeffer bent coolly in return, chose not to see the hand, and passed to the seat indicated by Mrs. Ediston, between the Misses Ally and Essie Ediston, who were already clamoring for every thing on the table. Quieting them, Miss Schaeffer scarcely suffered aught to escape her, since the first few moments of acquaintance are foundation-stones. It was more by intuition than otherwise that she recognized the state of affairs between the young man and her mistress. On the one part, a financial arrangement that spared the privy purse. On the other, she had been his father's wife; therefore was to be treated with respect; in the mean time managed his household admirably. But to say that there was love lost between them would have been a waste of words.

"Another cup, my dear Geoffrey? Julius, Mr. Roanoke's cup." And between the periods of his paragraphs Mr. Roanoke sipped his coffee, black and bitter—a habit which Miss Schaeffer supposed he had contracted to guard against the miasms. As she looked at him he wore a strangely-familiar air; she wondered where she had seen him before; and then as the ring on his hand flashed in her face she remembered. It was true he wore broadcloth now rather than fustian; and the countenance, crowned with its white forehead above deep-set but glowing eyes, had a somewhat less sardonic guise than when the brown beard and mustache alone appeared beneath the shade of a slouching brim. Still it was the same; and then an older remembrance struck her. A hand ungloved to fasten her cloak, and a strange ring scattering light from it. Well, why should he recognize in a pale, serge-clad governess the brilliant being who floated on his arm in swooning circles amidst music, and incense, and lustre? Damask cheek, dropping tresses, raiment of gold-colored satin that seemed but the shadow thrown by her topaz gems. Miss Schaeffer glanced at the mirror that hung opposite: no, severe and old, she would not have known herself. As her eye fell it rested for a moment on Mrs. Ediston's. Mrs. Ediston smiled, and stirred her coffee, and tasted.

A servant brought round Mr. Roanoke's horse for his daily visit to the fields; the cheerful banquet was concluded, and not a word had been thrown away.

It did not take Miss Schaeffer long to fall into the round of her new duties, which were not heavy; for after class-hours there was nothing but Clara's music, and Mr. Roanoke himself attended to Rob's Greek. For a day or two it was hard work with the uproarious Essie and Ally; but then the pair found that they were under that strong but light hand and succumbed with riotous pleasure; and in all Miss Schaeffer's stay at Roanoke Fields she had no more feal subjects than these breezy little things. Rob regarded his governess rather as a region to be explored, did not at once surrender his affections, held her command as a personal indignity, and refused allegiance. Miss Clara Ediston was the easiest victim of the whole. She had attained her twelfth year, and was advanced in her studies so far as the third volume of the "Children of the Abbey." Upon promotion she was struck with a fit of the sulks, during which her mamma prescribed and administered a dark closet. With her release she fled incontinently to Miss Schaeffer, and bewailed her fate in a style unworthy of Amanda, and found solace thereon in "Clara's Waltz," with which Miss Schaeffer silenced her, and for which she suffered her that day to put by the exercises. Thus established the autumn went fleeting into winter; but Miss Schaeffer had lost her bearings, she had no motive for notching off the days on her memory, and since the weather was like May she forgot that it was December. She had not become a whit more reconciled with her condition; she had only hardened her armor. Mrs. Ediston could not keep her at a greater distance than she kept Mrs. Ediston. As for Mr. Roanoke, she did not know that beyond the table courtesies she had yet exchanged a word with him. She was left out of all his plans. He regarded her as a subordinate, and treated her with quiet respect. To Miss Schaeffer it seemed quiet contempt. The frequent visitors did not know of her existence, of course. She never lingered at the table, never was to be found in drawing-room or on veranda; but in the school-room, if Mrs. Ediston sought her, or Mr. Roanoke came about Rob's Greek, she received them like a queen in her own domain.

"Why don't you ever come down when there's company, Miss Schaeffer?" asked Essie, skipping into the room on one foot and resting it with the other.

"Both feet, Essie."

"Oh, I forgot. Why don't you? There's going to be dancing to-night, they're fixing—"

"What is it?"

"I mean—why, Miss Schaeffer, what should I say?"

"What is it they are doing?"

"Mending the balcony."

"That's what you should say then."

"They're mending the balcony for the fiddlers. Don't you know how to dance? Don't you like to dance?"

"Yes, very well."

"So do I!" And Essie pirouetted round half the chairs.

"Not quite so much fling, Essie. A little more quietly," said Miss Schaeffer; for Essie danced after the fashion of a reckless figurante.

"Why, I don't make a bit of noise!" was the round-eyed reply.

"No; but a gentler movement. This way." And Miss Schaeffer, binding up a fallen tress, suddenly paused with a color in her cheeks, finding herself softly humming the gayest of tunes, and waltzing down the room with Essie.

"O Miss Schaeffer, you dance better than mamma!" cried the child in an ecstasy. "Do come down and waltz with me to-night."

"To-night you will be in bed. There, Essie, now I must draw your copies."

"No, indeed, we always sit up when there's company, to learn ease, mamma says. Miss Schaeffer, won't you?"

"No. Run away."

"But why not?" pursued Essie.

"Why not?" repeated Miss Schaeffer, throwing down her pencil. "Oh, because my dancing days are over."

"Over! What makes them over?"

"I've lost my slippers," said Miss Schaeffer, with half a smile.

"Wait not to find your slippers,
But come in your naked feet," hummed a voice in the corridor; and as Miss Schaeffer heard a retreating step she felt an uncomfortable suspicion that a witness of the little drama had been in the door-way. But if Mr. Geoffrey Roanoke had allowed himself such freedom, it must have been an inadvertence; more probably he had heedlessly caught the word in passing; and a moment after, as if to dispel the very idea, Mr. Roanoke himself, grave as Rhadamanthus, marshaled in the refractory Rob, bowed silently to Miss Schaeffer, and proceeded to scatter Rob's wits through the mazes of an irregular verb.

One morning shortly after this occurrence, when Miss Schaeffer took her seat at the breakfast-table, her eye was arrested by an envelope lying beside her napkin. A letter to her? And from whom in the world? Ah no; Mrs. Ediston allowed Mr. Roanoke the pleasure of paying her bills. Such was his method. As few words as possible with his serfs. All this without the movement of an eyelash.

"I suppose you know that the holidays are upon us, Miss Schaeffer?" said Mrs. Ediston.

"I had forgotten. You wish the children should have vacation?"

"Oh, certainly. From Christmas until Epiphany, always. It will be such a relief, Geoffrey, if Rob ever gets to college!"

"A relief not to be immediately experienced. He is very well as he is. A good enough boy as boys go," said the young man, scarcely glancing up from the price-current of the Mercury.

"You will not have time to return to the North, Miss Schaeffer, in twelve days?" continued Mrs. Ediston.

"I do not wish it. I suppose there is some place in the neighborhood where I can stay till they resume."

"Oh, here of course. There will be care enough for you. But I should have thought you would wish to go home," said Mrs. Ediston, meditatively.

"I have no home to go to," replied Miss Schaeffer, after a pause, gazing into her cup, and then looking steadfastly up.

"No home to go to! But where are your relatives?"

"I have no relatives."

"And no friends?"

"No friends."

"No relatives? no friends? Great Heavens, Geoffrey!" cried Mrs. Ediston in French across the table. "What sort of thing is this in the house with no relatives and no friends?"

Miss Schaeffer colored—a deep, warm tint that clung to her cheek. She smiled too, a smile that disclosed little bits of pearl.

"I beg your pardon, Mrs. Ediston, but I understand French."

"As my governess should!" retorted that lady, flushing angrily.

Miss Schaeffer did not notice the words, for her glance had caught Mr. Geoffrey Roanoke's; and with the dimpling smile, the gay glint of dark eyes, the color, Miss Schaeffer was for a moment again radiantly lovely—and knew it. Only a moment; then it all fell, and she was the gray-faced governess of old. Yet brief as the moment was, it was a small triumph; for Mr. Geoffrey Roanoke had been altogether in the habit of making the most trifling remarks to his mamma, in the French tongue, as if to exclude the white servant from any participation. He smiled himself—he could not help it; and as his eyelids dropped, it was on that perfect picture. In a breath he glanced up again as if to assure himself that it was still there. No, it had been a glamour—nothing else; no one but the pale, stern, black-clad woman sat before him. Miss Schaeffer had certainly taken a liberty. Mr. Roanoke's demeanor became icily lordly. At least so Miss Schaeffer construed the meaning of the next few moments. Little did the governess care. Indispensable, and knowing it, giving them good work for good payment—they were welcome to indulge their little whims. Her sole solicitude was to amass such a sum as would allow her to open a day-school in the city at no distant period, and after that perhaps to pay her father's debts. This very scene was another plate for her armor. She rose from the table, took the envelope, bowed to Mrs. Ediston as usual, and withdrew—Essie and Ally skipping down to follow her. But at sight of that money I can not say that a tortured fiend did not turn in her heart anew. It wanted yet a half hour to class-time, and in the school-room Miss Schaeffer composed herself above a sheet of paper. There was too much nobility in Madeleine's nature to attempt offering the good clergyman repayment of the sum he had expended for her. Necessity had forced acceptance upon her; it was impossible to cancel an obligation. But she could at least devote a portion of her earnings toward alleviating wants that she knew too well. Poor people in the surrounding country she had not yet met, for her walks with her pupils had been restricted to Roanoke Fields, the large island entirely occupied by Mr. Roanoke's plantation; and yet she felt as if there were a debt due Providence from her. An installment of this debt then, her letter being concluded, she folded within the delicate leaf, and superscribed and sealed it. Running down stairs with that light heart which makes a light foot, she saw Mr. Roanoke crossing the hall at their base.

"Oh, Mr. Roanoke," she cried. "Are you going into town to-day may I ask?"

"I am, Miss ——"

"Schaeffer, Sir. Will you have the great kindness to post this for me?" And she handed him the letter and the dime; for it was before that glorious invention of three-penny bits.

This was too much for Mr. Geoffrey Roanoke. He lightly, half-unobservantly shook the dime off into her hand, saying, in his courtliest style, "I take pleasure in doing so."

Miss Schaeffer opened her eyes. She was not aware that it was the first time she had ever voluntarily addressed him. But thanking him now, she turned away and dropped the dime into the palm of a little blackball who came tumbling down the stairs at the one opportune moment of his life.

"What is it, Geoffrey?" asked Mrs. Ediston, at his shoulder, as he drew on the riding-gloves, and before Miss Schaeffer was beyond hearing.

"You can see, mamma."

"Dear me! 'Rev. Cyrus Grey, Schaefferslin, N. Y.' Some little deacon studying for orders, I suppose; and after ordination there's to be a Mrs. Cyrus Grey and love in a cottage! What does the direction say to you?"

"Fallen fortunes, mamma."

"How?"

"The Schaefferslin. But I hadn't read it."

"Well. Don't forget to call at Spray Rocks. The children accept with pleasure. And there's my——"

"I am going the other way. Send Julius."

"Why, Geoffrey! it isn't a minute since you promised me to go at once yourself! And Julius will make a mess of it."

"Very well, then. I will call on my return."

"What! right in the noon?"

"At some time to-day. Now I have an engagement in town."

But Miss Schaeffer went springing up stairs and along the hall, with a half laugh lighting her face.

"What are you laughing at, Miss Schaeffer?" asked Essie, capering beside her.

"At laughing thoughts."

"So am I. What are your laughing thoughts?"

"What are yours, Essie?"

"Oh! cakes and tarts and Dr. Develin—he always gives us such pocketfuls. I wish Europe was in Guinea, and a thousand miles off! That's where he is now. He used to be here at Christmas. And he won't be home for—oh, for months! What are you thinking of, Miss Schaeffer?"

"I am thinking of an old woman who will have two blankets this winter instead of none. Of the little girl who looks like dying, and who is to have flowers and sherry wine and bits of chicken. Of three miles down river to school that Tom Allan shall skate now with flashing heels, instead of the five he used to walk. And what are you thinking of, Clara?" as that damsel confronted them in an aureole, apparently.

"Oh, Essie! oh, Miss Schaeffer! We're going to Juliet Develin's!"

"Pooh!" said Essie. "Who cares?"

"I do. Oh, Miss Schaeffer, she's just so beautiful! And she lets me stand at the toilet while she's dressing—"

"I like the Doctor best; I don't care a snap about her, except that, if she were a doll, maybe I'd like her in my stocking. Great black eyes, without any winkers, just like a doll's. And she slaps Silver—I've seen her!"

"Well, what if she does? Mother slaps Julius."

"Geoffrey don't; and he don't allow us. And he says no lady—"

Just here the bell tinkled, and the remaining personalities were lost to the world and Miss Schaeffer.

The holidays slipped over easily enough, on part of them the children being absent visiting Miss Develin, who, under the surveillance of an ancient aunt, kept her brother's house; and on their return, and the reopening of school-books, life jogged along the foot-pathway till spring. Mrs. Ediston bustled about the house; the children made it resonant; Mr. Roanoke was absent the greater portion of the time, either busy at the rice-mill or absorbed in caucuses and other such embroglios—not in the caucuses themselves, however, for he never condescended to lift his finger politically to pull a wire or turn a card; but on the dinners and routs that figured previously to their sessions if he had a wish he expressed it, and every body else acted upon it. Indeed so long had the Roanokes lorded it over that district, that few would have known how to withstand their precedent, even had Mr. Geoffrey himself been a person to withstand; and if some new-comer or some old malcontent dared object, then Mr. Geoffrey rose in might and annihilated him. Of course this gave him but small life at home; days passed in which the governess never saw nor remembered him—what little intercourse they did have was of the curtest; and lost in his thoughts he sat with that sardonic shadow on his face, and gave few words to any. With March, however, he took Rob on a long Northern journey, and Miss Schaeffer followed the remainder of the family to certain Virginian Springs, where, having established her with the children, Mrs. Ediston spent the summer in visits to her countless acquaintance—in September gathering her brood under her wing at home in the city house, since it was yet too early to breathe the poisonous atmosphere of the plantation. The year had been a trying one to Miss Schaeffer. Rob, enfranchised in soul, was more refractory than ever at being again obliged to own the female sway; the girls were also turbulent; and weary and worn, Miss Schaeffer would have given worlds for some friend to exchange a word of sympathy, to rest her and relieve her with love.

Three weeks of the city life, and Miss Schaeffer longed for that cool, sweet quiet of the island of Roanoke Fields. But Mrs. Ediston was in her element; the place was very gay. She went out every night—crape mitigated by lace—for a long seclusion gave her pleasures zest. At length one morning she planned a sailing party to the Fields—a party which should go and return by sunlight, owing to the nightly ascendency there of mists and miasms; and she consulted Mr. Geoffrey, who rode or sailed down and back every day, in reference to her designs.

"Damn the place!" said Mr. Geoffrey, kicking over a foot-stool. "I'd swop the whole of it for one acre of my Mississippi land if I had to choose. There it's as healthy as a New England corn-field; here, if you sneeze, you're a dead man. Freshes and salts—I'm tired of the sound! It was a fresh in the spring, and then had to come drought and upset the tide; and here's a salt to kill my plants just out of the long flow. It's the life of a dog—of the dogs of war! Good-morning!" And Mr. Geoffrey was off, to swear some unlimited oath in the privacy of his morning ride. But Mrs. Ediston, nothing baffled by this statement of a rice-planter's miseries, proceeded with her plans, and one day packed her hampers. She had, it might be confessed, a secret longing to look into the house, and see what ravages summer had made there—a longing which this course was one to satisfy and justify.

A hot, sultry morning, and the gay party went winding down the harbor in their boat, Mr. Geoffrey leading the way with Essie in a tiny yawl. The sun was blazing overhead; it seemed as if the furnace-blast of the wind should make the water smoke; but they went simmering on, reached Roanoke Fields, and disembarked.

How changed was every spray! The rankest, lushest, most entangled foliage; the foot sinking ankle-deep in flowery turf whose clouds of incense bewildered the brain with satiety. Overhead the boughs at noon made midnight with myriad leaves, that seemed each in their juicy strength capable of distilling the poison they sucked in from the ambient air; and far and wide, stretching away into the dim sea-line, clothed in deadly verdure, virulently virid, lay the long rice-fields smiling falsely under that mask of tenderness, freshest green. It was a glad day. No more graceful host than Mr. Roanoke, when he chose, ever stood in the door; he made the moments light even for Miss Schaeffer. But at length the bell sounded to recall all wanderers, who, coming laden with the wild and pulpy things they had pulled, hastily crowded the boat, and when the larger float pushed off Miss Schaeffer was left standing on the bank.

"I have hurried them home," said Mr. Roanoke to the overseer—who was about riding away, for he did not sleep on the place, as the slaves are the only ones who can remain there overnight, and they not with entire impunity—"because," continued Mr. Roanoke, in a voice very much as if he were soliloquizing, since although it was necessary for these people to have the information, it would be sufficient for them to hear him give it to himself, "because the day has been so hot that the mists will rise early and fall heavy." But here the man paused for a few last words—last words that took a half hour—and then Mr. Roanoke impatiently cut them short, ran up the little sail, and the two went skimming down the creek, and neither of them speaking, for Mr. Roanoke did not choose, Miss Schaeffer did not wish it. As they sailed, Miss Schaeffer leaned idly back in the boat and tried to forget herself. She watched the sky, cloudless and just beginning to give an answering glow from the horizon; the overhanging banks that threw such green glooms upon their shining way; the trailers that every here and there sent out a shoot of resplendent blossom, a lasso of tough cord to delay them; the dark water that gently parted beneath them; the flaws that sailed slowly on before them; the faint and tiny threads of vapor, laden with fragile beauty, that, rising half imperceptibly from the stream, faded away into the burning air; watched these elfin wreaths that breathing up and curling tendril-like on the skirts of the shadow of the shores, already streaked that burning air with coolness, nor knew that each cool waft could pierce the brain like blades.

"What do you see, Miss Schaeffer?" asked Mr. Roanoke, condescendingly breaking at length his haughty silence, as if her ways amused him.

"Little bubbles, Sir, little balloons of white air rising like sprites, Mr. Roanoke. Can they—"

"Accursed sprites! Twice cursed if the wind should fall!"

And the wind did fall. Mr. Roanoke got out the oars, bent above them, and shot on with sweeping strokes, and without a word. Fine and thin particles grained the air. The sun had not yet set, but the sky began to haze, and they saw him through a dun golden veil that seemed all at once to be steaming every where about them; they went breast-high through long-rolling waves of cloud combed white as wool. The veil thickened and clung to them, the thwarts were already dripping from it. The sun was neither to be seen nor felt; they were chilled to the soul and reeking with the foul leaden mists. Those sprites had grown and towered and thrown off disguise, and stalked along beside them and before them like giants walking the water, columns of white vapor. It became rapidly darker, they could only dimly discern the writhing, twisting forms of shadow that mounted on either side, the air they breathed stifled with heavy clogging clamminess; there was ringing in their ears as if they had been fathoms deep under the sea. So cold, so wet, they seemed to be rowing into the mouth of an icy hell. Once or twice they had passed the confluence of the countless waterways among these islands—they took their course by instinct. But as it darkened currents of mist seemed to be branch streams, the channels disappeared. They should long since have reached the sea and been in safe and clear night sky. Mr. Geoffrey felt obscurely for a bank; the beads were condensing on his forehead in blisters.

"I have lost the way," he said, hoarsely. "It will be better to walk, find the house, and build fires, than to stay here all night. It is doubtful," he muttered to himself, "if we either of us ever see sunshine again!" And making foothold, he handed her to the shore.

As damp, as dank, as dark. They plunged under roofing of black, poison-dripping boughs, through thickets that crouched beneath the withering mildew, and all the while they breathed this curdling cloud of miasm and decay.

"We are under the oaks!" at length exclaimed Mr. Roanoke. "We have rowed round the island and passed every sea-opening! Fools! We were mad to come!" But in a moment he had opened the hall-door and clanged it behind them. The thick air returned only an answering thud. "We will have a fire in the school-room. The mists may not mount so high. By closing every shutter we may escape, providing we be not already done for!" In a few seconds he had thrown heaping armfuls of wood on the hearth there, and a great blaze leaped up the chimney. Then Mr. Roanoke seated Miss Schaeffer. She was tired and pale, but had not after all endured such transition as he when he dropped the heated oars. It was plain that from her Northern birth and her but partial acclimation he expected at every breath to see her drop. Yet sitting there—and since sleep was death—they each shook off the drowsy weight upon them; began to sparkle by mere force of will; to laugh, and jest, and talk blithely; to relate, to invent; and Mr. Roanoke opened hoards of unsuspected learning, and became fired as he imparted it. They talked of the books they liked, and his criticisms were inalterable as crystals; they spoke of music, and he described to her a concert, with the Midsummer-Night's Dream, in such words that the strains seemed repeated in the air; they spoke of the drama, and he gave her sudden and swift impersonations of a great actor so vividly that she would have said there was a third person in the room; he fell to telling her of the region and its soil; it seemed to her that the earth had opened and she were plucking chemical secrets from the pictured depths. Once or twice as he spoke he gave her, so to say, an almost impalpable touch with a hand as cold as her own. Was it possible that this was Mr. Roanoke; the cold, unsympathetic, silent man—the cynical master? Miss Schaeffer leaned back in her chair, in a measure fascinated, in a measure irate. This airy grace, she knew, was like the cloud on some bald mountain's brow—the rock was underneath.

"Ah yes, Miss Schaeffer," said he, rising and lighting a cigar; "this does not offend you, I hope? That Midsummer-Night's Dream touches some very curious facts in our psychology, moreover. As much so as if Shakspeare were making very sport of human nature. Do you know—you must have had chances enough to learn this summer, if never before, since before you were one of the phantasmagoria, this summer one of the spectators (provided, as I say, that your own eyes were open at those Springs to learn)—that the juice of that flower called Love-in-idleness is tossed about on folks' eyelids to-day by some capricious Puck as resistlessly as ever in that old Grecian forest?"

"Mr. Roanoke, it never struck me as Grecian before."

"Exactly. It isn't. It is universal. World wide over; having once sat down beside Bottom on that flowery bank, and stuck musk-roses in his sleek, smooth head, the knave of hearts may lay traps for you; Apollo descend with lyre, and lute, and pipe, and flute; Cupid riddle you with arrows—and all in vain, because your blind eyes first opened on that clown with the ass's head. Is it so? God! But this is a ghastly Midsummer-Night's Dream! A very nightmare! Ah, what a chill! Miss Schaeffer, where are you?" His hand, that a moment since had been ice, seized hers with a grasp of fire, and he fell his length upon the floor insensible.

Miss Schaeffer sprang to her feet and had recourse to a vinaigrette, to a carafe of water, to hot friction. She drew him nearer the hearth; she piled the logs upon the blaze; she found his flask and poured the brandy between his teeth; she heaped upon him all the blankets to be found. But the malaria had done its work: he lay in statue-like immobility, and if his stupor broke at all, it was only from one swoon into another. In the mean while her very endeavors fortified herself, and she hoped, as indeed it proved, that her constitution was one of those few which are proof against all the envenomed missiles of the nightly swamps. She was worn enough to have all her senses dissolve in sleep, when, suddenly, a long, red ray slanted through a chink of the shutters; she darted forward and threw them open. It was morning—fresh, jubilant morning—blue sky, and golden light, and such hoary weight of dew loading the dripping branches and showering from them, in prismatic rain-flashes, as they frolicked with the glad, free wind; such song, such color, such radiance!

She heard the galloping hoofs that sped the overseer along, bethought herself of the alarm-bell, and summoned him to her aid; and ere long, having been borne there on a litter, Mr. Roanoke rested among the cushions heaped on the boat's floor, and, with his head held by Miss Schaeffer, was swiftly flying down the creeks and up to the city with the overseer at the helm.

Finally at home, Miss Schaeffer answered Mrs.

Ediston's queries as she could, and the whole house trembled round the point of Mr. Roanoke's life. It was the intermittent fever, too generally fatal, but with his iron frame there was hope. And so in a few weeks it appeared. The subtle foe had only taken the outposts, the citadel remained intact. And at length Mr. Roanoke came down stairs and once more sat among them; silent as ever, quiet, languid, paler but gentler, and looking up with a somewhat grateful smile at the slight and unexpected attentions which every one hastens to pay a convalescent. Mrs. Ediston had faithfully performed her duty; and now, as she again went out in evening dress, she thought him well provided with company in the children and Miss Schaeffer and stray visitors. But it was little society that he suffered Miss Schaeffer to be to him; and so coldly dis-trait was his behavior that one might have fancied him endeavoring to annul some influence of hers. Mr. Roanoke was not so omnipotent but that he must make an ambitious marriage. In fact, it was evident that he was struggling with himself; but to Miss Schaeffer it read only like an attempt to obliterate memory of any past condescension. Nevertheless he was yet ill, yet weak, and in these things the battle is to the strong.

The children had all been taken away, and the last caller had made adieux, as they sat there one night with the lighted windows opening on the gay city street.

"Ah, Miss Schaeffer," said Mr. Roanoke, impulsively, looking up at her as she remained disentangling the errors of Clara's work. "Calm little automaton, are you never lonely, never sad?"

"I? Why should I be?"

"True. You have a great deal of self-respect. It must be pleasant to live with a person whom you respect so much. You enjoy these evenings better than the last one I had the pleasure of spending with you?"

"I don't regret that experience, Sir," she replied, "except—"

"I understand," he said, and bowed. "I am very glad then. For certainly what life crawls through this very narrow chance is due to you."

"Not at all," responded Miss Schaeffer. "I did nothing. And should have done the same for any mortal being."

"Very equivocal," said Mr. Roanoke, with a smile, but then remained silent for a while, his head resting on his hand. As they sat Miss Schaeffer was at first recalling the conversation of that plague-stricken night, and remembering how through it all in his manner there had gleamed only an effect of will—a will to be fascinating, that he might kindle her into interest for the moment, and make her as fascinating in return, since he needed to find that charm in her in order to be roused and alert himself against the insidious enemy of the air, in order himself to battle off drowsiness and death. He was sweet then, and genial, and full of courteous grace; he treated her as his equal, his friend, simply through an instinct of self-preservation. Nevertheless (she had not felt it at the time, but now as she remembered it), all that glitter had only been like the cold sparkle round the peaks of icebergs. He had made a foil of her, and his brilliance of air and speech was no more than the gaudy beauty with which one trims one's salmon-flies. He would have conducted himself the same had she been a ghoul or a gorgon. And then Miss Schaeffer dismissed the subject, and went wandering back and away to remember happier scenes. At length, however, Mr. Roanoke, who had sat pale and rapt, raised his glance again, dark and piercing, and rested it on her. She sat absorbed in the work, the red on her cheek, the light in her eye, one long tress of hair fallen in slight disorder, and an abandon about her, a forgetfulness of his presence that made her seem more like a picture than a woman.

"Madeleine," said Mr. Roanoke, half in a dream, "do you suppose I do not remember that night when we danced together, the light dazzling back again from a dazzling raiment; the lonely salt-scented sea-breeze blowing in to lift that same tress, to trouble the topazes, to fan the carmine in the cheek—those imperious feet beating out the measure of the music?"

"You are asleep, Mr. Roanoke."

Mr. Roanoke laughed. "If I am may I never wake," said he. "Why do you not answer me? Do you forget it yourself? Have you danced with too many? Are you sorry to afford me a pleasant memory, as you were just now to afford me a pleasant debt? Sit down."

Should she lie? He was choosing to remember it now, only to ignore it to-morrow, and accustom her to his old superciliousness. Why not?

Madeleine's hand was raised upon the door, her face turned in his direction. I can not say what made such a rage surge in her heart.

"You must have taken your coffee too strong, Sir, this morning," said she. "If I had ever danced with a Southern satrap I should certainly recall the fact!" and was gone.

If Madeleine had not lost every other thought in her indignant feeling she would scarcely have begun to call Mr. Roanoke names. As it was, from that day he proved his right to the satrapy. His sentences to Miss Schaeffer—frequent as a racked ingenuity could devise—were brief as requests could be modeled, and had that freedom from the rising inflection which rendered them commands. Miss Schaeffer was summoned without ceremony to open the morning papers. Miss Schaeffer aired the evening papers. Miss Schaeffer was called to drop the wax upon his folded letters. Miss Schaeffer broke the seals and read aloud his business dispatches. Miss Schaeffer was sent to sketch any desired view. Miss Schaeffer was told to find the book and read till forbidden, and when the auditor's eyes closed, instead of dropping the page where she found it, Miss Schaeffer had the sublime revenge of reading on with the completest indifferonce as to whether he slept or whether he waked, until his voice dismissed her. If he enjoyed his tyranny is uncertain; but certainly Madeleine liked it better than any one's condescension. It left her on firm ground, and she hasped her purse with a less vindictive snap. But when it grew beyond further endurance, having been summoned one morning from lessons a dozen trifling times, she appeared in the door-way, and said:

"Am I hired as the children's governess, Mr. Roanoke, or as a companion for you?"

"You may go, Miss Schaeffer," said her tyrant, and was from that moment as innocent of her existence as the master of a house could well be.

The season was so late, the city so gay, and Mr. Roanoke's health so precarious, that they did not return to the plantation till orange-picking. And once re-established there, Madeleine forgot that she had ever been away; the place seemed like home; and if Mr. Roanoke remembered that other time of their mutual experience he said nothing, and she banished it. So they used life. Great preparations were toward. Dr. Develin had returned, and the holidays were to be kept this time at the island of Roanoke Fields. Mr. Geoffrey was little in the house, was carelessly cold to Miss Schaeffer when he was, and as carelessly cordial to the others. The last week went slipping by; every one waited gayly for the expected chimes, and the two days before Christmas began to bring guests in clusters.

II.

It was the first Christmas for some years that Mrs. Ediston had entertained. There were fine folks from Charleston, and gay folks from Savannah, and the Sea Islands sent tribute. There were the Hunts from the Cross Roads, the Pinckneys from Red Hill, the Prestons from the Ledge. They and their servants filled the house with cheery clamor. Last of all came the Develins. Miss Schaeffer had been out with the children gathering clumps of glossy foliage that should give finishing touches to the decorations, since Mrs. Ediston had pressed her into the service. She sat now, resting for an instant, at the foot of an oak in that great wood of the open spaces through which the avenue was cut, and the children were busying themselves about her like bees round a flower. They had woven a crown of the dark and prickly holly leaves, and hovering on tip-toe, were trying to adjust clusters of the scarlet berries therein, while their bright sprays were scattered countless about her, clinging to her shawl and nestling in her skirts. Slightly inclining her head to their touch, and yet oblivious of it, Miss Schaeffer sat, when a clatter of hoofs beat the ground, and a brilliant train swept by. One face and form only met Miss Schaeffer's gaze—and both, it seemed to her, were perfection. The full round shape hid half its voluptuous curves in the shade of the dark-green riding-suit, the face was softened by its floating veil into a vision of the night wind that came rising behind them. They passed like the creation of that careering wind; and as Miss Schaeffer looked she saw another figure following—a gentleman slowly walking beside his horse, his arm thrown across the creature's bending neck. As he caught sight of the gay group glinting in there among the trees he half paused, with an intent and startled eye, and then stepped in their direction. But the light there was uncertain, the wizard mingling of sunset and moonrise, and he resumed his way.

"It is Dr. Develin!" cried Essie; and the three fled in full chorus after him.

Miss Schaeffer, left to herself, gathered up her armful, and, still under the shelter of the oaks, turned her feet houseward. It was growing cool and damp; she would be glad when the home lamps blazed up across her path; the shadows already fell thick athwart her, and all the orange had died out of the air. Thus stepping swiftly, she heard a voice calling "Rob!" and paused a moment to listen. "Rob!" was repeated. "Julius!" and then the same voice executed a rapid roll of all the house-servants, accompanied by execrations obligato. It was plainly Mr. Roanoke, and in want of some assistance. Miss Schaeffer had half the mind to let him continue to want; then, by a natural impulse, retraced her steps, and following the frequent sound, her shawl falling about her, her arms heaped with the wild growth, the points of the leaves and the berries shining like gems in her hair, she came out into the rising ray of the full moon, and upon the bank of the creek, down which the wild wind was blowing the faint mist in ribbons.

"You need help, Mr. Roanoke?" she asked, sweetly. "The servants must be engaged. Can I answer?"

Mr. Roanoke did not reply, but stood gazing at her a moment.

"Oh!—Miss Schaeffer!" said he then, coolly. "Have the goodness to catch this rope. I do not care to lose a boat-load of game. Orders were left that Fez and Rocco should await me, for Master Robert went ashore at Spray Rocks. That will do. I thank you." And Mr. Roanoke leaped upon the bank.

"Look down there a moment, Miss Schaeffer," he said; but the governess was flitting on, a twinkling form in the shade. Miss Schaeffer was not the person with whom he could caprice—to-day attend, to-morrow rebuff; she understood, moreover, or thought she did, that his seldom condescensions were made not to her, but to the accidental instant in which something had heightened her appearance into an object of pleasure. Such condescension she would not receive. But with a bound and a long stride Mr. Geoffrey Roanoke was beside her.

"Why didn't you wait for me?" he said, half imperiously.

"There was nothing more that I could do, Sir," she replied, stately.

"A voice from the North Pole, that has sighed through the fissures of an iceberg. Yes, ma'am, there was, if you will allow it."

"And what, Mr. Roanoke?" she said, pausing, and slightly turning, as if she wished to leave no duty unfulfilled.

"I wished you to look down into the boat and have a pretty sight: the great antlered thing lying there on heaps and meshes of bright-scaled fish, and surrounded with those soft-feathered birds that I shot between wind and water as they rose to skim away—the whole part smitten with moonbeams, part wrapped in the ragged mist."

"I did, Mr. Roanoke. It was very picturesque."

"And what part did I play?"

"You looked, Mr. Roanoke—"

"Like the purveyor to Michael Scott?"

"Or like one of those genii who brought the basket to the Sultan's cook."

"Or, better yet, like the fisherman Kureem, who washed his nets at the foot of the Caliph's Garden of Delight. Eh?"

"Very like."

"Permit me," said Mr. Roanoke, bending to relieve her of her armful.

What had taken possession of him? He, who had for so long scarcely shown her a civility! She could not refuse herself the malicious pleasure of turning and saying,

"I think, Mr. Roanoke, you forget that I am Miss Schaeffer."

"Indeed, I am unlikely to!" he replied, biting his lip; and Miss Schaeffer fled on.

Entering the house by a side-door, she hastened to finish the task in the dining-room for which her shining leaves and berries were designed; then went to seek Mrs. Ediston. As she left the dining-room and was crossing the hall a gentleman slowly and listlessly descended, lightly leaning on the baluster and looking about him—the same person who led his horse up the avenue an hour previously. A slender man, who appeared taller than he was, but with a shape and manner of careful elegance; his face very white, with delicate but pronounced features, made yet whiter by a blazing contrast of black and brilliant eyes, whose lids had a habit of drooping, and by fine soft hair, that, parting on the forehead, swept away at either side in bending lines of raven tint; a countenance like a mobile mask over a bronze purpose, that made you remember the hand of iron in the glove of velvet; always somewhat melancholy in repose, and that now, as his glance fell sidelong on Miss Schaeffer, suddenly lighted up like a torch. He faced about, bent over the balusters, then went leaping down, swift and wordless. But Miss Schaeffer had disappeared.

"An ignis fatuus," said the gentleman, and returned to the contemplation of certain Roanokes impanneled along the hall to give verdict on posterity.

The next morning the governess, running down, contrived to procure a tray, which she brought into the school-room, and there made her breakfast, the novelty of the occasion tempting even Essie and Ally to join her, at which she allowed them to dress the table with leaves and flowers, and procure, through the hands of Venus, several dainty additions to the feast. In at the gay little scene which followed Master Rob chose to peer. It did not look unpleasantly—the bright sunshine, the fragrant blossoms, the fire sparkling on the hearth, the bird-song pouring in at the open window. After his head, Master Rob inserted the rest of him. There was, moreover, a certain savory suggestion of delectation; Miss Schaeffer had cooked a strange little dish at the fire there—a fire which he had heard his brother Geoffrey say Miss Schaeffer kept only in deference to the old Yule log. Why need he go down and face all those strangers? He knew he deserved nothing, yet Rob drew near the table, and was received with acclaim, while Ally covered his confusion by plunging retrospectively into the depths of her stocking and bringing up its contents anew for his edification. Before Rob had finished his repast Miss Schaeffer had seized the handle of this golden opportunity, and leading the three on and on, was soon deep in the King Arthur legends, to which Rob listened with open mouth, while she concluded by repeating to them, with a dramatic vivacity, the "Lady of Shalott." Rising at this point, Miss Schaeffer brought upon the table a small, square, shagreen port-folio, and, completing her rarefaction, placed it before Rob. Bit and bridle were in his mouth. He opened it with speedy fingers, and there lay a score of exquisite water-colors, each one the pictured phantasm of some verse, brilliant and beautiful. The three heads were bent over it in pretty grouping, when there came a tap, and Mrs. Ediston entered, for that lady had instinct enough to know the tap to be necessary. "Oh, mamma!" cried the three in chorus; and she bent with them. Mrs. Ediston would have been a much harsher person than she was had she refused to be pleased; and only looking in through curiosity in the first place, she now threw herself into a chair by the fireside, and took a moment's rest.

"Breakfast is over down stairs," said she. "Why didn't you come down, Miss Schaeffer?"

"Did you wish for me?" asked Madeleine, in sweeter tones than ordinary.

"Oh no; I didn't remember you till I saw the children's places. However, it's a very good plan. I had quite as lief they would breakfast and lunch up here. You can bring them down to dinner though, and that will answer for them. I do really wish that Dr. Develin should have some peace at this visit, and Essie devours him!"

"No, mamma—only his sugar-plums," interpolated the third person.

"You mustn't take me up so, child. Ally don't. Robert, did you thank Miss Schaeffer? I don't see what they're all about. Did you do them yourself, Miss Schaeffer? Very prettily done. They put me in mind of my own at school. There's Clara following Miss Develin down the avenue like a poodle, I'm morally sure! She's perfectly fascinated by her, and no wonder!" Here Mrs. Ediston's monologue was interrupted by Julius, who brought a note. The lady took it with sparkling eyes, broke the seal, and the sparkle fell. "Whatever shall I do?" cried Mrs. Ediston. The note dropped into her lap, and she buried her face in her hands.

Madeleine sprang to her side.

"She can't come! She ruptured a blood-vessel at the concert in the city last night! I had depended on her!"

Miss Schaeffer smiled, and drew back.

"Who, mamma?" asked the children.

"Don't bother me! The prima donna—Madame Cichi. Dear me! dear! dear! I had engaged her for to-night under immense difficulties. It is irremediable. What is to be done, Miss Schaeffer?"

"About Cichi? Oh, I don't think you have lost much," said Madeleine, thoughtlessly, "except in éclat. She is a miserable singer. I could do as well myself."

"You, Miss Schaeffer?"

An idea suddenly filled Mrs. Ediston's blank countenance. "There, children, take your pictures and run away. Quick! do you hear me? I've to talk with Miss Schaeffer." And Mrs. Ediston bustled up, threw open the door, seized Ally's shoulders, and set her on her feet outside, brushed the other two along and shoved them through, shut and locked the door with a triumphant snap, and came back to the fire.

"Do you really mean to say, Miss Schaeffer," said she then, breathlessly, "that you can sing as well as Madame Cichi?"

"I should think but poorly of myself if I could not."

"Well, we all know that you don't think poorly of yourself," said Mrs. Ediston. "And yet, I don't think you're vain—I'll allow that. Clara has certainly improved under your hands. Juliet Develin was astonished at hearing her play last night. I do hope she will turn out as handsome a girl as Juliet Develin; I shall be perfectly satisfied. Nobody dresses more stylishly in all the country. But bless me! that's not Cichi. Miss Schaeffer, they're all out under the oaks now. Close the window and sing to me any little thing you remember. Make haste. I haven't much time."

Miss Schaeffer wonderingly obeyed.

"That will answer," said Mrs. Ediston, before she was well through a single measure. "You must enact Cichi for to-night, Miss Schaeffer. There hasn't a soul of them ever seen her. I will take care that you are properly dressed. You needn't sing but three songs; and the higher and mightier you are the better they'll be imposed upon!"

"But, Mrs. Ediston—"

"No buts about it, Miss Schaeffer. It must be done."

"It is impossible!" said Madeleine, drawing in her breath.

Mrs. Ediston began to walk hurriedly about the room. Pausing at length, she said: "You can do as you please, of course, Miss Schaeffer. And so can I. Only if you can not obey my orders, I can not have you in my service!"

There rose before Madeleine the vision that had hung before her that night on the churchyard step, a gaunt vision of starvation and of death. This little taste of luxury had sweetened life too much despite the blows of pride. To go out alone into the world again? The thought was madness.

She stood there, pale and like marble.

"Well, Miss Schaeffer?" was the impatient question.

"I would sing for you with pleasure if I might do so without deceit and such charlatanry."

"Oh," said Mrs. Ediston, with a long breath, and scarcely noticing the hard words, "I'll see to all that. Thank you very much. Now Venus or France shall sew for you all day long—I'll make Christmas up some other time. You couldn't wear any of my dresses—you're too tall. But there are some of Mr. Geoffrey's mother's up garret packed in flannels, and if there's a decent one left—we can't keep silks from spotting on these rice-plantations—you shall have it. I'll see directly. Venus can fit it, and you must wear my jewels and make as splendid a toilet as possible!"

There was no help for it. Madeleine had to endure Venus's refitting, and she took a needle herself, that the girl need not sew more than all the morning, and thus the preparations were complete at noon. But to wear the dress of his mother! The humiliation was hateful to her; and the angry pride that had for once yielded to terror tormented her very soul. Before Mrs. Ediston descended to the late dinner she knocked again at Madeleine's door and left on her table a jewel casket, a great blaze of diamonds, cold emeralds, and glowing garnets, softened by masses of threaded pearls. She was excused from dinner, and sat looking through her window into the already bare and misting oak-wood. This was not the Christmas of Madeleine's remembrances; this gayety and pomp were not the broad and genial cheer with which her father's hall had beamed. Ah, at this moment how she missed that smile upon a tender lip—that warm, close clasp about her wrist! So utterly lonely—her heart ached for a little of the affection of those old days.

The harsh stroke of a bell struck across her reverie; Madeleine dragged herself up, for it was time that she should dress. There lay the array, and briefly she stood before her glass wrapped in its heavy drapery. All of Miss Schaeffer's soft bloom was on her cheek to-night; much of the pristine roundness had already returned to her form; gradually enough to be unconscious both to herself and others, she had been becoming lovelier every day. Now standing at the little table, white shoulders rising out of the deep tints of the ruby-colored silk that fell about her in perfumed folds, white arms half veiled in falls of old and creamy point, her hair dropping once more in its abandon and wreathed with long sprays of snowy jasmine flowers that trailed along her brow and cheek massed themselves among the coils behind, and lay in fresh and fragrant cluster on her bosom—never had that glass reflected so gorgeous a picture. She moved with half a sigh, and took up the little gloves awaiting her, and her eyes fell on Mrs. Ediston's casket. Impossible to tell what passed in her mind; but plainly at one conclusion had she arrived. This was not the dress for a governess. Off it slipped, as a tree might rustle down its crimson leaves. There hung in the closet an old gown of her own—the one thing retained by her—a silk unglossed and black; and no one need know it had been turned, nor in the lamplight would suspect its court-plasters. This indued, she shaded throat and wrists with ruffles of soft lace that had been scarcely worth offering at a pawnbroker's in those dire days of need. Her hair yet fell about her face, but dark and unadorned with other than its own lustre; and stripping the breast-knot of half its blossoms and all its green, she placed it where a brooch would have lain had she owned one. Thus enshadowed, it seemed as if Miss Schaeffer's beauty were only encaptivated and disguised and ready at any moment to break bonds.

Miss Schaeffer listened. They had long since come in from the dining-room, been joined by the gentlemen; the evening guests had all arrived; there was no cessation in the continuous murmur and rippling laughter; there was only, above it all, the quick, sharp tinkle of a bell, by which she knew that a servant was to be sent for her. Miss Schaeffer left her niche, slipped noiselessly down another stairway, entered at a side-door, crossed the crowded room to the piano with swift grace, drew off her gloves, sat down, and broadly struck a full, deep chord that, running up the keys in climbing arpeggios, lightly blossomed atop in another. Silence fell upon the circles, the clusters, the lovers, all but a few remote dowagers who yet hummed, a few butterflies who needs must flutter. And then, every one turning with suspended breath, the first notes of a Christmas Hymn stole softly out on the slow pastorale of accompaniment:

"While shepherds watched their flocks by night,
All seated on the ground,
The angel of the Lord came down
And glory shone around."

Mrs. Ediston could have boxed her ears. But to those who listened, that deep, clear voice was like the crystal of some slow stream that mirrored the high Hebrew heaven full of glad, solemn stars; the wide darkness over a hilly land; the wandering flocks; the obscure group of a thoughtless vigil; and all about the singer there seemed to float the breath of the night wind, of the dew, of the heavy-hanging full-blown blossoms, till her voice soared higher and fuller and rested, with outspread wings, on the triumphal glory of the shining throng. A momentary pause, as if to break the chain of all connection, and easily from that the voice slid into recitative and the Infelice of the Zauberflöte, with the pathos of its adagio. Here was bravura enough. Ladies laid their white-gloved hands together, gentlemen turned an awaiting ear—roulade, trill, cadenza, what not, all iridescent floriture, and a shake, sweet and clear as distant bell-notes sprinkled on the wind, was half-drowned in a rapture of applause. There followed a little serenade, without ornament, without accompaniment, a melody borne along by its own impassioned strength; as if the rose should sing, or some great heavy-petaled flower had sent all its fragrance curling out upon the strain—the strain of dewy alleys, of whispering shrubs, of sliding starbeams, and freighted love. Then the hands flashed upon the keys once more, and through the singer's lips bubbled up the Brindisi, with all the sparkle and foam of rosiest Champagne. There was an intoxication of enthusiastic greeting; the crowd surged up around the piano-forte where Geoffrey Roanoke, one knee in an antique chair, his arms across its top, had all the time stood facing her. Dr. Develin darted forward, saying, in semitone, "Madeleine! Miss Schaeffer! Do I see you here!" But the long casement on the other side of the piano was open, and Miss Schaeffer had vanished.

"So Develin," said Mr. Geoffrey Roanoke, unbending himself from his position, and his voice well shrouded in the universal hum of delight, "I believe if I brought here an angel out of heaven you would have a previous acquaintance! Ah, I see. A proposition just demonstrated, is it?"

"I have met Miss Schaeffer at Newport, and—"

"It is true then?" asked Mrs. Ediston, joining them.

"What is true, Madame?"

"The fallen fortunes. Geoffrey was saying—"

"I presume so. Mr. Schaeffer was a magnate. They lived in great splendor. Their hospitality exceeded every thing—but Mrs. Ediston's," he concluded, bowing to that lady, for he had been speaking with difficulty.

"Really! But she hasn't the first idea of style!" exclaimed Mrs. Ediston. "I was never more provoked than when I saw her come in to-night!"

"Except when you saw her go out, mamma!" But the mamma had already turned to another corner.

"You wish to speak with Miss Schaeffer, Doctor? I will find her for you!" with the air of an obliging man.

"On no account! Don't trouble yourself, Roanoke."

"No trouble," and Roanoke in turn disappeared through the casement.

But Miss Schaeffer was not outside. Neither was she in her own apartment. She had taken refuge by the school-room fire, and there, after a half hour's search, Mr. Roanoke discovered her, sitting on the rug just without the fender, her arms folded whitely across the crimson-cushioned seat of an easy-chair, and her head pillowed thereon, the firelight playing over all, tinging the dark lustre of her hair, lingering on the soft peach-bloom of the cheek, touching up the curve of the lip, sparkling and glancing and flickering again in the tears that hung on the points of those fallen eyelashes, for Miss Schaeffer was asleep. How long Mr. Roanoke staid to contemplate this picture is none of our affair; but at length he lifted the little silver school-bell and struck three or four fairy peals close at her ear. The dark eyes opened in a moment's fright, then Miss Schaeffer rose as if nothing had happened, and confronted Mr. Roanoke, disappointingly void of surprise.

"Did you wish for me, Sir?" she asked.

"I? No, Miss Schaeffer. I am sent. A friend of yours, not to speak of—"

"Is that all?" she replied, with a weary tone.

"I thought Mrs. Ediston—"

"Mrs. Ediston lays her commands," said Mr. Roanoke, unblushingly, "as well as this adoring host below. Ah, Miss Schaeffer, you will have all Charleston at your feet to-morrow; they will carry you off, and we shall lose our—"

"Governess."

"I was not about to use that word."

"Well, it makes no difference. I will come down. But you needn't wait, Mr. Roanoke."

Mr. Roanoke's brows contracted and darkened.

"Miss Schaeffer, how long is this devil of pride that rules your heart going to rule this house?" he said, and strode toward the door.

In an instant, however, he returned, and this time beaming—as well he might be, after having relieved himself of an ugly sentiment; but if Miss Schaeffer had shrunk in any sudden pain thereat, he was none the wiser. "I beg your pardon," he said. "I beg your pardon. But certainly I have chimed with that pride long enough, and given insult for insult till I can no longer. Seal friendship with your hand."

"I am not your friend, Mr. Roanoke," she said, with a firm, grave face, but her gaze upon the floor.

"What then? Ah, I recollect—my servant. I wish you were my servant!" he exclaimed, with a savage accent as he leaned against the wainscot. "I would soon bring that haughty spirit to terms!"

"Unfortunately, my skin is white!" And Miss Schaeffer would have passed him. But, springing forward, he drew her arm within his own, and led her down unfrequented passages and out once more under the leafless oaks.

"If ever there were hate in your heart it flashed in your eyes on that moment," he murmured. "Truly, I can not blame you. I, too, should hate if—" Suddenly he lifted her hand to his lips, and drew her into the lamplight and through the open casement.

The guests were just going out to supper. Mr. Roanoke's gesture arrested two of them, and he presented Miss Develin and her brother to Miss Schaeffer. A frank smile parted her lips and deepened her dimples as Miss Schaeffer took Juliet Develin's hand. She had heard of her before. Short bright hair, curling closely to her head in rings of gold; eyes purpler than the pansy, and to-night as velvet-soft as if they had never known the fire; other features rather piquant than classic: a child's face, capable of little but a child's expression and a child's wild freaks of passion. But her brother Miss Schaeffer met differently—downcast eyes, and heightened color, and an inflexible something in her mien. Plainly there was a bit of recollection between the two. Mr. Roanoke surveyed them, swift at conclusions. He had heard Dr. Develin's smothered "Madeleine, this is Fate!" But whether Dr. Develin were indeed a rejected lover of Miss Schaeffer's there is no record other than that engraved on Mr. Roanoke's consciousness. Thereat, transposed, the four followed the defiling pageant.

It was pretty to see the change which these others wrought in Miss Schaeffer's manner. She met them on terms of equality. For the nonce she ignored Mr. Roanoke—that is, as much as he allowed any one to do—but toward the Develins wore all her ancient courtesy, and that which had ever distinguished her, a gracious condescension, not from the heights of rank, but from the heights of womanhood. She forgot herself and became happy, and bloomed and sparkled as only happy people can. Then, too, she was at home in the house, or much more so than they were, and therefore attended to their ease in trifling ways, till all that was taken out of her hands by Mr. Roanoke, who, with a certain half-sarcastic grace, seated her, and thenceforth let her find herself surrounded and met at all points by the most careless care that ever frustrated any woman's attempts at independence. The supper-room was cool; Mr. Roanoke brought from an ante-room a black lace shawl and laid it on Miss Schaeffer's hair; it caught in the comb, and, rather than attend to this matter of toilet, she suffered it to remain mantilla-wise, and was soon glad to draw the light drapery about her throat.

"It is Spain!" he said, as he stood bending over his plate toward her. "Sweet Spain, and stately. Do not make it Spain inquisitorial, Spain of the torture."

"What has Miss Schaeffer to do with that region of the round earth?" asked Dr. Develin.

"Miss Schaeffer's veil has a great deal to do with it—also Miss Schaeffer's eyes," he added, aside:

"O settentrional vedovo sito,

Poi che privato sei di mirar quelle!

"Miss Schaeffer," said the Doctor, "you have learned ere this that one of Mr. Roanoke's choicest rôles is to evoke spirits?"

"Spiriting of 'blue spirits and gray?'"

"An équivoque," remarked Juliet.

"Nothing of the kind, Miss Schaeffer," said Mr. Geoffrey. "Being interpreted, he says I raise Satan in every body's soul, and do not cast out devils."

Madeleine's indrawn breath gave mute acquiescence; and Mr. Roanoke, turning on his heel, went down the table to exchange a flirting sentence with all whose eyes he caught.

"What possesses Mr. Roanoke?" asked Miss Juliet then. "He has been just this way every time we've seen him for— Miss Schaeffer, how long have you been here?" she asked, archly.

"Oh my being here has nothing to do with Mr. Roanoke. I rarely see him."

"Yes, he is changed," said the Doctor. "If you had known him in those days when he lived in Louisiana, and, buried in books, seemed to have no more life than any waif of the great river there, you would find it so. We all have our phases. Roanoke woke up at last to his importance as a unit at the head of a great many ciphers. One day he will blaze, a great and shining light, to show the country its ways."

"Spontaneous combustion?" said Juliet, over her shoulder.

"Parties and politics have long been laying a train," continued the Doctor, obliviously; "but who is applying the spark?"

"Are you talking of the divine spark, Doctor?" asked the person spoken of, rejoining them, and hanging some spray of glowing fruit over a salver's edge, and before Miss Schaeffer's eyes.

"Cela se peut."

Mr. Roanoke seated himself on a foot-stool as conveniently as he was able.

"Trying to fan a breeze! Treason in a man's own household! The penalty of treason, you know, is a rope's-end."

"With a noose in it!" laughed Miss Juliet, turning a moment from her hovering devotees (a throng of whose ilk Mr. Roanoke's last movement had barred away from Miss Schaeffer), for which words, while her brother bent to reprove her, Mr. Roanoke unbent his lips again.

"That is what my mamma calls style, I suppose. A saucy minx, is she not, Miss Schaeffer? Yet one forgives every thing to such a face."

But Miss Schaeffer not choosing to humor his fancy and prolong the subject by a reply, looked up with a smile at Dr. Develin, who offered her a glass of wine that seemed like a bubble full of rosy sunlight.

"Yes, Miss Schaeffer," continued Mr. Roanoke, in his frequent demi-voice, "it is very true that I can not cast out devils, since I have lived so long in the house with you and—"

"You take pains to be rude," she responded, holding the glass away from her lips and preventing him from qualifying his sentence.

"Not at all. It is perfectly natural. Miss Juliet, allow me?" And he had flashed off with the brilliant little thing upon his arm—his head bent toward hers, his face wreathed with smiles—to open the dancing in the hall, as the first strains of the strings became audible.

Miss Schaeffer moved away with Dr. Develin; declined dancing; and a moment after was sorry for it.

"Madeleine," murmured her companion, "three years ago do you remember such a night in Venice?"

She ventured no reply.

"Madeleine," he murmured yet lower, "then you did not seem to hate me; now I have a right to know why so suddenly I lost you there."

"Nor did I seem to love," said she.

"And now, Madeleine? You regret?"

"I regret nothing, Dr. Develin."

He was silent a moment, looking down as one looks after a stone thrown into some deep well, and waits for the ripple to ascend; then lifting his glance he watched the dancers, who whirled by them like a storm of colored snow-flakes.

"Roanoke dances well, Miss Schaeffer," said he, quite as if nothing else had been said. "So he does every thing. Some day, perhaps, he will confide to you the secret of his success."

"Mr. Roanoke and I have nothing in common."

"Except the 'mounting devil in the heart,'" said a voice at her shoulder, and he glided along.

"Am I ambitious?" she asked, facing the Doctor, and half laughing.

"No, child; you look as if you wanted nothing but peace."

A change came over Madeleine's face—floated there on a flood of remembrances. She suddenly grew pale and still. Almost before she knew it she was seated and half-curtained in the window, and the Doctor stood beside her, and she heard his voice rippling on till she was able to catch the words. The minutes flew by; and at length an audacious hand lifted the curtain.

"Deep in the charms of some Oriental city, where roses and nightingales and fountains make divine melancholy all night long! Very cozy indeed!" said Mr. Roanoke. "But if Miss Schaeffer is going to sing me that little song she promised—"

"I beg pardon. What little song?"

"It seems that I am not to be allowed to finish a sentence to-night. You promised me the Du meine Seele."

"You forget, Sir. It must have been some other young lady."

"The music is put out, and half the candles—"

"And you are very near being so!" exclaimed Miss Juliet, coming to bid her brother good-night. "Every one has gone home, or gone to bed, or I wish they had, and here you sit mooning with Develin. Has he not reached the end of his rope yet? What occult arts has he been teaching you? How to make a witch of yourself? Ah, Miss Schaeffer, it is very plain that he needn't teach you how to bewitch Mr. Roanoke!"

Mr. Roanoke turned upon Miss Juliet a look that made her eyes drop, then gave his arm to Madeleine and led her away. At the foot of the staircase he paused, and said, "But you will yet sing it to me—Du meine Seele—that I swear! Good-night, Ruiseñora!"

At dinner next day, Mrs. Ediston having put the length of the table between the governess and Dr. Develin, Mr. Roanoke found himself in one of his lordly moods again, and treated his quiet neighbor to items of ancient superciliousness. Perhaps he remembered too sharply that last night had turned the tables upon him; perhaps it was not best all at once and so suddenly to change his tactics; perhaps he had been too dévoté; perhaps he was incensed at her indifference; perhaps he would suggest to her the distance between his love and his hate. In short, there were a thousand perhapses, not one of which occurred to the quiet neighbor's mind; for as it was—an instant surprised at such renewal of arrogance—Miss Schaeffer then listened to the table-talk, and took no further notice than that evinced by a little spot of scarlet in the cheek, that spread into a joyous flush when the truant Rob, in an extremely soiled and briery condition, came in and laid a spray of wild Christmas roses beside her hand. Mr. Roanoke sat with his arms folded on the mahogany, sending shafts here and there, and upsetting every body's arguments with one solid thrust of some briefer sentence. Miss Schaeffer took up her roses and turned to thank Rob, who had been beckoned to his mamma, and through a series of vindictive whispers sent away for repairs.

"Ah, Rob!" cried Mr. Roanoke, after the retiring hero. "Abjure the salic law? Conquered at last!" and thereupon fell suddenly into his last night's caprice and sparkle.

Juliet Develin left her nuts, slipped round to Madeleine, and telling her she had forgotten her pin, fastened the blossoms in her bosom.

It was the following morning that Miss Schaeffer found, upon her toilet-table, a kid case inclosing a tiny diamond 'spray—stem and leaf and half-blown blossom—the diamonds looking up at her, in their immortal freshness, and seeming to hang on their thread of filigrane like the very dew of the morning: she almost expected that they would shake before her breath, blow away, and vanish into the great reservoir of vapor, and light, and color. Yet Miss Schaeffer did not give these embodied atoms of lustre a second glance, but passing Mrs. Ediston's apartment, and finding the door ajar, she slipped in and laid them beside the restored jewel-casket, as if they had been overlooked. At the table, then, Miss Schaeffer's throat seemed snow above its knot of roses; but Mr. Geoffrey Roanoke had the pleasure, so soon as he was at liberty to look about him, of seeing Mrs. Ediston's purple blazing with the diamond spray, like a constellation on the violet velvet of heaven—while she displayed it to the lady below Dr. Develin as one of dear Geoffrey's graceful gifts. Mr. Geoffrey bit his lip and bent his gaze full upon their rightful owner, but Miss Schaeffer was carving her rice-bird and answering Mr. St. Pierre's remarks with the unconcern of innocence. Thereupon a quick frown darkened Mr. Roanoke's brows; silent and waiting before—now a cold wit began to scatter its prisms about; satire pointed his spears; keen, and polished, and glittering as an icicle, he once or twice dazzled, but never warmed the unconscious object about whom all his lightnings played. For Miss Schaeffer had not troubled herself to consider how her action would affect Mr. Roanoke; she had done what she thought best and half forgotten it.

Coffee having been served in the drawing-room, Miss Schaeffer sat in a window sipping her own, and her eye fell on Mr. Roanoke leaning carelessly against a bracket and looking down abstractedly, while he held his saucer in one hand and his cup with the uplifted fingers of the other. It was a great glow on one of those uplifted fingers which had caught Miss Schaeffer's eye anew—as often before—a coal of fire it seemed, burning with inward and intense light. All the cynical darkness had left Mr. Geoffrey's face; there was shadow there yet, but it was of a softer and sadder thing. As he raised his cup now he suffered his glance to sweep round, under the half fallen lids, in her direction. Immediately afterward he stood before her and held the resplendent carbuncle beneath her eyes.

"It is the Roanoke ring, Miss Schaeffer," he said. "You refused my pin; will you wear my ring? Will you wear the Roanoke ring, Miss Schaeffer?"

Madeleine looked at it, calmly enough; its flame did not touch her; she only saw engraven on it singular and ghastly emblematic lines—the death's head and cross-bones.

"It is fearful!" she said, without looking up, and drawing in her breath as she was wont.

"Do you always wear that, Mr. Roanoke?"

"From mother to son, from son to mother, always. It is our escutcheon—dust and ashes. Then you will not wear it, Miss Schaeffer?"

"I wear no jewels, Mr. Roanoke."

A fire like the spark imbedded in that stone shot into Mr. Roanoke's eye; he bent lower to speak, when Dr. Develin's hand was laid upon his shoulder.

"Come, Roanoke," said the Doctor. "Here's Mrs. Ediston wants your help, and Miss Schaeffer mine. To your post, man!"

Mr. Roanoke stepped away in his masterful manner, and stopping to place his cup on the bracket against which he had been leaning, certainly no one would have supposed that it were aught but the sorriest accident, through which that bronze statue of Will fell shattered to the floor, having crushed the delicate cup to dust. Dr. Develin sprung to arrest its fall. "Never mind," said Mr. Roanoke, in that semitone of his, "the servants will remove it. Julius! Certainly there are enough bronzes in the house without it!" and proceeded toward Mrs. Ediston, while Julius and his subsidiaries obeyed orders; for though Mr. Roanoke never raised his voice, the person to whom he addressed himself could scarcely have lost a syllable had horizons been between them.

The hours wore on, and Madeleine had been playing some singular murmuring music of Chopin's, music that was like the talk of flower-roots and fibres below the damp, rich, fragrant earth. As she sat now idly twirling out little silvery runs from the twinkling fingers of one hand, Mrs. Ediston's demi-voice in Juliet's ear came also to her own. "Really, if I'd have known what a fuss it was going to make I wouldn't have let her sing a note! I never can keep such a fine lady in service, I'm sure! How can you give orders to a person that takes them like a born duchess? There's the blessing of having one's servants black. It would be the greatest relief in the world if that languishing hair of hers would turn as crisp as chain lightning!"

"Mrs. Ediston!"

It was Mr. Geoffrey Roanoke who spoke, as he stood at no great distance, with folded arms and looking down. Whether it was because his eyes were flashing to such extent that he feared lest they should wither the woman if he glanced up, I can not say; but though they were so resolutely bent below, some subtle rays must have darted through the very lids, for Mrs. Ediston blenched before them.

The chorus of fiends in some demoniacal opera clanged up, and resounded, echoed, and died under the player's hands. Then Miss Schaeffer rose, her face pale as any marble masque that ever hung upon a statuary's wall. She went herself and sat down beside Dr. Develin.

"I must leave Roanoke," she said.

A light leaped into his glance; his face grew luminous as a cloud under which the sun sheathes himself. He dared not ask if it were to Spray Rocks she would go; any where, any where away from here was one step nearer there. He bent to listen, to assist, to arrange; a city chart and directory were opened, pocket-book and pencil required; animated words, promises, smiles, cheer, counsel; the two heads bowed together for a while over a side-table. Then the future was lapped to rest, and the present moment rose uppermost once more. So, passing into lighter talk, Madeleine stood playing carelessly with her fan—woven out of wild grasses and the pearly spires of rice by Essie's little fingers—and forgot herself into all the old ways with which she once queened it by sea-shore and mountain: the soft flush upon the cheek; the eye suffused with light; the laugh—that thing so seldom heard from her at Roanoke Fields—chiming like the last fringe of the surf in the silvery shells: others besides Dr. Develin were drawn about her. She was glad, confident, beautiful. She held again a court, and all men crowned her.

Looking into Mr. Roanoke's haggard eyes, what sprite then possessed Juliet Develin to dare break out in singing—to sing in a weird, little, murmuring voice like the bee's in a blossom?

"But one, one wish. It can not come too soon.

Alike to me the sunshine or the rain,
Alike the gibbous and the waning moon—
All vacant and in vain.

"One wish. Whether the sky burn blue at noon,
Or the cold stars shine on my dreamless bed,
One wish whose answer can not come too soon—
That I were dead."

But the evening went, and Mr. Geoffrey Roanoke could have known nothing of how it went with her, except by his happy faculty of seeing through the back of his head, since she never once saw him look in her direction. At length came the bed-candles. As Miss Schaeffer lighted hers, while a dozen moths hovered about to take the office on themselves, they were put to flight by something in the mien of one who approached, and the hand that gleamed with the great engraven carbuncle passed before her eyes, took away the candle, and kindled it at leisure.

"Madeleine," said Mr. Roanoke, suddenly lifting the little blaze close before her face, as if he would inspect her very soul, "did you understand me this evening?"

"Yes, Mr. Roanoke."

"And did I understand you?"

"Yes, Mr. Roanoke."

"And it is he, then, who receives you; who is to be the wall between you and the world; who is to be allowed to love you!" he exclaimed, with an intensity of suppressed tone to make one tremble. "I love you!" he muttered. "I love you, and all the Develins in creation can not love you more! By the God in heaven above us, you shall leave this house to-morrow, or you shall stay in it my wife!"

But Mr. Roanoke's proud and insolent passion was like a rushing tract of shallow sea; it broke on the pride of a firmer spirit. For all answer, Miss Schaeffer drew from her reticule a card, carefully inscribed:

Miss Madeleine Schaeffer,

It was one of those paper missiles which the Church of Rome declares thunder-bolts. Mr. Roanoke stood stricken, with the card trembling in his hand. Miss Schaeffer passed on.

GEORGE BANCROFT.

IN 1834 Bancroft published the first volume of his "History of the United States," "the mature fruit of a long-cherished purpose." He had indeed, as early as 1818, while a student at Göttingen, determined to devote himself to historical pursuits, and for this purpose had marked out a course of study admirably adapted to the development of the lofty object to which he intended to devote his life.

After graduating at Cambridge in 1817, he went to Germany for the purpose of prosecuting, in the universities of that country, a comprehensive range of studies, contemplated by few, and prosecuted to a successful termination by a still more limited number of his countrymen. This scheme included nothing short of the whole range of ancient and modern literature, both sacred and profane. In the development of this plan he remained at the University of Göttingen for two years. He studied German literature under Benecke; French and Italian under Artaud and Bunsen; the Oriental languages under Eichhorn; Natural History under Blumenbach;* and with Dissen, who was an enthusiastic admirer of Plato, prosecuted a thorough course of Greek philosophy, including nearly all the writings of Plato. While pursuing his philosophic studies at Göttingen he resolved to devote himself to historical composition, in the prosecution of which object his comprehensive range of studies could be made directly available.

In 1820 he received the degree of Doctor of Philosophy from the University of Göttingen, and soon after went to Berlin, where he was kindly received by William von Humboldt, Varnhagen von Ense, Lappenberg, Savigny, and Schleiermacher. Here he listened to the lectures of Wolf, of Schleiermacher, and of Hegel. At Heidelberg he spent several hours each day with the historian Schlosser. In Italy he formed the acquaintance of Manzoni at Milan, and a life-long one with Chevalier Bunsen at Rome. In Paris he made the acquaintance of Benjamin Constant, Cousin, and Alexander von Humboldt. He returned to the United States in 1822, and although for a portion of the time engaged in other pursuits, yet he never lost sight of his original intention, and in 1834 gave to the public the first volume of that history with which his name is now so intimately associated.

In the prosecution of his historical studies and in the composition of his works he has always acted upon the suggestion that "facts would clear up theories and assist in getting out the true one." With what success his carefully arranged and systematic labors have been prosecuted is evinced by the reception which has been given to his works, and the position which they have secured for their author as a man of letters and a calm, thoughtful, and philosophic historian.

"A History of the United States by an American writer," says Edward Everett, in an able article in the North American Review in the year following the appearance of Bancroft's first volume, "possesses a claim upon our attention of the strongest character. It would do so under any circumstances; but when we add that the work of Mr. Bancroft is one of the ablest of the class which has for years appeared in the English language; that it compares advantageously with the standard British historians; that, as far as it goes, it does such justice to its noble subject as to supersede the necessity of any future work of the same kind, and if completed as commenced will unquestionably be regarded both as an American and as an English classic, our readers would justly think us unpardonable if we failed to offer our humble tribute to its merit."

* Humboldt, when about twenty years of age, was a student of Natural History with Blumenbach, and there first learned the progress Zoology was making in advance of the great development of Cuvier, since continued by Agassiz, by means of which this branch of science is placed upon a new basis; for Blumenbach was unquestionably the first who presented a classification of the animal kingdom based on a knowledge of its structure.

With the exception of occasional intermissions, induced by his appointment to offices of high political trust, Bancroft has devoted himself almost exclusively to the great work he has undertaken. Although nearly thirty years have elapsed since the appearance of the first volume, yet the zeal with which he prosecutes his self-allotted task never falters, nor does he weary in subjecting, over and over again, each fact to the most rigid scrutiny and philosophic deductions before it is admitted into the chain of evidence by which the future will judge of the acts of the founders of the Government of the United States.

The separate volumes have appeared at irregular intervals. The second was published in 1838, the third in 1840, the fourth and fifth in 1852, the sixth in 1854, the seventh in 1858, the eighth in 1860, and the ninth will probably appear in 1863. The completion of the third volume formed an important epoch in the progress of this work, inasmuch as it terminated the "History of the Colonization of the United States." The colonies, which for a century had been struggling through the first feeble steps of existence, had now become firmly established and prosperous. From this epoch a new order of things was to take place; and these colonies, hitherto the dependencies of a great nation, were to become the integral parts of a great nation themselves. Prescott, already eminent as a historian, seized this opportunity to write a review of the work as thus far advanced for the North American Review, in which he thus alludes to this important epoch. "What Mr. Bancroft has done for the colonial history is after all but the preparation for a richer theme—the History of the War of Independence: a subject which finds its origin in the remote past, its results in the infinite future; which finds a central point of unity in the ennobling principle of independence that gives dignity and grandeur to the most petty details of the conflict; and which has its fore-ground occupied by a single character toward which all the others converge as to a centre—the character of Washington in war, in peace, in private life, the most sublime on historical record. Happy the writer who shall exhibit this theme worthily to the eyes of his countrymen."

The best evidence that Bancroft has performed his labor in such a manner as to find acceptance in "the eyes of his countrymen," is to be found in the numerous editions of his works absorbed by the public. In 1840, when Prescott's review appeared, the three volumes then published had already reached their ninth edition, and the demand has since continued unabated. We have before us the eighteenth edition, and are not sure if this is the latest.

My first acquaintance with Bancroft began in 1852, while the American Medical Association, in its various wanderings, was assembled at New York. Among the entertainments to which, as a member, I was invited was a breakfast at Dr. Kissam's. The greater part of the guests were medical men, and included Doctors Warren of Boston, Parsons of Providence, and Delafield and Francis of New York. Of those who were not attached to the medical profession was Bancroft. There were in all some fifteen guests, and among them many of varied intellectual attainments and much conversational ability; but in regard to colloquial powers the rest were left far in the back-ground by Dr. Francis and Bancroft. Dr. Francis had the reputation of being the most facetious and pleasant dinner-table companion in the city; and I must acknowledge my great surprise in discovering that the grave historian, whom I had expected to find a sedate if not a taciturn man, was fully the equal of the humorous Doctor in his power to engage the attention of the company.

We left the house together, and, as our pathway lay in the same direction, we continued to walk, chatting pleasantly upon such topics as presented themselves. Bancroft remarked that our association was not devoid of interest to him, as in the course of his studies he had become particularly interested in physiology, which he considered a vast field for contemplation. While at Göttingen he had received instruction in natural sciences from Blumenbach, whose physiological researches gave to him an exalted position in his day. The advance of science, which had largely affected physiology, had rendered many of the views of Blumenbach obsolete; yet it must be confessed that, from the lights in which he was enabled to view these facts, few minds were more acute or logical than his.

I remarked that New York, by its enlarged facilities, was attracting not only business men, but those who were devoted to literary pursuits, as well as men of leisure. He replied that on his return from abroad he found New York—taking it all together—a pleasanter place for a residence than any other city, but that he had for a long time made himself independent of external aid, in the prosecution of his historical researches, by taking care to possess himself of every work bearing on his particular pursuits. I fully realized the force of this remark, a few years after, when I came to see his collection, which in certain departments, and those in which he most requires its aid, far surpasses any public library in the country, not excluding the Astor Library.

Bancroft's habits are essentially those of a student. He rises early, and his morning hours are devoted to literary labor. In the later part of the day, if the weather is at all favorable, he takes a ride on horseback, and returns in time for dinner. The evening is devoted to the society of his friends, either in accepting invitations or in receptions at his own residence. Following the custom of his early friend Schleiermacher, he is at home on Sunday evening, and in the simplest and most unostentatious manner receives those who from personal friendship, or attracted by his reputation as a writer, fill his saloons.

While preparing a work on Private Libraries, I frequently saw Bancroft in his library, which occupies the entire third story of his residence. On such occasions he was always surrounded by papers and books, and deeply immersed in documentary examinations, historical composition, or the revisal of proof-sheets. At this time he very rarely allows himself to be interrupted, and almost invariably declines to receive visitors until a later hour in the day.

The library contains not only every work he can procure bearing upon the history of the United States, and their early colonization, but also some of the best authors in each of the departments of knowledge; so that few questions can arise that he has not the means of answering in his own collection, which has already attained to the number of from twelve to fifteen thousand volumes, and, from the accessions constantly being made, promises to be much larger in the future.

The department of Philosophy, which is particularly rich, contains the complete works of his early instructors, Hegel and Schleiermacher. Reference to these naturally led the conversation to their authors, and his personal acquaintance with them. Of all the great German philosophers, he was, while in Berlin, upon the best terms with Schleiermacher, and a pretty constant attendant upon his Sunday evening receptions, where he was almost certain to meet a number of the most brilliant literary lights in Berlin. Upon the foundation of the University of Berlin in 1810, Schleiermacher was elected as the head of the Theological Faculty. He had already eminently distinguished himself as a writer on theology, as well as by his translation of Plato, which he had originally undertaken in connection with Frederick Schlegel, but had finally completed alone. As a pulpit orator he had great renown. Short and almost deformed in stature, with a remarkable conformation of body, and a sickly and delicate constitution, and an almost habitual sufferer from nervous maladies, he bore up against these infirmities with the heroism of a philosopher and the equanimity of a Christian. "I have known him," says Dr. Lücke, "while suffering from spasm of the stomach, not only to deliver lectures, but to preach to large and attentive audiences, who did not perceive that he was not in the most perfect bodily health." He never wrote his sermons before delivering them, and those which are in print are from notes taken by others while he was speaking. His plan was arranged in his own mind by previous reflection; and on Saturday evening he made out what he termed his "bill," consisting of the text and a few divisions of his subject, which was all he carried into the pulpit. It has been facetiously said of him that he composed his sermons while drawing on his boots. So too in his lectures—such as those on the History of Philosophy—a small scrap of paper answered for his memoranda. But so exact and logical were the sequences of his ideas, so clear his comprehension of the subject, and so great his mastery over it, that he never faltered in delivery or failed to infuse his own fervor into the minds of his auditory; and frequently, when under the influence of extreme bodily pain, rose to a point of pathos that swept through his audience like a strong wind through a forest of slender reeds, bowing down their judgments in obedience to his own superior will. In those pedestrian excursions in which the German professor as well as student, during the long vacations, is accustomed to lay up a stock of health for future use, he was usually the most active. He was fond of the society of his friends, and always received them with a cordial welcome. His eye, bright and sparkling, ever seemed to be lit up with a pleasant smile; and however stoutly he might be called on to defend his own particular views of philosophy or religion, or combat those which he deemed false or pernicious, he always did so without personal animosity, and often with much good feeling for his opponent. Toward such a man it is not surprising that the enthusiastic student of philosophy should have been warmly attracted; nor is it at all remarkable that the distinguished Professor should have warmly welcomed to his circle his young transatlantic friend.

Nor was Bancroft less kindly received by Savigny, who occupied the position of chief of the Law Department of the University, and ranked among the ablest jurists of Germany. His masterly production on "The Vocation of our Age for Legislation and Jurisprudence," originally published in 1814, is one of the clearest and most logical expositions of the nature of the law necessary to regulate Germany that was ever written, and is alone sufficient to entitle him to a distinguished place among liberal writers on jurisprudence, had he never written his "History of Roman Law in the Middle Ages" and "System of Roman Law at the Present Day," through which he obtained such celebrity. Savigny was likewise the intimate friend and correspondent of Niebuhr, at that time the Prussian Minister at the Court of Rome; and it is possible that the friendly reception Bancroft met with from him on his visit to Rome soon after may have been partly induced by the high regard which Savigny entertained for him.

Niebuhr, although strictly engaged in the diplomatic service, had been at intervals of leisure a close and profitable student of Philology. Upon the foundation of the University of Berlin, with Buttmann, and Herndorff, and others, who made Berlin the centre of literary life in Germany, he was appointed a Professor, and, as such, delivered those lectures on Roman History which formed the basis of his great work. The success of his lectures was such, that, although in the beginning he had only intended to prepare a course of lectures on the subject of Roman History without undertaking to write a history, which, to use his own language, he considered "a less rash undertaking," he almost insensibly commenced the latter, and devoted to it the best part of the several following years. The first volume appeared in 1811; the second in 1812; and when, several years after, Bancroft met him at Rome, he not only occupied a distinguished position as a diplomatist but had established a world-wide reputation as a historian.

Bancroft's acquaintance with Niebuhr was, however, far less intimate than with his Secretary of Legation, Chevalier Bunsen, who was at that time possessed of much reputation as a philologist; and, moreover, was a proficient in the language and maxims of Plato, which served as a still additional bond to draw the young American admirer of this great Grecian philosopher more closely toward him. Bunsen occupied a residence separate from that of Niebuhr; but the two were on terms of the warmest friendship. Indeed Bunsen was indebted to this source for his present position, and afterward, on the retirement of Niebuhr from the mission, to his elevation to the post of ambassador.

Among the acquaintances of Bancroft in Berlin was Wolf, who was perhaps the most thoroughly conversant with the Greek language of any one in Germany. He told Bancroft on one occasion that he could read Aristophanes in Greek with the same facility as he could his prayer-book in his native language. Bancroft afterward repeated this remark to Foss, who replied that he did not believe it to be possible. "For my own part," said he, "whenever I am anxious to find a passage in Homer with facility I take my own translation of the work in preference to the original." Certain it is that Wolf translated one hundred lines of the "Odyssey" into German, dactyl for dactyl, spondee for spondee, and even cæsura for cæsura, and, stopping short in the middle of a line, defied all Germany to complete the translation—a challenge never accepted.

Bancroft, while a student at Göttingen, met Goethe at Jena, and afterwards at Weimar. He bore a note of introduction to him at Jena, where he was temporarily occupying apartments in a public edifice belonging to the Grand Duke. Goethe received his visitor in the garden, where he happened to be, and here they continued to walk and talk for an hour or two. He was carelessly appareled, but his carriage was majestic, and his manner stately and dignified. He was quite frank in the utterance of his thoughts, and conversed upon many topics; but most about Byron, who was then at the height of his fame. He said that he eagerly devoured every thing that Byron wrote. "Don Juan," of which two cantos were then published, he considered as evincing the most genius of any of his works, although he greatly admired "Manfred;" probably the more, because he believed it to be an imitation from his own "Faust." In this, however, he was mistaken. In an interview with Byron a few years later Bancroft mentioned Goethe's criticisms, and particularly that relating to his imitation of "Faust."

Byron replied that he was, much to his regret, unacquainted with the German language; and the only knowledge he had of Goethe's "Faust" at the time of writing "Manfred" was derived from Monk Lewis, who had translated to him some of the scenes, and had given him a general idea of the plot some time before he thought of writing "Manfred." It was, he declared, honor enough for "Manfred" to be mentioned by the side of "Faust."

This conversation occurred during a visit which Bancroft paid to Byron in May, 1822. In his rambles through Italy, after having spent three weeks of spring in Florence and its environs, and mounted the peaks of the Apennines to obtain a view of the Adriatic and the Tuscan sea, as well as to follow, with becoming reverence, the footsteps of Milton among the shades of Vallombrosa, Bancroft reached Leghorn while a squadron of United States vessels, under the pennant of Commodore Jones, in the flag-ship Constitution, lay off the harbor. In company with the other Americans who chanced to be in Leghorn, he was invited to be present on board the Constitution, which was to be visited the day after his arrival by Lord Byron. He had, however, on this occasion but little opportunity for conversation with Byron.

On that day an incident occurred which is worth relating. A lady of great personal beauty approached Byron with the remark that, unless she bore some memento back to Philadelphia, no one would believe that she had seen him, and asked permission to appropriate the rose he wore in the button-hole of his coat. The poet not only yielded up the flower, but on the following day sent a charming note, accompanied by a copy of the "Outlines to Faust," as a more enduring memento of the occasion.

I was curious to know the kind of deformity under which Byron labored, as many versions of it had been given—the last and most unpardonable being that by Captain Medwin, who, according to his own account, had taken advantage of the temporary absence of the faithful Fletcher not only to uncover the feet of his deceased friend as he lay stretched on his bier, to satisfy his own curiosity, but had given the result of his observations to the world—I therefore asked a gentleman who was present on this occasion concerning it.

"I can not say," replied he, "in what his lameness consisted. When he made his first appearance on the deck of the Constitution he did so with an unsteady gait, which gave an apparent embarrassment to his motions. This was at the time attributed to the fact that he supposed a group of ladies, whom he observed on the deck, to be English; but it was afterward thought that it was occasioned by his lameness, or perhaps his attempt to conceal it."

I remarked that he was by some thought to have had a club-foot; but I hardly thought that could have been the case, because the lameness, from a deformity of this kind, is so uncompromising and ungraceful as at once to detect its source, and I had been informed that Byron's movements in walking were far from being ungraceful.

"I certainly did not consider them graceful," said my friend; "and there was nothing in his movements, as I casually observed them, to put the idea of a club-foot out of question." In the absence of any positive testimony on this point, I am inclined to the belief that the limb was slightly shortened; and the ankle-joint permanently ankylosed or stiffened.

On the morning of the day following Byron's visit to the national ships in the harbor of Leghorn, Bancroft accepted an invitation given him by the poet to visit him at Monte Nero, where he was then residing. The dwelling, which was of brick and of a flaming red, stood in the midst of a landscape of well-cultivated grounds, with no unusual attractions for a summer residence except its proximity to the Mediterranean, which lay some three miles distant, and was visible from the house.

At eleven Bancroft sent a note to Byron desiring to know when it would be convenient for him to wait on him. The answer promptly returned was, that he should be most happy to see him an hour hence, as he was lazy and was not dressed. At the time appointed he repaired to the residence, and was shown into a spacious apartment, where he was at once joined by Byron, who immediately began the conversation by a number of questions about the squadron he had just visited, and the ships of war and naval battles of the United States; with all of which subjects he was conversant, as also with most of the minutiae connected with the affairs of honor which had taken place among distinguished American naval officers.

In politics he professed himself on the Liberal or Democratic side, and cherished the hope that he might visit the United States, and give, what he confessed had not been done, an impartial view of the country, its progress, and political institutions. It was at this period that he had his famous liaison with the Countess Guiccioli; who was, in fact, at that moment an inmate of his establishment, and was at a later hour in the day presented to his young American visitor. The embarrassments into which this connection involved him, on account of the political relations of her father and brothers, and in which he was made to share a part, rendered his continued residence in Italy soon after not only unpleasant, but absolutely impossible, except at a sacrifice of his interest in the Countess and her family.

That his intention to visit America was something more than a passing thought is evident from the circumstance that soon after this visit, when he apprehended the alternative of surrendering the Countess or sharing her fate in some other land than Italy, he wrote to a friend that he had determined to take up his residence with her in America.

With the character and productions of the literary men of the United States Byron was well acquainted, and spoke with great respect of Edward Everett and Washington Irving. Of the latter he had most to say, and expressed himself highly pleased with all his works, but most of all with "Knickerbocker's History of New York."

Bancroft expressed his acknowledgments for the high appreciation in which he held the favorite author of America.

"I esteem Irving," replied Byron, "only in common with all my countrymen, among whom there is but one opinion concerning his genius."

Byron, who at this time was smarting under the fancied or real wrongs imposed upon him by his countrymen, separated, against his own volition, from her who might have rekindled the better nature within him, and, expatriated from his native land, still spoke and acted as an Englishman. He alluded to the clamor that had been raised against him on all sides, and appeared to view it with indifference. "But it was plain to see that under all this assumed careless gayety he was deeply wounded, and that the scorn he sometimes professed for English opinion was, after all, but a proof how highly he would have valued the good opinion of the best and noblest in his native land, had he had the good fortune to have secured it."

Byron was in excellent spirits, and, under one pleasant suggestion after another, managed to detain his visitor long after politeness had induced him to offer to take leave. On one of these occasions, while looking out of a window which commanded a view of the sea and Napoleon's prison at Elba, they found, on leaving it, that a lady had noiselessly entered and taken a seat on the sofa. This was the Countess Guiccioli. She was about twenty-five, of fair complexion, rosy cheeks, light auburn hair, and fine large dark eyes, expressive of gentleness. While the visitor was not particularly impressed with the high order of her beauty, he at the same time attributed to her a manner of uncommon gentleness and amiability. This description corresponds much better with my conception at least of this lady's personal appearance than many of those which invest her with remarkable personal charms. A lady who saw much of her in Paris long after Byron's death, and when she had grown to be a middle-aged woman, has often described her to me as somewhat short, rather fleshy, and on the whole what Byron would have denominated a "dumpy woman;" without much beauty, but gentle in manner and agreeable in conversation.

Bancroft has, from time to time, quitted the seclusion of the study to mingle in the more active arena of politics, and always with great effect. The question of a National currency, which largely occupied the public mind about the period of the election of Andrew Jackson to the office of President of the United States, called forth some able suggestions from his pen, which personally gave him a high position with the chief executive, and probably led to his selection, as collector of the port of Boston, by Van Buren, at a later period, without solicitation on his part. During Mr. Polk's administration he occupied, for about eighteen months, the post of Secretary of the Navy, which he exchanged for that of Ambassador to the Court of Saint James.

His administration of the Navy Department was signalized by the most rigid economy in expenditure consistent with its successful working; and he is probably the only Secretary of his day whose estimates were allowed to pass without cavil by the Committee of Ways and Means of the House of Representatives. During his administration of the Department the Naval School, whose importance and efficiency is now generally admitted, was established at Annapolis. Its site is now temporarily removed, but its value in the early training of naval officers is so universally acknowledged that its permanent continuance can scarcely be doubted.

The commercial knowledge gained as Collector of the port of Boston enabled him, while in charge of the Embassy to St. James, to aid very materially these interests in both countries. Among his public acts in this capacity is the negotiation of a postal treaty between England and the United States, which was duly ratified by both Governments. This treaty places this important service upon the most liberal footing for both nations, and is conceived and executed in a spirit of candor that renders it alike popular to the people of both countries. The twentieth clause of this treaty, which, in view of our present disturbed relations, is of great significance, stipulates that, in the event of a war between England and the United States, those vessels connected with the Isthmus of Panama, belonging to either country, and engaged in the mail service, shall be free from molestation for six weeks after a notification shall have been given by either Government to the effect that their trips must be discontinued.

While occupying the position of Minister in England Mr. Bancroft availed himself of the opportunity to add largely to his collection of manuscripts by liberal extracts from the public archives of both England and France, which were freely thrown open to him for this purpose, as were also the private collections of many persons whose ancestors occupied distinguished positions in America. The whole collection of documents relating to America thus obtained is handsomely bound in about two hundred folio and quarto volumes, which are justly regarded by him as the most valuable, as it is undoubtedly the most expensive, portion of his collection.

His time is now almost exclusively devoted to the completion of that history which has been the chief occupation of a life now far advanced toward that period which usually bounds the span of human existence. Whatever may be the disadvantages of this epoch in life in other pursuits, it certainly favors the historian in the circumstance that it enables him to "see the worth of great men, who can not see the worth of each other;" to cast aside party prejudice and personal feeling; and to do justice to those who by the force of circumstances were made the victims of combinations too mighty for them to control.

MISTRESS AND MAID.

A HOUSEHOLD STORY.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "JOHN HALIFAX, GENTLEMAN."

CHAPTER IX.

THE day of the Grand Hegira came.

"I remember," said Miss Leaf, as they rumbled for the last time through the empty morning streets of poor old Stowbury—"I remember my grandmother telling me that when my grandfather was courting her, and she out of coquetry refused him, he set off on horseback to London, and she was so wretched to think of all the dangers he ran on the journey, and in London itself, that she never rested till she got him back, and then immediately married him."

"No such catastrophe is likely to happen to any of us, except, perhaps, to Elizabeth," said Miss Hilary, trying to get up a little feeble mirth, any thing to pass away the time and lessen the pain of parting, which was almost too much for Johanna. "What do you say? Do you mean to get married in London, Elizabeth?"

But Elizabeth could make no answer, even to kind Miss Hilary. They had not imagined she felt the leaving her native place so much. She had watched intently the last glimpse of Stowbury church tower, and now sat with reddened eyes, staring blankly out of the carriage window,

"Silent as a stone."

Once or twice a large slow tear gathered on each of her eyes, but it was shaken off angrily from the high cheek-bones, and never settled into absolute crying. They thought it best to take no notice of her. Only, when reaching the new small station, where the "resonant steam-eagles" were, for the first time, beheld by the innocent Stowbury ladies, there arose a discussion as to the manner of traveling. Miss Leaf said decidedly—"Second-class; and then we can keep Elizabeth with us." Upon which Elizabeth's mouth melted into something between a quiver and a smile.

Soon it was all over, and the little household was compressed into the humble second-class carriage, cheerless and cushionless, whirling through indefinite England in a way that confounded all their geography and topography. Gradually as the day darkened into heavy, chilly July rain, the scarcely kept-up spirits of the four passengers began to sink. Johanna grew very white and worn, Selina became, to use Ascott's phrase, "as cross as two sticks," and even Hilary, turning her eyes from the gray sodden-looking landscape without, could find no spot of comfort to rest on within the carriage, except that round rosy face of Elizabeth Hand's.

Whether it was from the spirit of contradiction existing in most such natures, which, especially in youth, are more strong than sweet, or from a better feeling, the fact was noticeable, that when every one else's spirits went down Elizabeth's went up. Nothing could bring her out of a "grumpy" fit so satisfactorily as her mistresses falling into one. When Miss Selina now began to fidget hither and thither, each tone of her fretful voice seeming to go through her eldest sister's every nerve, till even Hilary said, impatiently, "Oh, Selina, can't you be quiet?" then Elizabeth rose from her depth of gloomy discontent up to the surface immediately.

She was only a servant; but Nature bestows that strange vague thing that we term "force of character" independently of position. Hilary often remembered afterward how much more comfortable the end of the journey was than she had expected—how Johanna lay at ease, with her feet on Elizabeth's lap, wrapped in Elizabeth's best woolen shawl; and how, when Selina's whole attention was turned to an ingenious contrivance with a towel and fork and Elizabeth's basket, for stopping the rain out of the carriage-roof—she became far less disagreeable, and even a little proud of her own cleverness. And so there was a temporary lull in Hilary's cares, and she could sit quiet, with her eyes fixed on the rainy landscape, which she did not see, and her thoughts wandering toward that unknown place and unknown life into which they were sweeping, as we all sweep, ignorantly, unresistingly, almost unconsciously, into new destinies. Hilary, for the first time, began to doubt of theirs. Anxious as she had been to go to London, and wise as the proceeding appeared, now that the die was cast and the cable cut, the old, simple, peaceful life at Stowbury grew strangely dear.

"I wonder if we shall ever go back again, or what is to happen to us before we do go back," she thought, and turned, with a half-defined fear, toward her eldest sister, who looked so old and fragile beside that sturdy, healthy servant-girl. "Elizabeth!" Elizabeth, rubbing Miss Leaf's feet, started at the unwonted sharpness of Miss Hilary's tone. "There; I'll do that for my sister. Go and look out of the window at London."

For the great smoky cloud which began to rise in the rainy horizon was indeed London. Soon through the thickening nebula of houses they converged to what was then the nucleus of all railway traveling, the Euston Terminus, and were hustled on to the platform, and jostled helplessly to and fro—these poor country ladies! Anxiously they scanned the crowd of strange faces for the one only face they knew in the great metropolis—which did not appear.

"It is very strange—very wrong of Ascott. Hilary, you surely told him the hour correctly. For once, at least, he might have been in time."

So chafed Miss Selina, while Elizabeth, who by some miraculous effort of intuitive genius had succeeded in collecting the luggage, was now engaged in defending it from all comers, especially porters, and making of it a comfortable seat for Miss Leaf.

"Nay, have patience, Selina. We will give him just five minutes more, Hilary."

And Johanna sat down, with her sweet, calm, long-suffering face turned upward to that younger one, which was, as youth is apt to be, hot, and worried, and angry. And so they waited till the terminus was almost deserted, and the last cab had driven off, when, suddenly, dashing up the station-yard out of another, came Ascott.

He was so sorry, so very sorry, downright grieved, at having kept his aunts waiting. But his watch was wrong—some fellows at dinner detained him—the train was before its time surely. In fact, his aunts never quite made out what the excuse was; but they looked into his bright handsome face, and their wrath melted like clouds before the sun. He was so gentlemanly, so well-dressed—much better dressed than even at Stowbury—and he seemed so unfeignedly glad to see them. He handed them all into the cab—even Elizabeth, though whispering meanwhile to his Aunt Hilary, "What on earth did you bring her for?"—and then was just going to leap on to the box himself, when he stopped to ask "Where he should tell cabby to drive to?"

"Where to?" repeated his aunts in undisguised astonishment. They had never thought of any thing but of being taken home at once by their boy.

"You see," Ascott said, in a little confusion, "you wouldn't be comfortable with me. A young fellow's lodgings are not like a house of one's own, and, besides—"

"Besides, when a young fellow is ashamed of his old aunts, he can easily find reasons."

"Hush, Selina!" interposed Miss Leaf. "My dear boy, your old aunts would never let you inconvenience yourself for them. Take us to an inn for the night, and to-morrow we will find lodgings for ourselves."

Ascott looked greatly relieved.

"And you are not vexed with me, Aunt Johanna?" said he, with something of his old childish tone of compunction, as he saw—he could not help seeing—the utter weariness which Johanna tried so hard to hide.

"No, my dear, not vexed. Only I wish we had known this a little sooner, that we might have made arrangements. Now, where shall we go?"

Ascott mentioned a dozen hotels, but they found he only knew them by name. At last Miss Leaf remembered one, which her father used to go to, on his frequent journeys to London, and whence, indeed, he had been brought home to die. And though all the recollections about it were sad enough, still it felt less strange than the rest, in this dreariness of London. So she proposed going to the "Old Bell," Holborn.

"A capital place!" exclaimed Ascott, eagerly. "And I'll take and settle you there; and we'll order supper, and make a jolly night of it. All right. Drive on, cabby!"

He jumped on the box, and then looked in mischievously, flourishing his lit cigar, and shaking his long hair—his Aunt Selina's two great abominations—right in her indignant face: but withal looking so merry and good-tempered that she shortly softened into a smile.

"How handsome the boy is growing!"

"Yes," said Johanna, with a slight sigh; "and, did you notice? how exceedingly like his—"

The sentence was left unfinished. Alas! if every young man, who believes his faults and follies injure himself alone, could feel what it must be, years afterward, to have his nearest kindred shrink from saying, as the saddest, most ominous thing they could say of his son, that the lad is growing "so like his father!"

It might have been—they assured each other that it was—only the incessant roll, roll of the street sounds below their windows which kept the Misses Leaf awake half the night of this their first night in London. And when they sat down to breakfast—having waited an hour vainly for their nephew—it might have been only the gloom of the little parlor which cast a slight shadow over them all. Still the shadow was there.

It deepened, despite the sunshiny morning into which the last night's rain had brightened, till Holborn Bars looked cheerful, and Holborn pavement actually clean, so that, as Elizabeth said, "you might eat your dinner off it;" which was the one only thing she condescended to approve in London. She had sat all evening mute in her corner, for Miss Leaf would not send her away into the terra incognita of a London hotel. Ascott, at first considerably annoyed at the presence of what he called a "skeleton at the feast," had afterward got over it, and run on with a mixture of childish glee and mannish pomposity about his plans and intentions—how he meant to take a house, he thought, in one of the squares, or a street leading out of them; how he would put up the biggest of brass plates, with "Mr. Leaf, surgeon," and soon get an extensive practice, and have all his aunts to live with him. And his aunts had smiled and listened, forgetting all about the silent figure in the corner, who perhaps had gone to sleep, or had also listened.

"Elizabeth, come and look out at London."

So she and Miss Hilary whiled away another heavy three-quarters of an hour in watching and commenting on the incessantly shifting crowd which swept past Holborn Bars. Miss Selina sometimes looked out too, but more often sat fidgeting and wondering why Ascott did not come; while Miss Leaf, who never fidgeted, became gradually more and more silent. Her eyes were fixed on the door, with an expression which, if Hilary could have remembered so far back, would have been to her something not painfully new, but still more painfully old—a look branded into her face by many an hour's anxious listening for the footstep that never came, or only came to bring distress. It was the ineffaceable token of that long, long struggle between affection and conscience, pity and scarcely repressible contempt, which, for more than one generation, had been the appointed burden of this family—at least the women of it—till sometimes it seemed to hang over them almost like a fate.

About noon Miss Leaf proposed calling for the hotel bill. Its length so alarmed the country ladies that Hilary suggested not staying to dine, but going immediately in search of lodgings.

"What, without a gentleman! Impossible! I always understood ladies could go nowhere in London without a gentleman!"

"We shall come very ill off then, Selina. But any how I mean to try. You know the region where, we have heard, lodgings are cheapest and best—that is, best for us. It can not be far from here. Suppose I start at once?"

"What, alone?" cried Johanna, anxiously.

"No, dear. I'll take the map with me, and Elizabeth. She is not afraid."

Elizabeth smiled, and rose, with that air of dogged devotedness with which she would have prepared to follow Miss Hilary to the North Pole, if necessary. So, after a few minutes of arguing with Selina, who did not press her point overmuch, since she herself had not to commit the impropriety of the expedition. After a few minutes more of hopeless lingering about—till even Miss Leaf said they had better wait no longer—mistress and maid took a farewell nearly as pathetic as if they had been in reality Arctic voyagers, and plunged right into the dusty glare and hurrying crowd of the "sunny side" of Holborn in July.

A strange sensation, and yet there was something exhilarating in it. The intense solitude that there is in a London crowd these country girls—for Miss Hilary herself was no more than a girl—could not as yet realize. They only felt the life of it; stirring, active, incessantly moving life—even though it was of a kind that they knew as little of it as the crowd did of them. Nothing struck Hilary more than the self-absorbed look of passers-by; each so busy on his own affairs, that, in spite of Selina's alarm, for all notice taken of them, they might as well be walking among the cows and horses in Stowbury field.

Poor old Stowbury! They felt how far away they were from it when a ragged, dirty, vicious-looking girl offered them a moss rose-bud for "one penny, only one penny;" which Elizabeth, lagging behind, bought, and found it only a broken-off bud stuck on to a bit of wire.

"That's London ways, I suppose," said she, severely, and became so misanthropic that she would hardly vouchsafe a glance to the handsome square they turned into, and merely observed of the tall houses, taller than any Hilary had ever seen, that she "wouldn't fancy running up and down them stairs."

But Hilary was cheerful in spite of all. She was glad to be in this region, which, theoretically, she knew by heart—glad to find herself in the body, where in the spirit she had come so many a time. The mere consciousness of this seemed to refresh her. She thought she would be much happier in London; that in the long years to come that must be borne, it would be good for her to have something to do as well as to hope for; something to fight with as well as to endure. Now more than ever came pulsing in and out of her memory a line once repeated in her hearing, with an observation of how "true" it was. And though originally it was applied by a man to a woman, and she smiled sometimes to think how "unfeminine" some people—Selina for instance—would consider her turning it the other way, still she did so. She believed, that, for woman as for man, that is the purest and noblest love which is the most self-existent, most independent of love returned; and which can say, each to the other equally on both sides, that the whole solemn purpose of life is, under God's service,

"If not to win, to feel more worthy thee."

Such thoughts made her step firmer and her heart lighter; so that she hardly noticed the distance they must have walked till the close London air began to oppress her, and the smooth glaring London pavements made her Stowbury feet ache sorely.

"Are you tired, Elizabeth? Well, we'll rest soon. There must be lodgings near here. Only I can't quite make out—"

As Miss Hilary looked up to the name of the street the maid noticed what a glow came into her mistress's face, pale and tired as it was. Just then a church clock struck the quarter-hour.

"That must be St. Pancras. And this—yes, this is Burton Street, Burton Crescent."

"I'm sure missis wouldn't like to live there," observed Elizabeth, eying uneasily the gloomy rez-de-chaussée, familiar to many a generation of struggling respectability, where, in the decadence of the season, every second house bore the announcement "apartments furnished."

"No," Miss Hilary replied, absently. Yet she continued to walk up and down the whole length of the street; then passed out into the dreary, deserted-looking Crescent, where the trees were already beginning to fade; not, however, into the bright autumn tint of country woods, but into a premature withering, ugly and sad to behold.

"I am glad he is not here—glad, glad!" thought Hilary, as she realized the unutterable dreariness of those years when Robert Lyon lived and studied in his garret from month's end to month's end—these few dusty trees being the sole memento of the green country life in which he had been brought up, and which she knew he so passionately loved. Now she could understand that "calenture" which he had sometimes jestingly alluded to, as coming upon him at times, when he felt literally sick for the sight of a green field or a hedge full of birds. She wondered whether the same feeling would ever come upon her in this strange desert of London, the vastness of which grew upon her every hour.

She was glad he was away; yes, heart-glad! And yet, if this minute she could only have seen him coming round the Crescent, have met his smile, and the firm, warm clasp of his hand—

For an instant there rose up in her one of those wild, rebellious outcries against fate, when to have to waste years of this brief life of ours in the sort of semi-existence that living is, apart from the treasure of the heart and delight of the eyes, seems so cruelly, cruelly hard!

"Miss Hilary."

She started, and "put herself under lock and key" immediately.

"Miss Hilary; you do look so tired!"

"Do I? Then we will go and sit down in this baker's shop, and get rested and fed. We can not afford to wear ourselves out, you know. We have a great deal to do to-day."

More indeed than she calculated, for they walked up one street and down another, investigating at least twenty lodgings before any appeared which seemed fit for them. Yet some place must be found where Johanna's poor, tired head could rest that night. At last, completely exhausted, with that oppressive exhaustion which seems to crush mind as well as body after a day's wandering in London, Hilary's courage began to ebb. Oh for an arm to lean on, a voice to listen for, a brave heart to come to her side, saying, "Do not be afraid, there are two of us!" And she yearned, with an absolutely sick yearning such as only a woman who now and then feels the utter helplessness of her womanhood can know, for the only arm she cared to lean on, the only voice dear enough to bring her comfort, the only heart that she felt she could trust.

Poor Hilary! And yet why pity her? To her three alternatives could but happen: were Robert Lyon true to her she would be his, entirely and devotedly, to the end of her days; did he forsake her, she would forgive him; should he die, she would be faithful to him eternally. Love of this kind may know anguish, but not the sort of anguish that lesser and weaker loves do. If it is certain of nothing else, it can always be certain of itself.

"Its will is strong:

It suffers; but it can not suffer long."

And even in its utmost pangs is an underlying peace which often approaches to absolute joy.

Hilary roused herself, and bent her mind steadily on lodgings till she discovered one, from the parlor of which you could see the trees of Burton Crescent and hear the sound of Saint Pancras's clock.

"I think we may do here—at least for a while," said she, cheerfully; and then Elizabeth heard her inquiring if an extra bedroom could be had if necessary.

There was only one small attic. "Ascott never could put up with that," said Hilary, half to herself. Then suddenly—"I think I will see Ascott before I decide. Elizabeth, will you go with me, or remain here?"

"I'll go with you if you please, Miss Hilary."

"If you please," sounded not unlike "if I please," and Elizabeth had gloomed over a little. "Is Mr. Ascott to live with us?"

"I suppose so."

No more words were interchanged till they reached Gower Street, when Miss Hilary observed, with evident surprise, what a handsome street it was.

"I must have made some mistake. Still we will find out Mr. Ascott's number, and inquire."

No, there was no mistake. Mr. Ascott Leaf had lodged there for three months, but had given up his rooms that very morning.

"Where had he gone to?"

The servant—a London lodging-house servant all over—didn't know; but she fetched the landlady, who was after the same pattern of the dozen London landladies with whom Hilary had that day made acquaintance, only a little more Cockney, smirking, dirty, and tawdrily fine.

"Yes, Mr. Leaf had gone, and he hadn't left no address. Young college gentlemen often found it convenient to leave no address. P'raps he would if he'd known there would be a young lady a-calling to see him."

"I am Mr. Leaf's aunt," said Hilary, turning as hot as fire.

"Oh, in-deed," was the answer, with civil incredulosity.

But the woman was sharp of perception—as often-cheated London landladies learn to be. After looking keenly at mistress and maid, she changed her tone; nay, even launched out into praises of her late lodger: what a pleasant gentleman he was; what good company he kept, and how he had promised to recommend her apartments to his friends.

"And as for the little some'at of rent, Miss—tell him it makes no matter, he can pay me when he likes. If he don't call soon, p'raps I might make bold to send his trunk and his books over to Mr. Ascott's of—dear me, I forget the number and the square."

Hilary unsuspectingly supplied both.

"Yes, that's it—the old gen'leman as Mr. Leaf went to dine with every other Sunday, a very rich old gentleman, who, he says, is to leave him all his money. Maybe a relation of yours, Miss?"

"No," said Hilary; and adding something about the landlady's hearing from Mr. Leaf very soon, she hurried out of the house, Elizabeth following.

"Won't you be tired if you walk so fast, Miss Hilary?"

Hilary stopped, choking. Helplessly she looked up and down the forlorn, wide, glaring, dusty street; now sinking into the dull shadow of a London afternoon.

"Let us go home!" And at the word a sob burst out—just one passionate pent-up sob. No more. She could not afford to waste strength in crying.

"As you say, Elizabeth, I am getting tired; and that will not do. Let me see; something must be decided." And she stood still, passing her hand over her hot brow and eyes. "I will go back and take the lodgings, leave you there to make all comfortable, and then fetch my sisters from the hotel. But stay first, I have forgotten something."

She returned to the house in Gower Street, and wrote on one of her cards an address—the only permanent address she could think of—that of the city broker who was in the habit of paying them their yearly income of £50.

"If any creditors inquire for Mr. Leaf give them this. His friends may always hear of him at the London University."

"Thank you, ma'am," replied the now civil landlady. "Indeed, I wasn't afraid of the young gentleman giving us the slip. For though he was careless in his bills he was every inch the gentleman. And I wouldn't object to take him in again. Or p'raps you yourself, ma'am, might be a-wanting rooms."

"No, I thank you. Good-morning." And Hilary hurried away.

Not a word did she say to Elizabeth, or Elizabeth to her, till they got into the dull, dingy parlor—henceforth to be their sole apology for "home:" and then she only talked about domestic arrangements—talked fast and eagerly, and tried to escape the affectionate eyes which she knew were so sharp and keen. Only to escape them—not to blind them; she had long ago found out that Elizabeth was too quick-witted for that, especially in any thing that concerned "the family." She felt convinced the girl had heard every syllable that passed at Ascott's lodgings: that she knew all that was to be known, and guessed what was to be feared as well as Hilary herself.

"Elizabeth"—she hesitated long, and doubted whether she should say the thing before she did say it—"remember we are all strangers in London, and family matters are best kept within the family. Do not mention either in writing home, or to any body here about—about—"

She could not name Ascott; she felt so horribly ashamed.

CHAPTER X.

LIVING in lodgings, not temporarily, but permanently, sitting down to make one's only "home" in Mrs. Jones's parlor or Mrs. Smith's first-floor, of which not a stick or a stone that one looks at is one's own, and whence one may be evicted or evade, with a week's notice or a week's rent, any day—this sort of life is natural and even delightful to some people. There are those who, like strawberry-plants, are of such an errant disposition, that grow them where you will, they will soon absorb all the pleasantness of their habitat, and begin casting out runners elsewhere; nay, if not frequently transplanted, would actually wither and die. Of such are the pioneers of society—the emigrants, the tourists, the travelers round the world; and great is the advantage the world derives from them, active, energetic, and impulsive as they are. Unless, indeed, their talent for incessant locomotion degenerates into rootless restlessness, and they remain forever rolling-stones, gathering no moss, and acquiring gradually a smooth, hard surface, which adheres to nothing, and to which nobody dare venture to adhere.

But there are others possessing in a painful degree this said quality of adhesiveness, to whom the smallest change is obnoxious; who like drinking out of a particular cup, and sitting in a particular chair; to whom even a variation in the position of furniture is unpleasant. Of course, this peculiarity has its bad side, and yet it is not in itself mean or ignoble. For is not adhesiveness, faithfulness, constancy—call it what you will—at the root of all citizenship, clanship, and family love? Is it not the same feeling which, granting they remain at all, makes old friendships dearer than any new? Nay, to go to the very sacredest and closest bond, is it not that which makes an old man see to the last in his old wife's faded face the beauty which perhaps nobody ever saw except himself, but which he sees and delights in still, simply because it is familiar and his own?

To people who possess a large share of this rare—shall I say fatal?—characteristic of adhesiveness, living in lodgings is about the saddest life under the sun. Whether some dim foreboding of this fact crossed Elizabeth's mind, as she stood at the window watching for her mistresses' first arrival at "home," it is impossible to say. She could feel, though she was not accustomed to analyze her feelings. But she looked dull and sad. Not cross, even Ascott could not have accused her of "savageness."

And yet she had been somewhat tried. First, in going out what she termed "marketing," she had traversed a waste of streets, got lost several times, and returned with light weight in her butter, and sand in her moist sugar; also with the conviction that London tradesmen were the greatest rogues alive. Secondly, a pottle of strawberries, which she had bought with her own money to grace the tea-table with the only fruit Miss Leaf cared for, had turned out a large delusion, big and beautiful at top, and all below small, crushed, and stale. She had thrown it indignantly, pottle and all, into the kitchen fire.

Thirdly, she had a war with the landlady, partly on the subject of their fire—which, with her Stowbury notions on the subject of coals, seemed wretchedly mean and small—and partly on the question of table-cloths at tea, which Mrs. Jones had "never heard of," especially when the use of plate and linen was included in the rent. And the dinginess of the article produced at last out of an omnium-gatherum sort of kitchen-cupboard, made an ominous impression upon the country girl, accustomed to clean, tidy country ways—where the kitchen was kept as neat as the parlor, and the bedrooms were not a whit behind the sitting-rooms in comfort and orderliness. Here it seemed as if, supposing people could show a few respectable living-rooms, they were content to sleep any where, and cook any how, out of any thing, in the midst of any quantity of confusion and dirt. Elizabeth set all this down as "London," and hated it accordingly.

She had tried to ease her mind by arranging and rearranging the furniture—regular lodging-house furniture—table, six chairs, horse-hair sofa, a what-not, and the chiffonnier, with a tea-caddy upon it, of which the respective keys had been solemnly presented to Miss Hilary. But still the parlor looked homeless and bare; and the yellowish paper on the walls, the large patterned, many-colored Kidderminster on the floor, gave an involuntary sense of discomfort and dreariness. Besides, No. 15 was on the shady side of the street—cheap lodgings always are; and no one who has not lived in the like lodgings—not a house—can imagine what it is to inhabit perpetually one room where the sunshine just peeps in for an hour a day, and vanishes by eleven A.M., leaving behind in winter a chill dampness, and in summer a heavy, dusty atmosphere, that weighs like lead on the spirits in spite of one's self. No wonder that, as is statistically known and proved, cholera stalks, fever rages, and the registrar's list is always swelled, along the shady side of a London street.

Elizabeth felt this, though she had not the dimmest idea why. She stood watching the sunset light fade out of the topmost windows of the opposite house—ghostly reflection of some sunset over fields and trees far away; and she listened to the long monotonous cry melting away round the crescent, and beginning again at the other end of the street—"Straw-berries—straw-ber-ries!" Also, with an eye to to-morrow's Sunday dinner, she investigated the cart of the tired costermonger, who crawled along beside his equally tired donkey, reiterating at times, in tones hoarse with a day's bawling, his dreary "Cauli-flow-er! Cauli-flow-er!—Fine new pease, sixpence peck!"

But, alas! the pease were neither fine nor new; and the cauliflowers were regular Saturday night's cauliflowers. Besides, Elizabeth suddenly doubted whether she had any right, unordered, to buy these things which, from being common garden necessities, had become luxuries. This thought, with some others that it occasioned, her unwonted state of idleness, and the dullness of every thing about her—what is so dull as a "quiet" London street on a summer evening?—actually made Elizabeth stand, motionless and meditative, for a quarter of an hour.

Then she started to hear two cabs drive up to the door; the "family" had at length arrived.

Ascott was there too. Two new portmantaus and a splendid hat-box cast either ignominy or glory upon the poor Stowbury luggage; and—Elizabeth's sharp eyes noticed—there was also his trunk which she had seen lying detained for rent in his Grower Street lodgings. But he looked quite easy and comfortable; handed out his Aunt Johanna, commanded the luggage about, and paid the cabmen with such a magnificent air that they touched their hats to him, and winked at one another as much as to say, "That's a real gentleman!"

In which statement the landlady evidently coincided, and courtesied low, when Miss Leaf introducing him as "my nephew," hoped that a room could be found for him. Which at last there was, by his appropriating Miss Leaf's, while she and Hilary took that at the top of the house. But they agreed, Ascott must have a good airy room to study in.

"You know, my dear boy," said his Aunt Johanna to him—and at her tender tone he looked a little downcast, as when he was a small fellow and had been forgiven something—"you know you will have to work very hard."

"All right, aunt! I'm your man for that! This will be a jolly room; and I can smoke up the chimney capitally."

So they came down stairs quite cheerfully, and Ascott applied himself with the best of appetites to what he called a "hungry" tea. True, the ham, which Elizabeth had to fetch from an eating-house some streets off, cost two shillings a pound, and the eggs, which caused her another war below over the relighting of a fire to boil them, were dismissed by the young gentleman as "horrid stale." Still, woman-like, when there is a man in the question, his aunts let him have his way. It seemed as if they had resolved to try their utmost to make the new home to which he came, or rather was driven, a pleasant home, and to bind him to it with cords of love, the only cords worth any thing, though sometimes—Heaven knows why—even they fail, and are snapped and thrown aside like straws.

Whenever Elizabeth went in and out of the parlor she always heard lively talk going on among the family: Ascott making his jokes, telling about his college life, and planning his life to come, as a surgeon in full practice, on the most extensive scale. And when she brought in the chamber candles, she saw him kiss his aunts affectionately, and even help his Aunt Johanna—who looked frightfully pale and tired, but smiling still—to her bedroom door.

"You'll not sit up long, my dear? No reading to-night?" said she, anxiously.

"Not a bit of it. And I'll be up with the lark to-morrow morning. I really will, auntie. I'm going to turn over a new leaf, you know."

She smiled again at the immemorial joke, kissed and blessed him, and the door shut upon her and Hilary.

Ascott descended to the parlor, threw himself on the sofa with an air of great relief, and an exclamation of satisfaction that "the women" were all gone. He did not perceive Elizabeth, who, hidden behind, was kneeling to arrange something in the chiffonnier, till she rose up and proceeded to fasten the parlor shutters.

"Hollo! are you there? Come, I'll do that when I go to bed. You may 'slope,' if you like."

"Eh, Sir?"

"Slope, mizzle, cut your stick; don't you understand? Any how, don't stop here bothering me."

"I don't mean to," replied Elizabeth; gravely, rather than gruffly, as if she had made up her mind to things as they were, and was determined to be a belligerent party no longer. Besides, she was older now—too old to have things forgiven to her that might be overlooked in a child; and she had received a long lecture from Miss Hilary on the necessity of showing respect to Mr. Ascott, or Mr. Leaf, as it was now decided he was to be called, in his dignity and responsibility as the only masculine head of the family.

As he lay and lounged there, with his eyes lazily shut, Elizabeth stood a minute gazing at him. Then, steadfast in her new good behavior, she inquired "if he wanted any thing more to-night?"

"Confound you! no! Yes; stop." And the young man took a furtive investigation of the plain, honest face, and not over-graceful, ultra-provincial figure, which still characterized his aunt's "South-Sea Islander."

"I say, Elizabeth, I want you to do something for me." He spoke so civilly, almost coaxingly, that Elizabeth turned round surprised. "Would you just go and ask the landlady if she has got such a thing as a latch-key?"

"A what, Sir?"

"A latch-key—a—oh, she knows. Every London house has it. Tell her I'll take care of it, and lock the front-door all right. She needn't be afraid of thieves."

"Very well, Sir."

Elizabeth went, but shortly reappeared with the information that Mrs. Jones had gone to bed: in the kitchen, she supposed, as she could not get in. But she laid on the table the large street-door key.

"Perhaps that's what you wanted, Mr. Leaf. Though I think you needn't be the least afraid of robbers, for there's three bolts, and a chain besides."

"All right!" cried Ascott, smothering down a laugh. "Thank you! That's for you," throwing a half-crown across the table.

Elizabeth took it up demurely, and put it down again. Perhaps she did not like him enough to receive presents from him; perhaps she thought, being an honest-minded girl, that a young man who could not pay his rent had no business to be giving away half-crowns; or else she herself had not been so much as many servants are, in the habit of taking them. For Miss Hilary had put into Elizabeth some of her own feeling as to this habit of paying an inferior with money for any little civility or kindness which, from an equal, would be accepted simply as kindness, and only requited with thanks. Any how, the coin remained on the table, and the door was just shutting upon Elizabeth, when the young gentleman turned round again.

"I say, since my aunts are so horribly timid of robbers and such like, you'd better not tell them any thing about the latch-key."

Elizabeth stood a minute perplexed, and then replied briefly: "Miss Hilary isn't a bit timid; and I always tells Miss Hilary every thing."

Nevertheless, though she was so ignorant as never to have heard of a latch-key, she had the wit to see that all was not right. She even lay awake, in her closet off Miss Leaf's room, whence she could hear the murmur of her two mistresses talking together, long after they retired—lay broad awake for an hour or more, trying to put things together—the sad things that she felt certain must have happened that day, and wondering what Mr. Ascott could possibly want with the key. Also, why he had asked her about it, instead of telling his aunts at once; and why he had treated her in the matter with such astonishing civility.

It may be said, a servant had no business to think about these things, to criticise her young master's proceedings, or wonder why her mistresses were sad: that she had only to go about her work like an automaton, and take no interest in any thing. I can only answer to those who like such service, let them have it; and as they sow they will assuredly reap.

But long after Elizabeth, young and hearty, was soundly snoring on her hard, cramped bed, Johanna and Hilary Leaf, after a brief mutual pretense of sleep, soon discovered by both, lay consulting together over ways and means. How could the family expenses, beginning with twenty-five shillings per week as rent, possibly be met by the only actual certain family income, their £50 per annum from a mortgage? For the Misses Leaf were of that old-fashioned stamp which believed that to reckon an income by mere probabilities is either insanity or dishonesty.

Common arithmetic soon proved that this £50 a year could not maintain them; in fact they must soon draw on the little sum—already dipped into to-day, for Ascott—which had been produced by the sale of the Stowbury furniture. That sale, they now found, had been a mistake; and they half feared whether the whole change from Stowbury to London had not been a mistake—one of those sad errors in judgment which we all commit sometimes, and have to abide by, and make the best of, and learn from if we can. Happy those to whom "Dinna greet ower spilt milk"—a proverb wise as cheerful, which Hilary, knowing well who it came from, repeated to Johanna to comfort her—teaches a second brave lesson, how to avoid spilling the milk a second time.

And then they consulted anxiously about what was to be done to earn money.

Teaching presented itself as the only resource. In those days women's work and women's rights had not been discussed so freely as at present. There was a strong feeling that the principal thing required was our duties—owed to ourselves, our home, our family and friends. There was a deep conviction—now, alas! slowly disappearing—that a woman, single or married, should never throw herself out of the safe circle of domestic life till the last extremity of necessity; that it is wiser to keep or help to keep a home, by learning how to expend its income, cook its dinners, make and mend its clothes, and, by the law that “prevention is better than cure,” studying all those preservative means of holding a family together—as women, and women alone, can—than to dash into men’s sphere of trades and professions, thereby, in most instances, fighting an unequal battle, and coming out of it maimed, broken, unsexed; turned into beings that are neither men nor women, with the faults and corresponding sufferings of both, and the compensations of neither.

“I don’t see,” said poor Hilary, “what I can do but teach. And oh, if I could only get daily pupils, so that I might come home of nights, and creep into the fireside; and have time to mend the stockings and look after Ascott’s linen, so that he need not be so awfully extravagant!”

“It is Ascott who ought to earn the family income, and have his aunt to keep house for him,” observed Johanna. “That was the way in my time, and I believe it is the right way. The man ought to go out into the world and earn the money; the woman ought to stay at home and wisely expend it.”

“And yet that way is not always possible. We know, of ourselves, instances where it was not.”

“Ah, yes!” assented Johanna, sighing. For she, far more than Hilary, viewed the family circumstances in the light of its past history—a light too sad almost to bear looking at. “But in ours, as in most similar cases, was something not right, something which forced men and women out of their natural places. It is a thing that may be sometimes a mournful, inevitable necessity; but I never can believe it a right thing, or a thing to be voluntarily imitated, that women should go knocking about the world like men—and—”

“And I am not meaning to do any such thing,” said Hilary, half laughing. “I am only going to try every rational means of earning a little money to keep the family going till such time as Ascott can decide on his future, and find a suitable opportunity for establishing himself in practice. In some of the new neighborhoods about London he says he has a capital chance; he will immediately set about inquiries. A good idea, don’t you think?”

“Yes,” said Johanna, briefly. But they did not discuss this as they had discussed their own plans; and, it was noticeable, they never even referred to, as a portion of the family finances, that pound a week which, with many regrets that it was so small, Ascott had insisted on paying to his aunts as his contribution to the expenses of the household.

And now the dawn was beginning to break, and the lively London sparrows to chirp in the chimneys. So Hilary insisted on their talking no more, but going to sleep like Christians.

“Very well. Good-night, my blessing!” said Johanna, softly. And perhaps indeed her “blessing,” with that strange, bright courage of her own—years after, when Hilary looked back upon her old self, how utterly mad this courage seemed!—had taken the weight of care from the elder and feebler heart, so that Johanna turned round and soon slept.

But long after, till the dawn melted into perfect daylight, did Hilary lie, open-eyed, listening to quarter after quarter of the loud St. Pancras clock. Brave she was, this little woman, fully as brave and cheerful-hearted as, for Johanna’s sake, she made herself out to be; and now that the paralyzed monotony of her Stowbury life was gone, and that she was in the midst of the whirl of London, where he used to work and struggle, she felt doubly bright and brave. The sense of resistance, of dogged perseverance, of “fighting it out” to the last, was strong in her, stronger than in most women, or else it was the reflection in her own of that nature which was her ideal of every thing great and good.

“No,” she said to herself, after thinking over for the hundredth time every difficulty that lay before them all—meeting and looking in the face every wild beast in the way, even that terrible beast which, happily, had often approached but never yet visited the Leaf family, “the wolf at the door”—“No, I don’t think I am afraid. I think I shall never be afraid of any thing in this world, if only—only—”

“If only he loves me.” That was it, which broke off, unspoken; the helpless woman’s cry—the cruel craving for the one deepest want of a woman’s life—deeper than the same want in man’s, or in most men’s, because it is more individual—not “if only I am loved,” but “if only he loves me.” And as Hilary resolutely shut her eyes, and forced her aching head into total stillness, sharper than ever, as always was the case when she felt weary, mentally or physically, came her longing for the hand to cling to, the breast to lean against—the heart at once strong and tender, which even the bravest woman feels at times she piteously needs. A heart which can comfort and uphold her, with the strength not of another woman like herself, but of a man, encouraging her, as perhaps her very weakness encourages him, to “fight it out,” the sore battle of life, a little longer. But this support, in any shape, from any man, the women of the Leaf family had never known.

The nearest approach to it were those letters from India, which had become, Johanna sometimes jestingly said, a family institution. For they were family letters; there was no mystery about them; they were passed from one to the other, and commented on in perfect freedom, so freely, indeed, that Selina had never penetrated into the secret of them at all. But their punctuality, their faithful remembrance of the smallest things concerning the past, their strong interest in any thing and every thing belonging to the present of these his old friends, were to the other two sisters confirmation enough as to how they might believe in Robert Lyon.

Hilary did believe, and in her perfect trust was perfect rest. Whether he ever married her or not, she felt sure—surer and surer every day—that to her had been sent that best blessing—the lot of so few women—a thoroughly good man to love her, and to love.

So with his face in her memory, and the sound of his voice in her ear, as distinctly as if it had been only yesterday that he said, "You must trust me, Hilary," she whispered to herself, "I do, Robert, I do!" and went to sleep peacefully as a child.

CHAPTER XI.

WITH a sublime indifference to popular superstition, or rather because they did not think of it till all their arrangements were completed, the Misses Leaf had accomplished their grand Hegira on a Friday. Consequently, their first day at No. 15 was Sunday.

Sunday in London always strikes a provincial person considerably. It has two such distinct sides. First, the eminently respectable, decorous, religious side, which Hilary and Selina observed, when, about eleven A.M., they joined the stream of well-dressed, well-to-do-looking people, solitary or in families, who poured forth from handsome houses in streets or squares, to form the crowded congregation of St. Pancras's Church. The opposite side Hilary also saw, when Ascott, who, in spite of his declaration, had not risen in time for breakfast, penitently coaxed his "pretty aunt" to let him take her to the afternoon service in Westminster Abbey. They wended their way through Tottenham Court Road, Oxford Street, Regent Street, and across the Park, finding shops open, or half-open, vehicles plying, and people streaming down each side of the streets.

Hilary did not quite like it, and yet her heart was tender over the poor, hardworked-looking Cockneys, who seemed so excessively to enjoy their Sunday stroll, their Sunday mouthful of fresh air; or the small Sunday treat their sickly, under-sized children had in lying on the grass, and feeding the ducks in St. James's Park.

She tried to talk the matter out with Ascott, but though he listened politely for a minute or two, he evidently took no interest in such things. Nor did he even in the grand old Abbey, with its tree-like, arched avenues of immemorial stone, its painted windows, through which the colored sunshine made a sort of heavenly mist of light, and its innumerable graves of generations below. Hilary woke from her trance of solemn delight to find her nephew amusing himself with staring at the people about him, making sotto voce quizzical remarks upon them, in the intervals of the service, and, finally, the instant it was ended, starting up in extreme satisfaction, evidently feeling that he had done his duty, and that it had been, to use his own phrase, "a confounded bore."

Yet he meant to be kind to his pretty aunt—told her he liked to walk with her, because she was so pretty, praised her dress, so neat and tasteful, though a little old-fashioned. But he would soon alter that, he said; he would dress all his aunts in silk and satin, and give them a carriage to ride in; there should be no end to their honor and prosperity. Nay, coming home, he took her a long way round—or she thought so, being tired—to show her the sort of house he meant to have. Very grand it seemed to her Stowbury eyes, with pillars and a flight of steps up to the door—more fit, she ventured to suggest, for a retired merchant than a struggling young surgeon.

"Oh, but we dare not show the struggle, or nobody would ever trust us," said Ascott, with a knowing look. "Bless you, many a young fellow sets up a house, and even a carriage, on tick, and drives and drives about till he drives himself into a practice. The world's all a make-believe, and you must meet humbug with humbug. That's the way, I assure you, Aunt Hilary."

Aunt Hilary fixed her honest eyes on the lad's face—the lad, so little younger than herself, and yet who at times, when he let out sayings such as this, seemed so awfully, so pitifully old; and she felt thankful that, at all risks and costs, they had come to London to be beside him, to help him, to save him, if he needed saving, as women only can. For, after all, he was but a boy. And though, as he walked by her side, stalwart and manly, the thought smote her painfully that many a young fellow of his age was the stay and bread-winner of some widowed mother or sister, nay, even of wife and child, still she repeated, cheerfully, "What can one expect from him? He is only a boy."

God help the women who, for those belonging to them—husbands, fathers, brothers, lovers, sons—have ever so tenderly to apologize.

When they came in sight of St. Pancras's Church, Ascott said, suddenly, "I think you'll know your way now, Aunt Hilary."

"Certainly. Why?"

"Because—you wouldn't be vexed if I left you? I have an engagement—some fellows that I dine with, out at Hampstead or Richmond, or Blackwall, every Sunday. Nothing wicked, I assure you. And you know it's capital for one's health to get a Sunday in fresh air."

"Yes; but Aunt Johanna will be sorry to miss you."

"Will she? Oh, you'll smooth her down. Stay! Tell her I shall be back to tea."

"We shall be having tea directly."

"I declare I had quite forgotten. Aunt Hilary, you must change your hours. They don't suit me at all. No men can ever stand early dinners. By, by! You are the very prettiest auntie. Be sure you get home safe. Hollo, there! That's my omnibus."

He jumped on the top of it, and was off.

Aunt Hilary stood, quite confounded, and with one of those strange sinkings of the heart which had come over her several times this day. It was not that Ascott showed any unkindness—that there was any actual badness in his bright and handsome young face. Still there was a want there—want of earnestness, steadfastness, truthfulness, a something more discoverable as the lack of something else than as aught in itself tangibly and perceptibly wrong. It made her sad; it caused her to look forward to his future with an anxious heart. It was so different from the kind of anxiety, and yet settled repose, with which she thought of the only other man in whose future she felt the smallest interest. Of Robert Lyon she was certain that whatever misfortune visited him he would bear it in the best way it could be borne; whatever temptation assailed him he would fight against it, as a brave and good Christian should fight. But Ascott?

Ascott's life was as yet an unanswered query. She could but leave it in Omnipotent hands.

So she found her way home, asking it once or twice of civil policemen, and going a little distance round—dare I make this romantic confession about so sensible and practical a little woman?—that she might walk once up Burton Street and down again. But nobody knew the fact, and it did nobody any harm.

Meantime at No. 15 the afternoon had passed heavily enough. Miss Selina had gone to lie down—she always did of Sundays, and Elizabeth, after making her comfortable, by the little attentions the lady always required, had descended to the dreary wash-house, which had been appropriated to herself, under the name of a “private kitchen,” in the which, after all the cleanings and improvements she could achieve, she sat like Marius among the ruins of Carthage, and sighed for the tidy bright house-place at Stowbury. Already, from her brief experience, she had decided that London people were horrid shams, because they did not in the least care to have their kitchens comfortable. She wondered how she should ever exist in this one, and might have carried her sad and sullen face up stairs, if Miss Leaf had not come down stairs, and glancing about, with that ever-gentle smile of hers, said kindly, “Well, it is not very pleasant, but you have made the best of it, Elizabeth. We must all put up with something, you know. Now, as my eyes are not very good to-day, suppose you come up and read me a chapter.”

So, in the quiet parlor, the maid sat down opposite her mistress, and read aloud out of that Book which says distinctly:

“Servants, be obedient to them that are your masters according to the flesh, with fear and trembling, in singleness of heart, as unto Christ: knowing, that whatsoever good thing any man doeth, the same shall he receive of the Lord, whether he be bond or free.”

And yet says immediately after:

forbearing threatening: knowing that your Master also is in heaven; neither is there respect of persons with him.”

And I think that Master whom Paul served, not in preaching only, but also in practice, when he sent back the slave Onesimus to Philemon, praying that he might be received, “not now as a servant, but above a servant, a brother beloved,” that Divine Master must have looked tenderly upon these two women—both women, though of such different age and position, and taught them through His Spirit in His word, as only He can teach.

The reading was disturbed by a carriage driving up to the door, and a knock, a tremendously grand and forcible footman's knock, which made Miss Leaf start in her easy-chair.

It was a visitor, however; though by what ingenuity he found them out remained, when they came to think of it, a great puzzle. A card was sent in by the dirty servant of Mrs. Jones, speedily followed by a stout, bald-headed, round-faced man—I suppose I ought to write, “gentleman”—in whom, though she had not seen him for years, Miss Leaf found no difficulty in recognizing the grocer's 'prentice boy, now Mr. Peter Ascott, of Russell Square.

She rose to receive him: there was always a stateliness in Miss Leaf's reception of strangers; a slight formality belonging to her own past generation, and to the time when the Leafs were a “county family.” Perhaps this extra dignity, graceful as it was, overpowered the little man; or else, being a bachelor, he was unaccustomed to ladies' society: but he grew red in the face, twiddled his hat, and then cast a sharp inquisitive glance toward her.

“I am the eldest Miss Leaf, and very glad to have an opportunity of thanking you for your long kindness to my nephew. Elizabeth, give Mr. Ascott a chair.”

While doing so, and before her disappearance, Elizabeth took a rapid observation of the visitor, whose name and history were perfectly familiar to her. Most small towns have their hero, and Stowbury's was Peter Ascott, the grocer's boy, the little fellow who had gone up to London to seek his fortune, and had, strange to say, found it. Whether by industry or luck—except that industry is luck, and luck is only another word for industry—he had gradually risen to be a large city merchant, a drysalter I conclude it would be called, with a handsome house, carriage, etc. He had never revisited his native place, which indeed could not be expected of him, as he had no relations, but, when asked, as was not seldom of course, he subscribed liberally to its charities.

Altogether he was a decided hero in the place, and though people really knew very little about him, the less they knew the more they gossiped, holding him up to the rising generation as a modern Dick Whittington, and reverencing him extremely as one who had shed glory on his native town. Even Elizabeth had conceived a great idea of Mr. Ascott. When she saw this little fat man, coarse and common-looking in spite of his good clothes and diamond ring, and in manner a curious mixture of pomposity and awkwardness, she laughed to herself, thinking what a very uninteresting individual it was about whom Stowbury had told so many interesting stories.

However, she went up to inform Miss Selina, and prevent her making her appearance before him in the usual Sunday dishabille in which she indulged when no visitors were expected.

After the first awkwardness, Mr. Peter Ascott became quite at his ease with Miss Leaf. He began to talk—not of Stowbury, that was tacitly ignored by both—but of London, and then of “my house in Russell Square,” “my carriage,” “my servants”—the inconvenience of keeping coachmen who would drink, and footmen who would not clean the plate properly; ending by what was a favorite moral axiom of his, that “wealth and position are heavy responsibilities.”

He himself seemed, however, not to have been quite overwhelmed by them; he was fat and flourishing—with an acuteness and power in the upper half of his face which accounted for his having attained his present position. The lower half—somehow Miss Leaf did not like it, she hardly knew why, though a physiognomist might have known. For Peter Ascott had the underhanging, obstinate, sensual lip, the large throat—bull-necked, as it has been called—indications of that essentially animal nature which may be born with the nobleman as with the clown; which no education can refine, and no talent, though it may co-exist with it, can ever entirely remove. He reminded one, perforce, of the rough old proverb: “You can’t make a silk purse out of a sow’s ear.”

Still, Mr. Ascott was not a bad man, though something deeper than his glorious indifference to grammar, and his dropped h’s—which, to steal some one’s joke, might have been swept up in bushels from Miss Leaf’s parlor—made it impossible for him ever to be, by any culture whatever, a gentleman.

They talked of Ascott, as being the most convenient mutual subject; and Miss Leaf expressed the gratitude which her nephew felt, and she earnestly hoped would ever show, toward his kind godfather.

Mr. Ascott looked pleased.

“Um—yes, Ascott’s not a bad fellow—believe he means well: but weak, ma’am, I’m afraid he’s weak. Knows nothing of business—has no business habits whatever. However, we must make the best of him; I don’t repent any thing I’ve done for him.”

“I hope not,” said Miss Leaf, gravely.

And then there ensued an uncomfortable pause, which was happily broken by the opening of the door, and the sweeping in of a large, goodly figure.

“My sister, Mr. Ascott; my sister Selina.”

The little stout man actually started, and, as he bowed, blushed up to the eyes.

Miss Selina was, as I have stated, the beauty of the family, and had once been an acknowledged Stowbury belle. Even now, though nigh upon forty, when carefully and becomingly dressed, her tall figure, and her well-featured, fair-complexioned, unwrinkled face, made her still appear a very personable woman. At any rate, she was not faded enough, nor the city magnate’s heart cold enough, to prevent a sudden revival of the vision which—in what now seemed an almost antediluvian stage of existence—had dazzled, Sunday after Sunday, the eyes of the grocer’s lad. If there is one pure spot in a man’s heart—even the very worldliest of men—it is usually his boyish first love.

So Peter Ascott looked hard at Miss Selina, then into his hat, then, as good luck would have it, out of the window, where he caught sight of his carriage and horses. These revived his spirits, and made him recognize what he was—Mr. Ascott of Russell Square, addressing himself in the character of a benevolent patron to the fallen Leaf family.

“Glad to see you, Miss. Long time since we met—neither of us so young as we have been—but you do wear well, I must say.”

Miss Selina drew back; she was within an inch of being highly offended, when she too happened to catch a glimpse of the carriage and horses. So she sat down and entered into conversation with him; and when she liked, nobody could be more polite and agreeable than Miss Selina.

So it happened that the handsome equipage crawled round and round the Crescent, or stood pawing the silent Sunday street before No. 15, for very nearly an hour, even till Hilary came home.

It was vexatious to have to make excuses for Ascott; particularly as his godfather said with a laugh, that “young fellows would be young fellows,” they needn’t expect to see the lad till midnight, or till to-morrow morning.

But though in this, and other things, he somewhat annoyed the ladies from Stowbury, no one could say he was not civil to them—exceedingly civil. He offered them Botanical Garden tickets—Zoological Garden tickets; he even, after some meditation and knitting of his shaggy gray eyebrows, bolted out with an invitation for the whole family to dinner at Russell Square the following Sunday.

“I always give my dinners on Sunday. I’ve no time any other day,” said he, when Miss Leaf gently hesitated. “Come or not, just as you like.”

Miss Selina, to whom the remark was chiefly addressed, bowed the most gracious acceptance.

The visitor took very little notice of Miss Hilary. Probably, if asked, he would have described her as a small, shabbily-dressed person, looking very like a governess. Indeed, the fact of her governess-ship seemed suddenly to recur to him; he asked her if she meant to set up another school, and being informed that she rather wished private pupils, promised largely that she should have the full benefit of his "patronage" among his friends. Then he departed, leaving a message for Ascott to call next day, as he wished to speak to him.

"For you must be aware, Miss Leaf, that though your nephew's allowance is nothing—a mere drop in the bucket out of my large income—still, when it comes year after year, and no chance of his shifting for himself, the most benevolent man in the world feels inclined to stop the supplies. Not that I shall do that—at least not immediately: he is a fine young fellow, whom I'm rather proud to have helped a step up the ladder, and I've a great respect"—here he bowed to Miss Selina—"a great respect for your family. Still there must come a time when I shall be obliged to shut up my purse-strings. You understand, ma'am."

"I do," Miss Leaf answered, trying to speak with dignity, and yet patience, for she saw Hilary's face beginning to flame. "And I trust, Mr. Ascott, my nephew will soon cease to be an expense to you. It was your own voluntary kindness that brought it upon yourself, and I hope you have not found, never will find, either him or us ungrateful."

"Oh, as to that, ma'am, I don't look for gratitude. Still, if Ascott does work his way into a good position—and he'll be the first of his family that ever did, I reckon—but I beg your pardon, Miss Leaf. Ladies, I'll bid you good-day. Will your servant call my carriage?"

The instant he was gone Hilary burst forth—

"If I were Ascott, I'd rather starve in a garret, break stones in the high-road, or buy a broom and sweep a crossing, than I'd be dependent on this man, this pompous, purse-proud, illiterate fool!"

"No, not a fool," reproved Johanna. "An acute, clear-headed, nor, I think, bad-hearted man. Coarse and common, certainly; but if we were to hate every thing coarse or common, we should find plenty to hate. Besides, though he does his kindness in an unpleasant way, think how very, very kind he has been to Ascott."

"Johanna, I think you would find a good word for the de'il himself, as we used to say," cried Hilary, laughing. "Well, Selina; and what is your opinion of our stout friend?"

Miss Selina, bridling a little, declared that she did not see so much to complain of in Mr. Ascott. He was not educated certainly, but he was a most respectable person. And his calling upon them so soon was most civil and attentive. She thought, considering his present position, they should forget—indeed, as Christians they were bound to forget—that he was once their grocer's boy, and go to dine with him next Sunday.

"For my part, I shall go, though it is Sunday. I consider it quite a religious duty—my duty toward my neighbor."

"Which is to love him as yourself. I am sure, Selina, I have no objection. It would be a grand romantic wind-up to the story which Stowbury used to tell—of how the 'prentice-boy stared his eyes out at the beautiful young lady; and you would get the advantage of 'my house in Russell Square,' 'my carriage and servants,' and be able to elevate your whole family. Do, now! set your cap at Peter Ascott."

Here Hilary, breaking out into one of her childish fits of irrepressible laughter, was startled to see Selina's face in one blaze of indignation.

"Hold your tongue, you silly chit, and don't chatter about things you don't understand."

And she swept majestically from the room.

"What have I done? Why, she is really vexed. If I had thought she would have taken it in earnest I would never have said a word. Who would have thought it!"

But Miss Selina's fits of annoyance were so common that the sisters rarely troubled themselves long on the matter. And when at tea-time she came down in the best of spirits, they met her half-way, as they always did, thankful for these brief calms in the family atmosphere, which never lasted too long.

It was a somewhat heavy evening. They waited supper till after ten; and yet Ascott did not appear. Miss Leaf read the chapter as usual; and Elizabeth was sent to bed, but still no sign of the absentee.

"I will sit up for him. He can not be many minutes now," said his Aunt Hilary, and settled herself in the solitary parlor, which one candle and no fire made as cheerless as could possibly be.

There she waited till midnight before the young man came in. Perhaps he was struck with compunction by her weary white face—by her silent lighting of his candle, for he made her a thousand apologies.

"Pon my honor, Aunt Hilary, I'll never keep you up so late again. Poor dear auntie, how tired she looks!" and he kissed her affectionately. "But if you were a young fellow, and got among other young fellows, and they over-persuaded you."

"You should learn to say, No."

"Ah"—with a sigh—"so I ought, if I were as good as my Aunt Hilary."

BURR'S CONSPIRACY.

ABOUT sixty years ago there was a pleasant mansion upon an eminence that overlooked the Hudson, with a few acres of cultivated land around it sloping to the brink of the river, and all within the immediate suburbs of New York. The owner of that beautiful seat was a small, fair-complexioned, brilliant-eyed, fascinating man, eight-and-forty years of age. He had seen some service in the old War for Independence. He was a wit, a beau, a good scholar, a polished gentleman, an unscrupulous politician, a libertine in morals, and a heartless marauder on the domain of social life. He was also the Vice-President of the United States.

Ambition was the god of his idolatry. His daughter and her child were the only objects of his pure love except himself; and Fame and Fortune were the spirits to whom he committed himself as to guardian angels. That suburban country seat was Richmond Hill, and that proprietor was Aaron Burr.

On the morning of the 11th of July, 1804, Aaron Burr murdered Alexander Hamilton in a duel, brought about by the combined agencies of political malice and private revenge. It was not justified by the requirements of the so-called Code of Honor. It was a cold-blooded murder; and ten days afterward the assassin was a fugitive, the States of New York and New Jersey being his accusers in the form of indictments for murder, while the execrations of all good men were ringing in his ears. He fled from the presence of an impending prison and scaffold, in an open boat and under the cover of night, from the foot of the river slope of Richmond Hill. He first found shelter with Commodore Truxtun, at Perth Amboy; and then fled in disguise to Philadelphia, where he renewed proposals of marriage to a young lady. There, too, with a hand red with the blood of his victim and a heart as icy as an Alpine crest, he wrote in jesting mood to his daughter—"If any male friend of yours should be dying of ennui, recommend him to engage in a duel and a courtship at the same time."

Burr heeded the warnings of the surges of public indignation that were rising higher and higher around him, and he left Philadelphia stealthily, and fled by sea to an island on the coast of Georgia, where personal and political friends received him with open arms. There men and women bowed obsequiously to the Vice-President of the United States, and felt proud of the privilege; and society, accustomed to the duello, transmuted—by the subtle alchemy of opinion—a branded fugitive from justice into an exiled hero. A planter's fine mansion was made his own; he was serenaded by a band of music, was courted by the wealthy, caressed by the fair, and almost worshiped by the young; and when a month of festivities had passed away, he departed for the home of his daughter in South Carolina, under whose roof he was as secure from the grasp of Northern laws, and the frowns of Northern sentiment, as if he had been in China or on belted Jupiter.

Ten days the fugitive tarried with his daughter, who, with her husband, believed in and loved him. Then he started on a long and weary journey by land, Northward, to take his place at the head of the Senate of the United States, by virtue of his office. In Virginia he was surprised by ovations. He was greeted with every demonstration of partisan zeal as "the slayer of the arch-enemy of Democracy." Fifty or sixty citizens of Petersburg sat down with him to a public dinner given in his honor, and twenty of them accompanied him to the theatre, where the audience arose at his entrance and welcomed him with cheers.

Among the officials and "the best society" at the National Capital Burr was treated with more than ordinary respect. The President's attentions were more pointed and cordial than usual. The Secretary of State took him out in his carriage. The Secretary of the Treasury frequently called upon him at his lodgings; and a leading partisan in the Lower House of Congress, from Maryland, said, in debate, "The first duel I ever read of was that of David killing Goliath. Our little David of the Republicans has killed the Goliath of Federalism, and for this I am willing to reward him." These things filled many virtuous men with ineffable disgust. "This"—wrote a Senator from New Hampshire, on the 7th of November—"This is the first time, I believe, that ever a Vice-President appeared in the Senate on the first day of the session; certainly the first (God grant it may be the last!) that ever a man indicted for murder presided in the American Senate."

That session of Congress was the last scene of Burr's political career. On the 4th of March, 1805, he descended from the step of official honor next to the highest in the land a ruined man—ruined in fortune, honor, and the respect of his countrymen. During all that session that deep, dark gulf, impassable and inexorable, lay before him. His ambition was as fierce and uncompromising as ever. His hope, sustained by an indomitable will, never failed him. Conscious that every avenue to a retrieval of his fortunes was forever shut, he turned his thoughts to new regions for action, toil, and triumph. With a boldness equaled only by his wickedness, he formed plans magnificent in proportions and brilliant in promised results. Notwithstanding his native and adopted States were closed against him by the stern ministers of justice, he lost none of his buoyancy of spirits; and he wrote to his son-in-law, saying, "In New York I am to be disfranchised, and in New Jersey hanged. Having substantial objections to both, I shall not, for the present, hazard either, but shall seek another country." Where? Its boundaries were not on maps. Its outlines were floating in his fancy. Its government was fashioned by his imagination. It was a country of which he was to be the political creator.

Louisiana, then a vast and undefined region in the immense basin of the Mississippi and its tributaries, was purchased of France by the United States in 1803. At the close of that year the American flag was first unfurled over the city of New Orleans, as an emblem of sovereignty, where it floated undisturbed until 1861, when it was laid aside for a while during the passage of a violent hurricane of disloyalty to the Government it represented, that swept over the Gulf States and the neighboring provinces with destructive energy. That flag proclaimed the freedom of the navigation of the Mississippi to the long-dissatisfied dwellers westward of the Appalachian and Alleghany ranges of lofty hills. For many years they had been agitated by hatred and jealousy of the Spaniards who held the mouth of the Great River, and exacted tribute of all voyagers upon it; and by disaffection toward the Government of the United States, which they accused of neglect in not opening that great aqueous highway for their produce, either by means of diplomacy or cannon.

Toward that country of uneasy people, in whose behalf his voice had ever been heard, Burr looked for a new field where his ambition might blossom anew, and bear abundant fruits of wealth and honor. Thitherward he directed his steps in the spring of 1805.

What were Burr's political schemes at that time will forever remain a sealed mystery. That he had political schemes, crude it may be, but positive, the student of contemporary history can not doubt. One of his oldest and most intimate friends was General James Wilkinson, his companion-in-arms in the Revolution. He was then General-in-Chief of the armies of the United States, and had been recently appointed Governor of Louisiana—an appointment procured through the influence of Burr. Wilkinson was a weak, vain man; poor, proud, and intemperate; of easy virtue, and eminently fitted to be the pliant, working instrument of conspirators. Ten years before, while wearing the epaulets of an officer of his country's army, and honored with its confidence, he had secretly intrigued with the Spanish authorities at New Orleans in a scheme of disunion, and had furnished the Spanish Viceroy with a list of leading Virginians in Kentucky who were disaffected to the Government, and who, he thought, would, like himself, engage in a conspiracy to separate the Western States and Territories from the Union for a pecuniary consideration. For a long time he and Burr had corresponded, frequently in cipher, so that the contents of their letters might not be known to a third party if discovered. During the winter and early spring of 1805 they had many long consultations at the National Capital; and no doubt the General-in-Chief was then admitted to an audience in Burr's heart of hearts, as far as the arch-conspirator's prudence would allow. This man played an important part in the little drama we are considering.

Burr went over the Alleghany Mountains on horseback, from Philadelphia to Pittsburg, in April, and late in that month he was floating down the Ohio in a huge flat-boat. The river was swollen and flowing rapidly, and he was soon far away toward the mysterious West. He had told his friends in Washington and Philadelphia that land speculations and other business operations led him to the Mississippi Valley, where he intended to settle, and in the midst of a fresh and sturdy population rear for himself another and more splendid structure of wealth and fame.

Down the beautiful Ohio he glided in his rude barge—swiftly but almost noiselessly. He passed Wheeling on the 3d of May, and two days afterward he was at Marietta, where he enjoyed the hospitalities of the leading inhabitants. He was a fast traveler, and made short haltings. His vessel was soon again upon the tide, but it was not long unmoored. Just below Marietta is a charming island of three hundred acres of fertile soil. There an Irish gentleman, with a beautiful and accomplished wife, had spent, during eight years, a considerable fortune in preparing a domestic retreat more elegant than any thing west of the mountains. He was a romantic and eccentric man—accomplished, imaginative, and confiding. In these qualities his wife was an equal sharer. His mansion was plain but tasteful in form and arrangement. His grounds were laid out by a skill that knew how to please; and the whole island presented to the eye a paradise in the midst of the wilderness. Books, paintings, statuary, musical and scientific instruments, found in the mansion, attested the culture of the inmates. Such was the home of Harman Blennerhassett.

Burr had heard at Marietta vague rumors of this Eden. He entered it in the garb of an angel of light; he left it prepared for a curse. The "Lord of the Isle" was temporarily absent. The mistress, captivated by her visitor, with whose name she was familiar, urged him to dine with them. He remained until almost midnight, charming the family with his conversation, and then by the light of a waning moon he embarked, leaving the enchanted pair to enjoy the fruits of the tree of knowledge which he had revealed to them.

Down the beautiful Ohio Burr still floated. A week after leaving Blennerhassett's Island he was at the little village of Cincinnati. There he remained a day, and then voyaged on to the Falls of the Ohio (now Louisville), where he met friends from the East. Then he left the water and rode on horseback to Nashville—a journey now made by railway in nine or ten hours—where he was received with public demonstrations of respect. He became the guest of General Andrew Jackson, and his conversation completely captivated that sturdy hero of the West. After lingering there four days he took a boat, descended the Cumberland to its mouth, and at Fort Massac on the Ohio, sixteen miles below, he found Wilkinson on his way to St. Louis. That officer was about to send troops to New Orleans; so he fitted up a barge for Burr "with sails, colors, and ten oars," and assigned to his use a sergeant and ten faithful men. In this state, bearing letters of introduction from Wilkinson to leading men in New Orleans, Burr entered that quaint French and Spanish city in the midst of the marshes of the Lower Mississippi.

The principal person to whom Burr carried letters was Daniel Clark, father of Mrs. General Gaines, whose husband bore a part in this drama. Wilkinson assured Clark that Burr was worthy of the greatest attention, and that he would make communications to him which were "improper to letter." Clark received him cordially, introduced him into the best society of New Orleans, and for three weeks the conspirator was feasted and toasted, and flattered and caressed to his heart's content. During those three weeks Burr did something else than feasting and idling. He laid plans for the furtherance of his schemes, which now, doubtless, were tangibly fashioned in his mind; and he left New Orleans for the North filled with the contemplation of a great enterprise for his personal aggrandizement. He went up the Mississippi Valley to Natchez on horseback, and from there crossed the broad wilderness to Nashville, where another public dinner awaited him; and the doors of Jackson's hospitable mansion were again opened for his cordial reception.

Burr remained a week with Jackson. After spending a fortnight among certain politicians of Kentucky, and forming the acquaintance of the then rising Henry Clay, he went to St. Louis, and became the guest of his friend and confidant, General Wilkinson. He doubtless revealed much more of his grand scheme to that officer than he had ever before trusted him with; and when the plans were all discussed, he departed for Vincennes, the capital of Indiana, to visit Governor Harrison. From the Wabash he made his way to Cincinnati, Chillicothe, and Marietta, stopping at Blennerhassett's Island on the way, but not finding the owner at home. He pressed forward to Philadelphia; and at the close of October he was in Washington City, where he dined with the President, was honored by the members of the Cabinet and other distinguished men, and after remaining a week, started to meet his daughter in her Southern home.

Burr returned to Washington in December, and began in earnest to put his great scheme in motion. During the entire winter he was engaged in the nefarious business. He wrote mysterious letters to Wilkinson (partly in cipher), and attempted to win to his support dissatisfied officers of the army and navy.

Among the army officers at Washington whom Burr approached was General William Eaton, who had lately returned from the Mediterranean, and was in very ill humor with his Government. He informed that officer that he was organizing a secret expedition against the Spanish provinces of Mexico, and asked him to join him. War with Spain seemed to be impending, and the favorable moment for the execution of his projected enterprise was doubtless at hand. He assured Eaton that great wealth and honors would be won by the participators in the conquest; and so much did Burr's eloquence inflame his auditor's imagination that he promised to think favorably of the proposition. This point gained, Burr commenced stimulating Eaton's irritation toward his own Government because of alleged wrongs. But there was so much disloyalty of sentiment in the conspirator's conversation that the General began to suspect that the proposition to invade Mexico was only a covering to wicked designs against his own country. He resolved to feign acquiescence, gain Burr's full confidence, and fathom his real intentions, if possible.

Burr now grew bolder, and more and more communicative. Finally he told Eaton that he contemplated a revolution in the Western States for the purpose of separating them from the Union, and establishing a protectorate or a monarchy in the Valley of the Mississippi, whose sceptre was to be held by himself. New Orleans was to be his capital; and he contemplated an extension of his dominions over most, if not all, of Mexico by means of an army which he expected to organize in the West. Wilkinson, he said, was a party to the scheme, and he would carry with him, in the execution of his plan of revolution and conquest, the whole regular army beyond the mountains under the command of that officer. He had agents, he said, in the Spanish provinces who were ready to co-operate with him; and he justified his movement against the integrity of the Union by the plea that the Government lacked efficiency and was a failure; that the people of the West had the same right to separate from those of the East that the colonists had to withdraw from Great Britain; and that if he could (as he hoped to) secure the co-operation of the marine corps at Washington (the only troops there), and gain over to his interest Truxtun, Preble, Decatur, and other naval officers, he would turn Congress neck and heels out of doors, assassinate the President, seize on the treasury and navy, and declare himself the chief of an energetic government.

Eaton, who afterward related these facts under oath, was amazed. "Colonel Burr," he said, "one word—usurper—would destroy you. Within six weeks after your movement shall have commenced Yankee militiamen will cut your throat." Fearing to pit his own reputation and veracity against Colonel Burr's by denouncing him, Eaton contented himself by advising the President to send Burr on a foreign embassy to prevent his doing mischief in the West. But Jefferson had strong faith in the patriotism of the people, and regarding Burr as a chafing, disappointed politician, he believed him to be incapable of doing serious mischief any where.

Burr, meanwhile, had written a seductive letter to Blennerhassett, telling him that he was wasting great abilities in ignoble seclusion; that he ought to aspire to a career in which all his rare powers might find expression; that his already impaired fortune would disappear and his children be left in poverty; and entreated him to go forth into the wide world in search of wealth and distinction. The flattered Irishman—the silly fish—caught at the bait and became a victim. His ambition and acquisitiveness were fully aroused, and he offered his services in any way Colonel Burr might command them, not for a moment dreaming that his accomplished guest a few months before had designs against the unity of the Government under whose protection he was safely reposing. Burr also approached Truxtun, Decatur, and other naval officers, with the solemn assurance that his plans contemplated only the seizure of Spanish domain and the establishment of a new Government thereon. He adroitly insinuated that the Cabinet tacitly favored his enterprise; but those gentlemen knew better, and refused to entertain his proposals for a moment. The projects of the conspirator seemed hopeless, and he wrote to Wilkinson, in cipher, that the execution of their plans was postponed until the following December. Either in earnest, or as a cover to his schemes, Burr now applied to the President for a foreign embassy.

During the early part of the summer of 1806 the Spaniards threatened an invasion of the Mississippi Valley from Mexico. Quite a large body of their troops were marched up to the frontier, when Wilkinson, with all his available force, hastened to oppose them. Now was Burr's golden opportunity. The Western people were greatly excited, and ready to fly to arms to repel the invader. For several months rumors had spread all over the country beyond the mountains that Burr was at the bottom of a project for effecting a revolution in Mexico. It had been circulated industriously by Burr's friends, doubtless at his own instigation, his object being to cover up his real designs when he should be found making military preparations on the Western waters.

This threatened invasion was precisely the event most needed by the conspirator at this juncture for obvious reasons; and he set about with great energy making preparations for his pretended counter invasion. By the aid of his friends and relations, and a few persons like Blennerhasset, whom he had seduced by promises of great gain, he purchased, for $40,000, four hundred thousand acres of land on the borders of the Washita, a tributary of the Red River, whereon to build strong fortifications, make a secure refuge in the event of disaster, or to plant a settlement and await a favorable turn in the wheel of fortune. An invasion of Spanish territory, and the establishment of a splendid empire in the far Southwest, was the grand scheme which he presented to his dupes. His purchase gave tangibility to the enterprise, and many influential men embarked in it. His daughter and her husband entered deeply into his plans, whose magnificence grew with the flight of the hours. The most gorgeous visions of wealth, power, aggrandizement, and solid enjoyment dazzled the minds of the deluded ones. A beautiful country, inexhaustible mines, and wealth of every kind, made more desirable by the possession of titular honors, were presented to their fancy as awaiting the coming of the conquering Burr and his friends. The visionary Blennerhasset was filled with the greatest enthusiasm; and his hand, brain, heart, and purse were freely placed at the disposal of the conspirator. His island was to be the first rendezvous of the expeditionary troops, and he was engaged to contract for the construction of a flotilla of transport boats at the mouth of the Muskingum, near Marietta. His wife and Burr's daughter were to accompany the expedition as far as New Orleans, there to await a summons to the capital of the embryo empire. The husband of the latter was to follow soon afterward, to take a place near the throne of his father-in-law in the new kingdom—a kingdom that would be established, it was confidently believed, over the broad domain where Montezuma once bore sway, before the next Christmas dawn. It is believed that at least five hundred persons in New York and New Orleans and the vast intervening country became directly interested in Burr's scheme; and yet so adroitly did he manage that not one of them could explain its exact character except Wilkinson and two or three others who had doubtless been admitted to his confidence, and knew the full import of his treasonable plans, such as were outlined to General Eaton.

Early in August Burr, accompanied by his daughter and a few friends and servants, was again floating on the Ohio. He stopped frequently to feel the pulse of public sentiment and to enlist recruits. Success made him bold, and at times his proverbial caution seemed to slumber profoundly. On one of these occasions, at the house of Colonel Morgan—a gallant soldier of the West, living near Cannonsburg, in Ohio—after dining and drinking freely, he cast off all disguise. He talked to his entertainer of the imbecility of the Government, the advantage to the West of separation from the old States, the probability of a speedy dissolution of the Union, and of his ability, with two hundred soldiers, to drive the Congress, with the President at their head, into the Potomac, and with five hundred to capture the city of New York. Much more that was treasonable fell from the lips of Burr that day; and when he had departed Colonel Morgan invited to his table two judges of a court then in session in his neighborhood. To them he repeated the conversation of Burr, and at his request they immediately, in a joint letter to the President, gave information of the fact. This letter, Jefferson said, was the first intimation he ever received of Burr's treasonable designs. His suspicions were fully aroused. He remembered Eaton's warning, and at once communicated his suspicions to confidential persons in the West; among them the eloquent lawyer, Joseph Hamilton Daviess, of Kentucky, who, five years later, gave his life to his country in the Battle of Tippecanoe. He also sent an agent to overtake Burr, and, if possible, ascertain what were his real designs.

Burr halted at Marietta, and, with Blennerhasset, completed a contract for fifteen batteaux, capable of bearing five hundred troops with necessary baggage and provisions. Here he reviewed the militia in admirable style, attended a ball in the evening, and fairly captivated all Marietta—men, women, and children. Young men flocked to his standard. Blennerhasset's heart and mind were all aglow with the grand scheme. His beautiful island had become a work-shop, and he labored incessantly for the early completion of preparations. Meanwhile Burr's daughter was the guest of Mrs. Blennerhasset, and they delighted each other with their day-dreams of future glory, while the arch-conspirator himself was moving with wonderful celerity from place to place in Ohio, Kentucky, and Tennessee, every where augmenting the number and respectability of his adherents and followers by his strange fascination of voice and manner. At Nashville he caused four large boats to be placed upon the stocks, and deposited $4000 in the hands of General Jackson for use in that region.

October, with its brilliant skies, soft air, and gorgeous forests, had arrived. The West was alive with excitement concerning the great but still mysterious expedition. Wilkinson was on the Spanish frontier with his troops, ready to repel invasion or to make one; and a letter had been sent by Burr to apprise him of his successful preparations. Every thing appeared rose-color to all who were immediately interested in the scheme; and Burr, at the house of General John Adam, of Kentucky, felt sure of abundant success.

But the arch-conspirator's dreams were suddenly disturbed by the mutterings of thunder that boded a tempest. At first it was low and but slightly alarming, but it soon grew loud and appalling. A newspaper called the Western World, printed at Frankfort, Kentucky, first gave out mysterious hints of another disloyal plot in the land. Then it shadowed in dim outline Burr's schemes for revolution, disunion, and conquest, and at length boldly denounced him as a traitor, together with the known leaders of the disunion plot in Kentucky ten years before. These were followed, on the 3d of November, by the rising in Court, sitting at Frankfort, of Mr. Daviess, already alluded to, then the United States Attorney for that district, and demanding, by regular motion, that Aaron Burr should be brought before the Court to answer to a charge of being engaged in an enterprise contrary to the laws of the United States. Daviess being a leading Federalist his conduct was attributed to partisan malignity, and he found himself immediately struggling against an overwhelming current of public odium, with Henry Clay, who was Burr's counsel, as its director. But Daviess was not a man to quail before a storm, and he persisted in his course. Burr appeared before the Court and deported himself with all the calm dignity of an innocent and misjudged man. Clay had agreed to defend him, only after Burr had given him pledges that his schemes were not inimical to the peace and welfare of the United States. These were given most solemnly, and, as Clay always believed, most falsely. The matter was finally brought before the grand jury, who, because of the absence of important witnesses, failed to indict the accused, and for a while Clay, and Burr's friends, were jubilant and Daviess was in disgrace. With a triumphant march Burr proceeded to Nashville, where a grand ball was given in honor of his escape from "Federal machinations." The same had been done at Frankfort, and the conspirator felt that he had no more meshes of disappointment to fear.

But a thunder-bolt soon fell from what seemed to be a clear sky. Burr had written to Wilkinson in cipher, saying, "I, A. Burr, have obtained funds, and have actually commenced the enterprise. Detachments from different points, and under different pretenses, will rendezvous on the Ohio 1st November. Every thing internal and external favors views; protection of England is secured. T—— [Truxtun] is going to Jamaica to arrange with the admiral on that station; it will meet on the Mississippi; —, England, —, navy of the United States are ready to join, and final orders are given to my friends and followers: it will be a host of choice spirits. Wilkinson shall be second to Burr only. Wilkinson shall dictate the rank and promotion of his officers. Burr will proceed westward 1st of August, never more to return; with him goes his daughter; the husband will follow in October with a corps of worthies." He assured Wilkinson that the people of the country to which they were going were ready to receive them; requested him to send an intelligent and confidential friend to confer personally with Burr; to furnish him with a list of all persons of note west of the mountains on whom they could rely, and desiring him to lend him the commissions of some of his officers, for an avowedly fraudulent use. He also told him that from five hundred to a thousand men of the expedition would move rapidly from the Falls of the Ohio at the middle of November, in light boats, to rendezvous at Natchez within a month thereafter, there to meet Wilkinson and consult upon future movements. This letter, borne by one who, Burr assured him, was faithful, and prepared to make disclosures if asked, was accompanied by another from a distinguished Jerseyman, which closed with the words—"Are you ready? Are your numerous associates ready? Wealth and glory! Louisiana and Mexico!"

At this point in the drama Wilkinson suddenly changed front. From being an accomplice of Burr he became his accuser. His motive has been the subject of various conjectures. Some attribute his conduct to moral cowardice at the moment when he was called upon to strike the conspirator's first blow. Others suppose it to have been a genuine exhibition of patriotic emotion; and others believe that it was an act of counter-treason—a betrayal of accomplices with the expectation of great personal gain. There is evidence to prove that he afterward sent an agent to the Viceroy of Mexico, demanding $200,000 as a reward for his services in defeating a plot for overturning his government and seizing his dominion. One thing is certain. On deciphering Burr's letter he dispatched an officer to the seat of Government with a letter to the President, exposing the conspirator's scheme against Mexico and his plan to revolutionize the Western States. He had received, at about the same time, a letter from a confidential friend in Natchez, which stated that a rumor was afloat in that region "that a plan to revolutionize the Western country had been formed, matured, and was ready to explode; and that Kentucky, Ohio, Tennessee, Orleans, and Indiana, were combined to declare themselves independent on the 15th of November." This would justify his denunciations of Burr; and making arrangements with the Spaniards on the Sabine, Wilkinson withdrew his troops, hastened to New Orleans, and labored zealously to place that city in a state of defense against the expected insurgents under his old friend. He proclaimed martial law, harangued a public meeting, and professed to expose every thing he knew about the "horrid conspiracy." For the moment he was regarded as the Deliverer of his Country.

Wilkinson's dispatch reached the President on the 25th of November. On the 27th Mr. Jefferson issued a proclamation on the subject, and sent it, with paralyzing effect upon Burr's schemes, upon the wings of the press all over the country, and by special messengers to the Governors of States. It produced general alarm throughout the land. Exaggeration followed exaggeration; and when General Eaton, emboldened by these public accusations of Burr, came forward and added his astounding deposition to the testimony against him, curses loud and long upon the murderer of Hamilton and traitor to his country were invoked. Many of the more timid believed that the Union was actually toppling to its fall; and loyal men, who had been deceived as to Burr's real intentions, hastened to desert the cause of a faithless and deceptive leader. The sturdy Jackson was among the first of these when his suspicions were aroused, and he wrote to Governor Claiborne, of Mississippi, warning him that a plot against his Territory was doubtless on foot. He had the sagacity to perceive that Wilkinson could not be trusted, and he warned the Governor to be on his guard against that commander as well as Burr. "I hate the Dons," he wrote, "and would delight to see Mexico reduced; but I would die in the last ditch before I would see the Union disunited."

Sustained by the President's proclamation and the letter of General Jackson to Governor Claiborne, Wilkinson manifested great patriotic zeal by arresting several suspected confederates of Burr, and suspending the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus. Meanwhile the agent sent to the West by the President was doing effective service on the Ohio and in Kentucky. He conferred with Blennerhassett at Marietta, who supposed him to be one of the confederates of Burr, and then procured from the authorities of Ohio an order for the seizure of all the boats at the mouth of the Muskingum and at Blennerhassett's Island. This duty was performed by rough militiamen, who desolated the island, disfigured the house, paintings, and furniture, and so insulted and menaced the accomplished mistress of the mansion that she fled in terror down the Ohio in an open boat. Joined by her husband, they hastened toward the Mississippi, hoping to find a refuge from the sudden storm of adversity among those supposed to be more friendly to the cause in which they were engaged.

At about this time a flotilla of the expedition, under Colonel Tyler, of Virginia, passed down the Ohio, and was joined at the Falls (Louisville) by another Virginian, named Floyd, then a member of the Territorial Legislature of Indiana. The President's secret agent had awakened the authorities of Tennessee to the impending danger, and Burr suddenly found himself to be an outlaw among those who had so recently and so warmly caressed him. He fled down the Cumberland in an open boat, joined his fellow-conspirators, and after trying to draw into his service the little garrison at Fort Massac, who had not heard of his schemes, he pushed on toward New Orleans. The last military post on the Mississippi, in that direction, was at the Chickasaw Bluffs (now Memphis), and there again he endeavored to win a small garrison to his interests. He failed; and while at the house of a friend, a short distance below the Bluffs, he was informed, by a newspaper, of the proceedings of Wilkinson and the fiery indignation of the people in New Orleans. He at once perceived that a most unwelcome reception would await him there.

In fear of immediate arrest by the authorities of Mississippi, Burr, now a branded fugitive, withdrew to the west side of the river, out of the jurisdiction of Governor Claiborne, and established a camp about twenty miles below Natchez. There he was visited by Poindexter, the Attorney-General of Mississippi, for the purpose of inducing him to surrender. Burr received him courteously, but spoke bitterly of Wilkinson. "As to any projects," he said, "which may have been formed between General Wilkinson and myself heretofore, they are now completely frustrated by the perfidious conduct of Wilkinson; and the world must pronounce him a perfidious villain. If I am sacrificed, my port-folio will prove him to be such." And so the world, acquainted with the history, believes.

Burr agreed to surrender when he should receive a written guarantee that his person should be unmolested. This was given; and he accompanied Poindexter to Washington, the seat of the Mississippi Government. His case was laid before the grand jury at the sitting of the Court there in February, 1807. It was a remarkable body of Mississippi planters. Instead of indicting the accused, they presented the acting Governor of the Territory as a culprit because he had called out the militia for the arrest of Burr and his accomplices, and denounced the late proceedings at New Orleans! They did not present the President of the United States as a mischievous alarmist because of his disturbing proclamation.

Burr withdrew to the house of a friend and sympathizer; but, informed of the approach of officers sent by Wilkinson for his arrest, he suddenly disappeared. He visited his flotilla, informed his people (about sixty in number) of what had transpired and the impending danger; told them he must fly for safety; directed them to divide the property in their possession among themselves, and advised them to go and settle on his Washita domain. He then left them. Some were arrested, and others were scattered and concealed in the Territory until the storm was over, when, as Poindexter said, they furnished that region "with an abundant supply of school-masters, singing-masters, dancing-masters, and doctors."

Burr made his way through the wilderness toward Pensacola, where lay a British man-of-war, on which he hoped to find a temporary refuge until he could leave the country altogether. Not having been legally discharged, a reward of two thousand dollars was offered by the Governor of Mississippi for his arrest. That event was not long delayed. The fugitive traveled on horseback, with only a guide for a companion. Late at night, just past the middle of February, he rode up to a lighted cabin in the hamlet of Old Wakefield, Washington County, Alabama, not far from the Tombigbee River, and inquired for the tavern and the house of Colonel Hinson, a well-known resident, whose home was some miles below. Two lawyers were playing backgammon in the cabin. One was Colonel Nicholas Perkins, who had read the President's proclamation, and had possibly heard of the recently-offered reward. The sparkling eyes and rare intelligence of the stranger, so unusual among the rustic population of that region, as Burr's dress indicated him to be, attracted Perkins's attention, and awakened his suspicions. A glance at a tidy boot on a small foot that protruded from the coarse pantaloons of the rider (for the clatter of hoofs had brought the two lawyers to the door with a light) confirmed his suspicions. "That is Colonel Burr," said Perkins to his companion when they re-entered the cabin. "Let us follow him to Hinson's, and arrest him." His incredulous companion ridiculed him; but Perkins, convinced of the correctness of his judgment, aroused the sheriff, and the two started after the traveler. Perkins remained in the woods until the sheriff should perform his official duty. That functionary was so charmed with Burr that he could not make the arrest. Perkins waited long, and finally, suspecting the cause of the delay, he pushed forward to the Tombigbee River, descended it in a canoe to Fort Stoddart, and communicated his suspicions to Captain (afterward Major-General) Gaines, the commandant there. That alert officer was soon in his saddle, and the two, followed by a file of dragoons, hastened to the Pensacola road. Within two miles of Colonel Hinson's house they met the travelers. "I presume," said Captain Gaines, "I have the honor of addressing Colonel Burr." "I am a traveler," said the culprit, with perfect composure, "and do not recognize your right to ask such a question." Gaines immediately produced the President's proclamation, and declared Burr to be under arrest by order of the National Government. Burr warned him, as a young man, to be very careful how he arrested travelers on suspicion, and used his fascination of words and manners freely, but with no effect this time. Gaines assured him that he knew his responsibilities and his duties, and said, with emphasis, that he must go with him, a prisoner, to Fort Stoddart, where he should be treated with all the consideration due to his late exalted rank as the second officer in the Government.

Burr's arrest occurred on the 19th of February. On the 5th of March he commenced a journey, as a prisoner, for the National Capital, under a proper guard commanded by Colonel Perkins. It was a tedious and perilous journey, through immense wildernesses and sparse settlements. At Peterburg, in Virginia, they were met by an order from the President directing the conveyance of the prisoner to Richmond. They arrived in that city on the 26th of March, where, as speedily as possible, Burr had a hearing before Chief Justice Marshall. Bonds were given for his appearance at court on the 22d of the ensuing May, and he was set at liberty.

A grand jury selected from among the leading citizens of Virginia, indicted Burr for high treason, and he was put upon his trial on the 22d of May, 1807. It was one of the most remarkable state trials ever held in America. Rodney, the United States Attorney-General of the District conducted the trial, assisted by Hay and Wirt, then both eminent at the Virginia bar. Edmund Randolph of Virginia, Luther Martin of Maryland, and other eminent counsel were employed for the defense. The trial lasted all summer. An overt act of treason could not be proved, and the jury were compelled by the law and the testimony to acquit him. They evidently did so with a full conviction of his guilty intentions, for their verdict, rendered on the first of September, was given in unusual form—a form which the prisoner felt keenly to be an actual expression of their conviction of his moral guiltiness. It was in these words: "We, of the jury, say that Aaron Burr is not proved to be guilty under the indictment by any evidence submitted to us. We, therefore, find him not guilty."

Burr vehemently protested against this form, and demanded that the verdict should be rendered in the usual way. The jury would not yield; but the clerk of the court took the responsibility of entering upon the record only the words, not guilty.

Prosecutions against Blennerhassett, Tyler, Floyd, and others, resting upon the same evidence, were immediately abandoned, when all of the accused (Burr included) were put upon their trial for a misdemeanor, in fitting out an expedition against Mexico, a province of a friendly power. They were acquitted in October, on the ground that the offense was not committed in Virginia, but in Ohio. The prisoners were then ordered to give bail for their appearance for trial in the latter State. They did so, and all were released. The bail-bonds of all were forfeited. Burr fled to Europe as soon as practicable; and Blennerhassett, his deluded victim, after struggling with ill-fortune in the United States and Canada for ten years, went to England, and finally died in the island of Guernsey. His widow came to New York in 1842, and in Congress, through Henry Clay, sought, unsuccessfully, for remuneration for losses of property sustained by her husband in consequence of his arrest. While the subject was pending at Washington she lived upon the bounty of some benevolent Irish females in New York. She soon sickened and died, and the remains of that accomplished woman, the child of opulence, were buried by the Sisters of Charity. Burr had then been in his grave, a few miles from New York, six years.

CHAPTER LIII.

LADY MASON RETURNS HOME.

LADY MASON remained at The Cleeve for something more than a week after that day on which she made her confession, during which time she was fully committed to take her trial at the next assizes at Alston on an indictment for perjury. This was done in a manner that astonished even herself by the absence of all publicity or outward scandal. The matter was arranged between Mr. Matthew Round and Mr. Solomon Aram, and was so arranged in accordance with Mr. Furnival's wishes. Mr. Furnival wrote to say that at such a time he would call at The Cleeve with a post-chaise. This he did, and took Lady Mason with him before two magistrates for the county who were sitting at Doddinghurst, a village five miles distant from Sir Peregrine's house. Here by agreement they were met by Lucius Mason, who was to act as one of the bailsmen for his mother's appearance at the trial. Sir Peregrine was the other, but it was brought about by amicable management between the lawyers that his appearance before the magistrates was not required. There were also there the two attorneys, Bridget Bolster the witness, one Torrington from London, who brought with him the absolute deed executed on the 14th of July with reference to the then dissolved partnership of Mason and Martock, and there was Mr. Samuel Dockwrath. I must not forget to say that there was also a reporter for the press, provided by the special care of the latter-named gentleman.

The arrival in the village of four different vehicles, and the sight of such gentlemen as Mr. Furnival, Mr. Round, and Mr. Aram, of course aroused some excitement there; but this feeling was kept down as much as possible, and Lady Mason was very quickly allowed to return to the carriage. Mr. Dockwrath made one or two attempts to get up a scene, and to rouse a feeling of public anger against the lady who was to be tried; but the magistrates put him down. They also seemed to be fully impressed with a sense of Lady Mason's innocence, in the teeth of the evidence which was given against her. This was the general feeling on the minds of all people—except of those who knew most about it. There was an idea that affairs had so been managed by Mr. Joseph Mason and Mr. Dockwrath that another trial was necessary, but that the unfortunate victim of Mr. Mason's cupidity and Mr. Dockwrath's malice would be washed white as snow when the day of that trial came. The chief performers on the present occasion were Round and Aram, and a stranger to such proceedings would have said that they were acting in concert. Mr. Round pressed for the indictment, and brought forward in a very short way the evidence of Bolster and Torrington. Mr. Aram said that his client was advised to reserve her defense, and was prepared with bail to any amount. Mr. Round advised the magistrates that reasonable bail should be taken, and then the matter was settled. Mr. Furnival sat on a chair close to the elder of those two gentlemen, and whispered a word to him now and then. Lady Mason was provided with an arm-chair close to Mr. Furnival's right hand, and close to her right hand stood her son. Her face was covered by a deep veil, and she was not called upon during the whole proceeding to utter one audible word. A single question was put to her by the presiding magistrate before the committal was signed, and it was understood that some answer was made to it; but this answer reached the ears of those in the room by means of Mr. Furnival's voice.

It was observed by most of those there that during the whole of the sitting Lady Mason held her son's hand; but it was observed also that though Lucius permitted this, he did not seem to return the pressure. He stood there during the entire proceedings, without motion or speech, looking very stern. He signed the bail-bond, but even that he did without saying a word. Mr. Dockwrath demanded that Lady Mason should be kept in custody till the bond should also have been signed by Sir Peregrine; but upon this Mr. Round remarked that he believed Mr. Joseph Mason had intrusted to him the conduct of the case, and the elder magistrate desired Mr. Dockwrath to abstain from further interference. "All right," said he to a person standing close to him. "But I'll be too many for them yet, as you will see when she is brought before a judge and jury." And then Lady Mason stood committed to take her trial at the next Alston assizes.

When Lucius had come forward to hand her from the post-chaise in which she arrived Lady Mason had kissed him, but this was all the intercourse that then passed between the mother and son. Mr. Furnival, however, informed him that his mother would return to Orley Farm on the next day but one.

"She thinks it better that she should be at home from this time to the day of the trial," said Mr. Furnival; "and, on the whole, Sir Peregrine is inclined to agree with her."

"I have thought so all through," said Lucius.

"But you are to understand that there is no disagreement between your mother and the family at The Cleeve. The idea of the marriage has, as I think very properly, been laid aside."

"Of course it was proper that it should be laid aside."

"Yes; but I must beg you to understand that there has been no quarrel. Indeed you will, I have no doubt, perceive that, as Mrs. Orme has assured me that she will see your mother constantly till the time comes."

"She is very kind," said Lucius. But it was evident from the tone of his voice that he would have preferred that all the Ormes should have remained away. In his mind this time of suffering to his mother and to him was a period of trial and probation—a period, if not of actual disgrace, yet of disgrace before the world; and he thought that it would have best become his mother to have abstained from all friendship out of her own family, and even from all expressed sympathy, till she had vindicated her own purity and innocence. And as he thought of this he declared to himself that he would have sacrificed every thing to her comfort and assistance if she would only have permitted it. He would have loved her, and been tender to her, receiving on his own shoulders all those blows which now fell so hardly upon hers. Every word should have been a word of kindness; every look should have been soft and full of affection. He would have treated her not only with all the love which a son could show to a mother, but with all the respect and sympathy which a gentleman could feel for a lady in distress. But then, in order that such a state of things as this should have existed, it would have been necessary that she should have trusted him. She should have leaned upon him, and—though he did not exactly say so in talking over the matter with himself, still he thought it—on him, and on him only. But she had declined to lean upon him at all. She had gone away to strangers—she, who should hardly have spoken to a stranger during these sad months! She would not have his care; and under those circumstances he could only stand aloof, hold up his head, and look sternly. As for her innocence, that was a matter of course. He knew that she was innocent. He wanted no one to tell him that his own mother was not a thief, a forger, a castaway among the world's worst wretches. He thanked no one for such an assurance. Every honest man must sympathize with a woman so injured. It would be a necessity of his manhood and of his honesty! But he would have valued most a sympathy which would have abstained from all expression till after that trial should be over. It should have been for him to act and for him to speak during this terrible period. But his mother, who was a free agent, had willed it otherwise.

And there had been one other scene. Mr. Furnival had introduced Lady Mason to Mr. Solomon Aram, having explained to her that it would be indispensable that Mr. Aram should see her, probably once or twice before the trial came on.

"But can not it be done through you?" said Lady Mason. "Though, of course, I should not expect that you can so sacrifice your valuable time."

"Pray believe me that that is not the consideration," said Mr. Furnival. "We have engaged the services of Mr. Aram because he is supposed to understand difficulties of this sort better than any other man in the profession, and his chance of rescuing you from this trouble will be much better if you can bring yourself to have confidence in him—full confidence." And Mr. Furnival looked into her face as he spoke with an expression of countenance that was very eloquent. "You must not suppose that I shall not do all in my power. In my proper capacity I shall be acting for you with all the energy that I can use; but the case has now assumed an aspect which requires that it should be in an attorney's hands." And then Mr. Furnival introduced her to Mr. Solomon Aram.

Mr. Solomon Aram was not, in outward appearance, such a man as Lady Mason, Sir Peregrine Orme, or others quite ignorant in such matters would have expected. He was not a dirty old Jew with a hooked nose and an imperfect pronunciation of English consonants. Mr. Chaffanbrass, the barrister, bore more resemblance to a Jew of that ancient type. Mr. Solomon Aram was a good-looking man about forty, perhaps rather over-dressed, but bearing about him no other sign of vulgarity. Nor at first sight would it probably have been discerned that he was of the Hebrew persuasion. He had black hair and a well-formed face; but his eyes were closer than is common with most of us, and his nose seemed to be somewhat swollen about the bridge. When one knew that he was a Jew one saw that he was a Jew; but in the absence of such previous knowledge he might have been taken for as good a Christian as any other attorney.

Mr. Aram raised his hat and bowed as Mr. Furnival performed the ceremony of introduction. This was done while she was still seated in the carriage, and as Lucius was waiting at the door to hand her down into the house where the magistrates were sitting. "I am delighted to have the honor of making your acquaintance," said Mr. Aram.

Lady Mason essayed to mutter some word; but no word was audible, nor was any necessary. "I have no doubt," continued the attorney, "that we shall pull through this little difficulty without any ultimate damage whatsoever. In the mean time it is of course disagreeable to a lady of your distinction." And then he made another bow. "We are peculiarly happy in having such a tower of strength as Mr. Furnival," and then he bowed to the barrister. "And my old friend Mr. Chaffanbrass is another tower of strength. Eh, Mr. Furnival?" And so the introduction was over.

Lady Mason had quite understood Mr. Furnival; had understood both his words and his face, when he told her how indispensable it was that she should have full confidence in this attorney. He had meant that she should tell him all. She must bring herself to confess every thing to this absolute stranger. And then—for the first time—she felt sure that Mr. Furnival had guessed her secret. He also knew it, but it would not suit him that any one should know that he knew it! Alas, alas! would it not be better that all the world should know it and that there might be an end? Had not her doom been told to her? Even if the paraphernalia of justice—the judge, and the jury, and the lawyers—could be induced to declare her innocent before all men, must she not confess her guilt to him—to that one—for whose verdict alone she cared? If he knew her to be guilty what matter who might think her innocent? And she had been told that all must be declared to him. That property was his—but his only through her guilt; and that property must be restored to its owner! So much Sir Peregrine Orme had declared to be indispensable—Sir Peregrine Orme, who in other matters concerning this case was now dark enough in his judgment. On that point, however, there need be no darkness. Though the heaven should fall on her devoted head, that tardy justice must be done!

When this piece of business had been completed at Doddington, Lady Mason returned to The Cleeve, whither Mr. Furnival accompanied her. He had offered his seat in the post-chaise to Lucius, but the young man had declared that he was unwilling to go to The Cleeve, and consequently there was no opportunity for conversation between Lady Mason and her son. On her arrival she went at once to her room, and there she continued to live as she had done for the last few days till the morning of her departure came. To Mrs. Orme she told all that had occurred, as Mr. Furnival did also to Sir Peregrine. On that occasion Sir Peregrine said very little to the barrister, merely bowing his head courteously as each different point was explained, in intimation of his having heard and understood what was said to him. Mr. Furnival could not but see that his manner was entirely altered. There was no enthusiasm now, no violence of invective against that wretch at Groby Park, no positive assurance that his guest's innocence must come out at the trial bright as the day! He showed no inclination to desert Lady Mason's cause, and indeed insisted on hearing the particulars of all that had been done; but he said very little, and those few words adverted to the terrible sadness of the subject. He seemed too to be older than he had been, and less firm in his gait. That terrible sadness had already told greatly upon him. Those about him had observed that he had not once crossed the threshold of his hall-door since the morning on which Lady Mason had taken to her own room.

"He has altered his mind," said the lawyer to himself as he was driven back to the Hamworth station. "He also now believes her to be guilty." As to his own belief, Mr. Furnival held no argument within his own breast, but we may say that he was no longer perplexed by much doubt upon the matter.

And then the morning came for Lady Mason's departure. Sir Peregrine had not seen her since she had left him in the library after her confession, although, as may be remembered, he had undertaken to do so. But he had not then known how Mrs. Orme might act when she heard the story. As matters had turned out Mrs. Orme had taken upon herself the care of their guest, and all intercourse between Lady Mason and Sir Peregrine had passed through his daughter-in-law. But now, on this morning, he declared that he would go to her up stairs in Mrs. Orme's room, and himself hand her down through the hall into the carriage. Against this Lady Mason had expostulated, but in vain.

"It will be better so, dear," Mrs. Orme had said. "It will teach the servants and people to think that he still respects and esteems you."

"But he does not!" said she, speaking almost sharply. "How would it be possible? Ah, me—respect and esteem are gone from me forever!"

"No, not forever," replied Mrs. Orme. "You have much to bear, but no evil lasts forever."

"Will not sin last forever—sin such as mine?"

"Not if you repent—repent and make such restitution as is possible. Lady Mason, say that you have repented. Tell me that you have asked Him to pardon you!" And then, as had been so often the case during these last days, Lady Mason sat silent, with hard, fixed eyes, with her hands clasped, and her lips compressed. Never as yet had Mrs. Orme induced her to say that she had asked for pardon at the cost of telling her son that the property which he called his own had been procured for him by his mother's fraud. That punishment, and that only, was too heavy for her neck to bear. Her acquittal in the law-court would be as nothing to her if it must be followed by an avowal of her guilt to her own son!

Sir Peregrine did come up stairs and handed her down through the hall as he had proposed. When he came into the room she did not look at him, but stood leaning against the table, with her eyes fixed upon the ground.

"I hope you find yourself better," he said, as he put out his hand to her. She did not even attempt to make a reply, but allowed him just to touch her fingers.

"Perhaps I had better not come down," said

LADY MASON GOING BEFORE THE MAGISTRATES.

Mrs. Orme. "It will be easier to say good-by here."

"Good-by!" said Lady Mason, and her voice sounded in Sir Peregrine's ears like a voice from the dead.

"God bless you and preserve you!" said Mrs.

Orme, "and restore you to your son. God will bless you if you ask Him. No; you shall not go without a kiss." And she put out her arms that Lady Mason might come to her.

The poor broken wretch stood for a moment as though trying to determine what she would do; and then, almost with a shriek, she threw herself on to the bosom of the other woman, and burst into a flood of tears. She had intended to abstain from that embrace; she had resolved that she would do so, declaring to herself that she was not fit to be held against that pure heart; but the tenderness of the offer had overcome her, and now she pressed her friend convulsively in her arms, as though there might yet be comfort for her as long as she could remain close to one who was so good to her.

"I shall come and see you very often," said Mrs. Orme—"almost daily."

"No, no, no!" exclaimed the other, hardly knowing the meaning of her own words.

"But I shall. My father is waiting now, dear, and you had better go."

Sir Peregrine had turned to the window, where he stood shading his eyes with his hand. When he heard his daughter-in-law's last words he again came forward and offered Lady Mason his arm. "Edith is right," he said. "You had better go now. When you are at home you will be more composed." And then he led her forth, and down the stairs, and across the hall, and with infinite courtesy put her into the carriage. It was a moment dreadful to Lady Mason; but to Sir Peregrine, also, it was not pleasant. The servants were standing round, officiously offering their aid—those very servants who had been told about ten days since that this lady was to become their master's wife and their mistress. They had been told so with no injunction as to secrecy, and the tidings had gone quickly through the whole country. Now it was known that the match was broken off—that the lady had been living up stairs secluded for the last week—and that she was to leave the house this morning, having been committed during the last day or two to stand her trial at the assizes for some terrible offense! He succeeded in his task. He handed her into the carriage, and then walked back through his own servants to the library without betraying to them the depth of his sorrow; but he knew that the last task had been too heavy for him. When it was done he shut himself up and sat there for hours without moving. He also declared to himself that the world was too hard for him, and that it would be well for him that he should die. Never till now had he come into close contact with crime, and now the criminal was one whom as a woman he had learned to love, and whom he had proposed to the world as his wife! The criminal was one who had declared her crime in order to protect him, and whom therefore he was still bound in honor to protect.

When Lady Mason arrived at Orley Farm her son was waiting at the door to receive her. It should have been said that during the last two days—that is, ever since the committal—Mrs. Orme had urged upon her very strongly that it would be well for her to tell every thing to her son. "What! now, at once?" the poor woman had said. "Yes, dear, at once," Mrs. Orme had answered. "He will forgive you, for

I know he is good. He will forgive you, and then the worst of your sorrow will be over." But toward doing this Lady Mason had made no progress even in her mind. In the violence of her own resolution she had brought herself to tell her guilt to Sir Peregrine. That effort had nearly destroyed her, and now she knew that she could not frame the words which should declare the truth to Lucius. What! tell him that tale; whereas her whole life had been spent in an effort to conceal it from him? No. She knew that she could not do it. But the idea of doing so made her tremble at the prospect of meeting him.

"I am very glad you have come home, mother," said Lucius, as he received her. "Believe me that for the present this will be the best place for both of us," and then he led her into the house.

"Dear Lucius, it would always be best for me to be with you, if it were possible."

He did not accuse her of hypocrisy in saying this; but he could not but think that had she really thought and felt as she now spoke nothing need have prevented her remaining with him. Had not his house ever been open to her? Had he not been willing to make her defense the first object of his life? Had he not longed to prove himself a good son? But she had gone from him directly that troubles came upon her; and now she said that she would fain be with him always—if it were possible! Where had been the impediment? In what way had it been not possible? He thought of this with bitterness as he followed her into the house, but he said not a word of it. He had resolved that he would be a pattern son, and even now he would not rebuke her.

She had lived in this house for some four-and-twenty years, but it seemed to her in no way like her home. Was it not the property of her enemy, Joseph Mason? and did she not know that it must go back into that enemy's hands? How then could it be to her like a home? The room in which her bed was laid was that very room in which her sin had been committed! There, in the silent hours of the night, while the old man lay near his death in the adjoining chamber, had she with infinite care and much slow preparation done that deed, to undo which, were it possible, she would now give away her existence—ay, her very body and soul. And yet for years she had slept in that room, if not happily at least tranquilly. It was matter of wonder to her now, as she looked back at her past life, that her guilt had sat so lightly on her shoulders. The black, unwelcome guest, the spectre of coming evil, had ever been present to her; but she had seen it indistinctly, and now and then the power had been hers to close her eyes. Never again could she close them. Nearer to her, and still nearer, the spectre came; and now it sat upon her pillow, and put its claw upon her plate, it pressed upon her bosom with its fiendish strength, telling her that all was over for her in this world—ay, and telling her worse even than that. Her return to her old home brought with it but little comfort.

And yet she was forced to make an effort at seeming glad that she had come there—a terrible effort! He, her son, was not gay, or disposed to receive from her a show of happiness; but he did think that she should compose herself and be tranquil, and that she should resume the ordinary duties of her life in her ordinarily quiet way. In all this she was obliged to conform herself to his wishes—or to attempt so to conform herself, though her heart should break in the struggle. If he did but know it all, then he would suffer her to be quiet—suffer her to lie motionless in her misery! Once or twice she almost said to herself that she would make the effort; but then she thought of him and his suffering, of his pride, of the respect which he claimed from all the world as the honest son of an honest mother, of his stubborn will and stiff neck, which would not bend, but would break beneath the blow. She had done all for him—to raise him in the world; and now she could not bring herself to undo the work that had cost her so dearly!

That evening she went through the ceremony of dinner with him, and he was punctilious in waiting upon her, as though bread and meat could comfort her, or wine could warm her heart. There was no warmth for her in all the vintages of the south, no comfort though gods should bring to her their banquets. She was heavily-laden—laden to the breaking of her back—and did not know where to lay her burden down.

"Mother," he said to her that night, lifting his head from the books over which he had been poring, "there must be a few words between us about this affair. They might as well be spoken now."

"Yes, Lucius; of course—if you desire it."

"There can be no doubt now that this trial will take place."

"No doubt," she said. "There can be no doubt."

"Is it your wish that I should take any part in it?"

She remained silent for some moments before she answered him, thinking—striving to think, how best she might do him pleasure. "What part?" she said at last.

"A man's part, and a son's part. Shall I see these lawyers and learn from them what they are at? Have I your leave to tell them that you want no subterfuge, no legal quibbles—that you stand firmly on your own clear innocence, and that you defy your enemies to sully it? Mother, those who have sent you to such men as that cunning attorney have sent you wrong—have counseled you wrong."

"It can not be changed now, Lucius."

"It can be changed, if you will tell me to change it."

And then again she paused. Ah, think of her anguish as she sought for words to answer him! "No, Lucius," she said, "it can not be changed now."

"So be it, mother; I will not ask again:" and then he moodily returned to his books, while she returned to her thoughts. Ah, think of her misery!

CHAPTER LIV.

TELLING ALL THAT HAPPENED BENEATH THE LAMP-POST.

WHEN Felix Graham left Noningsby, and made his way up to London, he came at least to one resolution which he intended to be an abiding one. That idea of a marriage with a moulded wife should at any rate be abandoned. Whether it might be his great destiny to be the husband of Madeline Staveley, or whether he might fail in achieving this purpose, he declared to himself that it would be impossible that he should ever now become the husband of Mary Snow. And the ease with which his conscience settled itself on this matter as soon as he had received from the Judge that gleam of hope astonished even himself. He immediately declared to himself that he could not marry Mary Snow without perjury! How could he stand with her before the altar and swear that he would love her, seeing that he did not love her at all—seeing that he altogether loved some one else? He acknowledged that he had made an ass of himself in this affair of Mary Snow. This moulding of a wife had failed with him, he said, as it always must fail with every man. But he would not carry his folly further. He would go to Mary Snow, tell her the truth, and then bear whatever injury her angry father might be able to inflict on him. Independently of that angry father, he would of course do for Mary Snow all that his circumstances would admit.

Perhaps the gentleman of a poetic turn of mind, whom Mary had consented to meet beneath the lamp-post, might assist him in his views; but whether this might be so or not, he would not throw that meeting ungenerously in her teeth. He would not have allowed that offense to turn him from his proposed marriage had there been nothing else to turn him, and therefore he would not plead that offense as the excuse for his broken troth. That the breaking of that troth would not deeply wound poor Mary's heart—so much he did permit himself to believe on the evidence of that lamp-post.

He had written to Mrs. Thomas, telling her when he would be at Peckham; but in his letter he had not said a word as to those terrible tidings which she had communicated to him. He had written also to Mary, assuring her that he accused her of no injury against him, and almost promising her forgiveness; but this letter Mary had not shown to Mrs. Thomas. In these days Mary's anger against Mrs. Thomas was very strong. That Mrs. Thomas should have used all her vigilance to detect such goings on as those of the lamp-post was only natural. What woman in Mrs. Thomas's position—or in any other position—would not have done so?

Mary Snow knew that had she herself been the duenna she would have left no corner of a box unturned but she would have found those letters. And having found them, she would have used her power over the poor girl. She knew that. But she would not have betrayed her to the man. Truth between woman and woman should have prevented that. Were not the stockings which she had darned for Mrs. Thomas legion in number? Had she not consented to eat the veriest scraps of food in order that those three brats might be fed into sleekness to satisfy their mother's eyes? Had she not reported well of Mrs. Thomas to her lord, though that house of Peckham was nauseous to her? Had she ever told to Mr. Graham any one of those little tricks which were carried on to allure him into a belief that things at Peckham were prosperous? Had she ever exposed the borrowing of those tea-cups when he came, and the fact that those knobs of white sugar were kept expressly on his behoof? No; she would have scorned to betray any woman; and that woman whom she had not betrayed should have shown the same feeling toward her. Therefore there was enmity at Peckham, and the stockings of those infants lay unmended in the basket.

"Mary, I have done it all for the best," said Mrs. Thomas, driven to defend herself by the obdurate silence of her pupil.

"No, Mrs. Thomas, you didn't. You did it for the worst," said Mary. And then there was again silence between them.

It was on the morning following this that Felix Graham was driven to the door in a cab. He still carried his arm in a sling, and was obliged to be somewhat slow in his movements, but otherwise he was again well. His accident, however, was so far a godsend to both the women at Peckham that it gave them a subject on which they were called upon to speak before that other subject was introduced. Mary was very tender in her inquiries—but tender in a bashful, retiring way. To look at her one would have said that she was afraid to touch the wounded man lest he should be again broken.

"Oh, I'm all right," said he, trying to assume a look of good-humor. "I sha'n't go hunting again in a hurry; you may be sure of that."

"We have all great reason to be thankful that Providence interposed to save you," said Mrs. Thomas, in her most serious tone. Had Providence interposed to break Mrs. Thomas's collar-bone, or at least to do her some serious outward injury, what a comfort it would be, thought Mary Snow.

"Have you seen your father lately?" asked Graham.

"Not since I wrote to you about the money that he—borrowed," said Mary.

"I told her that she should not have given it to him," said Mrs. Thomas.

"She was quite right," said Graham. "Who could refuse assistance to a father in distress?" Whereupon Mary put her handkerchief up to her eyes and began to cry.

"That's true, of course," said Mrs. Thomas; "but it would never do that he should be a drain in that way. He should feel that if he had any feeling."

"So he has," said Mary. "And you are driven close enough yourself sometimes, Mrs. Thomas. There's days when you'd like to borrow nineteen and sixpence if any body would lend it you."

"Very well," said Mrs. Thomas, crossing her hands over each other in her lap and assuming a look of resignation; "I suppose all this will be changed now. I have endeavored to do my duty, and very hard it has been."

Felix felt that the sooner he rushed into the middle of the subject which brought him there the better it would be for all parties. That the two ladies were not very happy together was evident, and then he made a little comparison between Madeline and Mary. Was it really the case that for the last three years he had contemplated making that poor child his wife? Would it not be better for him to tie a millstone round his neck and cast himself into the sea? That was now his thought respecting Mary Snow.

"Mrs. Thomas," he said, "I should like to speak to Mary alone for a few minutes, if you could allow it."

"Oh certainly; by all means. It will be quite proper." And gathering up a bundle of the unfortunate stockings she took herself out of the room.

Mary, as soon as Graham had spoken, became almost pale, and sat perfectly still, with her eyes fixed on her betrothed husband. While Mrs. Thomas was there she was prepared for war, and her spirit was hot within her; but all that heat fled in a moment when she found herself alone with the man to whom it belonged to speak her doom. He had almost said that he would forgive her; but yet she had a feeling that that had been done which could not altogether be forgiven. If he asked her whether she loved the hero of the lamp-post what would she say? Had he asked her whether she loved him, Felix Graham, she would have sworn that she did, and have thought that she was swearing truly; but in answer to that other question, if it were asked, she felt that her answer must be false. She had no idea of giving up Felix of her own accord, if he were still willing to take her. She did not even wish that he would not take her. It had been the lesson of her life that she was to be his wife, and, by becoming so, provide for herself and for her wretched father. Nevertheless a dream of something different from that had come across her young heart, and the dream had been so pleasant! How painfully, but yet with what a rapture, had her heart palpitated as she stood for those ten wicked minutes beneath the lamp-post!

"Mary," said Felix, as soon as they were alone—and as he spoke he came up to her and took her hand, "I trust I may never be the cause to you of any unhappiness; that I may never be the means of making you sad."

"Oh, Mr. Graham, I am sure that you never will. It is I that have been bad to you."

"No, Mary, I do not think you have been bad at all. I should have been sorry that that had happened, and that I should not have known it."

"I suppose she was right to tell, only—" In truth Mary did not at all understand what might be the nature of Graham's thoughts and feelings on such a subject. She had a strong woman's idea that the man whom she ought to love would not be gratified by her meeting another man at a private assignation, especially when that other man had written to her a love-letter; but she did not at all know how far such a sin might be regarded as pardonable according to the rules of the world recognized on such subjects. At first, when the letters were discovered and the copies of them sent off to Noningsby, she thought that all was over. According to her ideas, as existing at that moment, the crime was conceived to be one admitting of no pardon; and in the hours spent under that conviction all her consolation came from the feeling that there was still one who regarded her as an angel of light. But then she had received Graham's letter, and as she began to understand that pardon was possible, that other consolation waxed feeble and dim. If Felix Graham chose to take her, of course she was there for him to take. It never for a moment occurred to her that she could rebel against such taking, even though she did shine as an angel of light to one dear pair of eyes.

"I suppose she was right to tell you, only—"

"Do not think, Mary, that I am going to scold you, or even that I am angry with you."

"Oh, but I know you must be angry."

"Indeed I am not. If I pledge myself to tell you the truth in every thing, will you be equally frank with me?"

"Yes," said Mary. But it was much easier for Felix to tell the truth than for Mary to be frank. I believe that schoolmasters often tell fibs to school-boys, although it would be so easy for them to tell the truth. But how difficult it is for the school-boy always to tell the truth to his master! Mary Snow was now as a school-boy before her tutor, and it may almost be said that the telling of the truth was to her impossible. But of course she made the promise. Who ever said that she would not tell the truth when so asked?

"Have you ever thought, Mary, that you and I would not make each other happy if we were married?"

"No; I have never thought that," said Mary, innocently. She meant to say exactly that which she thought Graham would wish her to say, but she was slow in following his lead.

"It has never occurred to you that though we might love each other very warmly as friends—and so I am sure we always shall—yet we might not suit each other in all respects as man and wife?"

"I mean to do the very best I can; that is, if—if—if you are not too much offended with me now."

"But, Mary, it should not be a question of doing the best you can. Between man and wife there should be no need of such effort. It should be a labor of love."

"So it will; and I'm sure I'll labor as hard as I can."

Felix began to perceive that the line he had taken would not answer the required purpose, and that he must be somewhat more abrupt with her—perhaps a little less delicate, in coming to the desired point. "Mary," he said, "what is the name of that gentleman whom—whom you met out of doors you know?"

"Albert Fitzallen," said Mary, hesitating very much as she pronounced the name, but nevertheless rather proud of the sound.

"And you are—fond of him?" asked Graham.

Poor girl! What was she to say? "No; I'm not very fond of him."

"Are you not? Then why did you consent to that secret meeting?"

"Oh, Mr. Graham—I didn't mean it; indeed I didn't. And I didn't tell him to write to me, nor yet to come looking after me. Upon my word I didn't. But then I thought when he sent me that letter that he didn't know—about you I mean; and so I thought I'd better tell him; and that's why I went. Indeed that was the reason."

"Mrs. Thomas could have told him that."

"But I don't like Mrs. Thomas, and I wouldn't for worlds that she should have had any thing to do with it. I think Mrs. Thomas has behaved very bad to me, so I do. And you don't half know her—that you don't."

"I will ask you one more question, Mary, and before answering it I want to make you believe that my only object in asking it is to ascertain how I may make you happy. When you did meet Mr.—this gentleman—"

"Albert Fitzallen."

"When you did meet Mr. Fitzallen, did you tell him nothing else except that you were engaged to me? Did you say nothing to him as to your feelings toward himself?"

"I told him it was very wrong of him to write me that letter."

"And what more did you tell him?"

"Oh, Mr. Graham, I won't see him any more; indeed I won't. I give you my most solemn promise. Indeed I won't. And I will never write a line to him, or look at him. And if he sends any thing I'll send it to you. Indeed I will. There was never any thing of the kind before; upon my word there wasn't. I did let him take my hand, but I didn't know how to help it when I was there. And he kissed me—only once. There; I've told it all now, as though you were looking at me. And I ain't a bad girl, whatever she may say of me. Indeed I ain't!" And then poor Mary Snow burst out into an agony of tears.

Felix began to perceive that he had been too hard upon her. He had wished that the first overtures of a separation should come from her, and in wishing this he had been unreasonable. He walked for a while about the room, and then going up to her he stood close by her and took her hand. "Mary," he said, "I'm sure you're not a bad girl."

"No," she said; "no, I ain't;" still sobbing convulsively. "I didn't mean any thing wrong, and I couldn't help it."

"I am sure you did not, and nobody has said you did."

"Yes, they have. She has said so. She said that I was a bad girl. She told me so, up to my face."

"She was very wrong if she said so."

"She did, then, and I couldn't bear it."

"I have not said so, and I don't think so. Indeed, in all this matter I believe that I have been more to blame than you."

"No—I know I was wrong. I know I shouldn't have gone to see him."

"I won't even say as much as that, Mary. What you should have done—only the task would have been too hard for any young girl—was to have told me openly that you liked this young gentleman."

"But I don't want ever to see him again."

"Look here, Mary," he said. But now he had dropped her hand and taken a chair opposite to her. He had begun to find that the task which he had proposed to himself was not so easy even for him. "Look here, Mary. I take it that you do like this young gentleman. Don't answer me till I have finished what I am going to say. I suppose you do like him—and if so, it would be very wicked in you to marry me."

"Oh, Mr. Graham—"

"Wait a moment, Mary. But there is nothing wicked in your liking him." It may be presumed that Mr. Graham would hold such an opinion as this, seeing that he had allowed himself the same latitude of liking. "It was perhaps only natural that you should learn to do so. You have been taught to regard me rather as a master than as a lover."

"Oh, Mr. Graham, I'm sure I've loved you. I have indeed. And I will. I won't even think of Al—"

"But I want you to think of him—that is, if he be worth thinking of."

"He's a very good young man, and always lives with his mother."

"It shall be my business to find out that. And now, Mary, tell me truly. If he be a good young man, and if he loves you well enough to marry you, would you not be happier as his wife than you would as mine?"

There! The question that he wished to ask her had got itself asked at last. But if the asking had been difficult, how much more difficult must have been the answer! He had been thinking over all this for the last fortnight, and had hardly known how to come to a resolution. Now he put the matter before her without a moment's notice, and expected an instant decision. "Speak the truth, Mary—what you think about it—without minding what any body may say of you." But Mary could not say any thing, so she again burst into tears.

"Surely you know the state of your own heart, Mary?"

"I don't know," she answered.

"My only object is to secure your happiness—the happiness of both of us, that is."

"I'll do any thing you please," said Mary.

"Well, then, I'll tell you what I think. I fear that a marriage between us would not make either of us contented with our lives. I'm too old and too grave for you." Yet Mary Snow was not younger than Madeline Staveley. "You have been told to love me; and you think that you do love me because you wish to do what you think to be your duty. But I believe that people can never really love each other merely because they are told to do so. Of course I can not say what sort of a young man Mr. Fitzallen may be; but if I find that he is fit to take care of you, and that he has means to support you—with such little help as I can give—I shall be very happy to promote such an arrangement."

Every body will of course say that Felix Graham was base in not telling her that all this arose, not from her love affair with Albert Fitzallen, but from his own love affair with Madeline Staveley. But I am inclined to think that every body will be wrong. Had he told her openly that he did not care for her, but did care for some one else, he would have left her no alternative. As it was, he did not mean that she should have any alternative. But he probably consulted her feelings best in allowing her to think that she had a choice. And then, though he owed much to her, he owed nothing to her father; and had he openly declared his intention of breaking off the match because he had attached himself to some one else, he would have put himself terribly into her father's power. He was willing to submit to such pecuniary burden in the matter as his conscience told him that he ought to bear; but Mr. Snow's ideas on the subject of recompense might be extravagant; and therefore, as regarded Snow the father, he thought that he might make some slight and delicate use of the meeting under the lamp-post. In doing so he would be very careful to guard Mary from her father's anger. Indeed Mary would be surrendered, out of his own care, not to that of her father, but to the fostering love of the gentleman in the medical line of life.

"I'll do any thing that you please," said Mary, upon whose mind and heart all these changes had come with a suddenness which prevented her from thinking, much less speaking her thoughts.

"Perhaps you had better mention it to Mrs. Thomas."

"Oh, Mr. Graham, I'd rather not talk to her. I don't love her a bit."

"Well, I will not press it on you if you do not wish it. And have I your permission to speak to Mr. Fitzallen; and if he approves, to speak to his mother?"

"I'll do any thing you think best, Mr. Graham," said poor Mary. She was poor Mary; for though she had consented to meet a lover beneath the lamp-post she had not been without ambition, and had looked forward to the glory of being wife to such a man as Felix Graham. She did not, however, for one moment, entertain any idea of resistance to his will.

And then Felix left her, having of course an interview with Mrs. Thomas before he quitted the house. To her, however, he said nothing. "When any thing is settled, Mrs. Thomas, I will let you know." The words were so lacking in confidence that Mrs. Thomas, when she heard them, knew that the verdict had gone against her.

Felix for many months had been accustomed to take leave of Mary Snow with a kiss. But on this day he omitted to kiss her, and then Mary knew that it was all over with her ambition. But love still remained to her. "There is some one else who will be proud to kiss me," she said to herself, as she stood alone in the room when he closed the door behind him.

CHAPTER LV.

WHAT TOOK PLACE IN HARLEY STREET.

"Tom, I've come back again," said Mrs. Furnival, as soon as the dining-room door was closed behind her back.

"I'm very glad to see you; I am indeed," said he, getting up and putting out his hand to her. "But I really never knew why you went away."

"Oh yes, you know. I'm sure you know why I went. But—"

"I'll be shot if I did then."

"I went away because I did not like Lady Mason going to your chambers."

"Pshaw!"

"Yes; I know I was wrong, Tom. That is, I was wrong about that."

"Of course you were, Kitty."

"Well; don't I say I was? And I've come back again, and I beg your pardon; that is about the lady."

"Very well. Then there's an end of it."

"But, Tom, you know I've been provoked. Haven't I now? How often have you been home to dinner since you have been member of Parliament for that place?"

"I shall be more at home now, Kitty."

"Shall you indeed? Then I'll not say another word to vex you. What on earth can I want, Tom, except just that you should sit at home with me sometimes on evenings, as you used to do always in the old days? And as for Martha Biggs—"

"Is she come back too?"

"Oh dear no. She's in Red Lion Square. And I'm sure, Tom, I never had her here except when you wouldn't dine at home. I wonder whether you know how lonely it is to sit down to dinner all by one's self!"

"Why, I do it every other day of my life. And I never think of sending for Martha Biggs; I promise you that."

"She isn't very nice, I know," said Mrs. Furnival—"that is, for gentlemen."

"I should say not," said Mr. Furnival. Then the reconciliation had been effected, and Mrs. Furnival went up stairs to prepare for dinner, knowing that her husband would be present, and that Martha Biggs would not. And just as she was taking her accustomed place at the head of the table, almost ashamed to look up lest she should catch Spooner's eye, who was standing behind his master, Rachel went off in a cab to Orange Street, commissioned to pay what might be due for the lodgings, to bring back her mistress's boxes, and to convey the necessary tidings to Miss Biggs.

"Well I never!" said Martha, as she listened to Rachel's story.

"And they're quite loving, I can assure you," said Rachel.

"It'll never last," said Miss Biggs, triumphantly, "never. It's been done too sudden to last."

"So I'll say good-night, if you please, Miss Biggs," said Rachel, who was in a hurry to get back to Harley Street.

"I think she might have come here before she went there; especially as it wasn't any thing out of her way. She couldn't have gone shorter than Bloomsbury Square, and Russell Square, and over Tottenham Court Road."

"Missus didn't think of that, I dare say."

"She used to know the way about these parts well enough. But give her my love, Rachel." Then Martha Biggs was again alone, and she sighed deeply.

It was well that Mrs. Furnival came back so quickly to her own house, as it saved the scandal of any domestic quarrel before her daughter. On the following day Sophia returned, and as harmony was at that time reigning in Harley Street there was no necessity that she should be presumed to know any thing of what had occurred. That she did know—know exactly what her mother had done, and why she had done it, and how she had come back, leaving Martha Biggs dumfounded by her return—is very probable; for Sophia Furnival was a clever girl, and one who professed to understand the ins and outs of her own family—and perhaps of some other families. But she behaved very prettily to her papa and mamma on the occasion, never dropping a word which could lead either of them to suppose that she had interrogated Rachel, been confidential with the housemaid, conversed on the subject even with Spooner, and made a morning call on Martha Biggs herself.

There arose not unnaturally some conversation between the mother and daughter as to Lady Mason; not as to Lady Mason's visits to Lincoln's Inn, and their impropriety as formerly presumed—not at all as to that; but in respect to her present lamentable position and that engagement which had for a time existed between her and Sir Peregrine Orme. On this latter subject Mrs. Furnival had of course heard nothing during her interview with Mrs. Orme at Noningsby. At that time Lady Mason had formed the sole subject of conversation; but in explaining to Mrs. Furnival that there certainly could be no unhallowed feeling between her husband and the lady, Mrs. Orme had not thought it necessary to allude to Sir Peregrine's past intentions. Mrs. Furnival, however, had heard the whole matter discussed in the railway carriage, had since interrogated her husband—learning, however, not very much from him—and now inquired into all the details from her daughter.

"And she and Sir Peregrine were really to be married?" Mrs. Furnival, as she asked the question, thought with confusion of her own unjust accusations against the poor woman. Under such circumstances as those Lady Mason must of course have been innocent as touching Mr. Furnival.

"Yes," said Sophia. "There is no doubt whatsoever that they were engaged. Sir Peregrine told Lady Staveley so himself."

"And now it's all broken off again?"

"Oh yes; it is all broken off now. I believe the fact to be this: Lord Alston, who lives near Noningsby, is a very old friend of Sir Peregrine's. When he heard of it he went to The Cleeve—I know that for certain—and I think he talked Sir Peregrine out of it."

"But, my conscience, Sophia—after he had made her the offer!"

"I fancy that Mrs. Orme arranged it all. Whether Lord Alston saw her or not I don't know. My belief is that Lady Mason behaved very well all through, though they say very bitter things against her at Noningsby."

"Poor thing!" said Mrs. Furnival, the feelings of whose heart were quite changed as regarded Lady Mason.

"I never knew a woman so badly treated." Sophia had her own reasons for wishing to make the best of Lady Mason's case. "And for myself, I do not see why Sir Peregrine should not have married her if he pleased."

"He is rather old, my dear."

"People don't think so much about that nowadays as they used. If he liked it, and she too, who had a right to say any thing? My idea is that a man with any spirit would have turned Lord Alston out of the house. What business had he to interfere?"

"But about the trial, Sophia?"

"That will go on. There's no doubt about that. But they all say that it's the most unjust thing in the world, and that she must be proved innocent. I heard the judge say so myself."

"But why are they allowed to try her then?"

"Oh, papa will tell you that."

"I never like to bother your papa about law business." Particularly not, Mrs. Furnival, when he has a pretty woman for his client!

"My wonder is that she should make herself so unhappy about it," continued Sophia. "It seems that she is quite broken down."

"But won't she have to go and sit in the court—with all the people staring at her?"

"That won't kill her," said Sophia, who felt that she herself would not perish under any such process. "If I was sure that I was in the right, I think that I could hold up my head against all that. But they say that she is crushed to the earth."

"Poor thing!" said Mrs. Furnival. "I wish that I could do any thing for her." And in this way they talked the matter over very comfortably.

Two or three days after this Sophia Furnival was sitting alone in the drawing-room in Harley Street, when Spooner answered a double knock at the door, and Lucius Mason was shown up stairs. Mrs. Furnival had gone to make her peace in Red Lion Square, and there may perhaps be ground for supposing that Lucius had cause to expect that Miss Furnival might be seen at this hour without interruption. Be that as it may, she was found alone, and he was permitted to declare his purpose unmolested by father, mother, or family friends.

"You remember how we parted at Noningsby," said he, when their first greetings were well over.

"Oh yes; I remember it very well. I do not easily forget words such as were spoken then."

"You said that you would never turn away from me."

"Nor will I; that is, with reference to the matter as to which we were speaking."

"Is our friendship, then, to be confined to one subject?"

"By no means. Friendship can not be so confined, Mr. Mason. Friendship between true friends must extend to all the affairs of life. What I meant to say was this— But I am quite sure that you understand me without any explanation."

He did understand her. She meant to say that she had promised to him her sympathy and friendship, but nothing more. But then he had asked for nothing more. The matter of doubt within his own heart was this: Should he or should he not ask for more? and if he resolved on answering this question in the affirmative, should he ask for it now? He had determined that morning that he would come to some fixed purpose on this matter before he reached Harley Street. As he crossed out of Oxford Street from the omnibus he had determined that the present was no time for love-making. Walking up Regent Street, he had told himself that if he had one faithful heart to bear him company he could bear his troubles better; as he made his way along the north side of Cavendish Square he pictured to himself what would be the wound to his pride if he were rejected; and in passing the ten or twelve houses which intervened in Harley Street between the corner of the square and the abode of his mistress, he told himself that the question must be answered by circumstances.

"Yes, I understand you," he said. "And believe me in this—I would not for worlds encroach on your kindness. I knew that when I pressed your hand that night I pressed the hand of a friend, and nothing more."

"Quite so," said Sophia. Sophia's wit was usually ready enough, but at that moment she could not resolve with what words she might make the most appropriate reply to her friend. What she did say was rather lame, but it was not dangerous.

"Since that I have suffered a great deal," said Lucius. "Of course you know that my mother has been staying at The Cleeve?"

"Oh yes. I believe she left it only a day or two since."

"And you heard, perhaps, of her— I hardly know how to tell you, if you have not heard it."

"If you mean about Sir Peregrine, I have heard of that."

"Of course you have. All the world has heard of it." And Lucius Mason got up and walked about the room holding his hand to his brow. "All the world are talking about it. Miss Furnival, you have never known what it is to blush for a parent."

Miss Furnival at the moment felt a sincere hope that Mr. Mason might never hear of Mrs. Furnival's visit to the neighborhood of Orange Street and of the causes which led to it, and by no means thought it necessary to ask for her friend's sympathy on that subject. "No," said she, "I never have; nor need you do so for yours. Why should not Lady Mason have married Sir Peregrine Orme, if they both thought such a marriage fitting?"

"What! at such a time as this, with these dreadful accusations running in her ears? Surely this was no time for marrying! And what has come of it? People now say that he has rejected her, and sent her away."

"Oh no; they can not say that."

"But they do. It is reported that Sir Peregrine has sent her away because he thinks her to be guilty. That I do not believe. No honest man, no gentleman, could think her guilty. But is it not dreadful that such things should be said?"

"Will not the trial take place very shortly now? When that is once over all these troubles will be at an end."

"Miss Furnival, I sometimes think that my mother will hardly have strength to sustain the trial. She is so depressed that I almost fear her mind will give way; and the worst of it is that I am altogether unable to comfort her."

"Surely that at present should specially be your task."

"I can not do it. What should I say to her? I think that she is wrong in what she is doing; thoroughly, absolutely wrong. She has got about her a parcel of lawyers. I beg your pardon, Miss Furnival, but you know I do not mean such as your father."

"But has not he advised it?"

"If so, I can not but think he is wrong. They are the very scum of the jails; men who live by rescuing felons from the punishment they deserve. What can my mother require of such services as theirs? It is they that frighten her and make her dread all manner of evils. Why should a woman who knows herself to be good and just fear any thing that the law can do to her?"

"I can easily understand that such a position as hers must be very dreadful. You must not be hard upon her, Mr. Mason, because she is not as strong as you might be."

"Hard upon her! Ah, Miss Furnival, you do not know me. If she would only accept my love I would wait upon her as a mother does upon her infant. No labor would be too much for me; no care would be too close. But her desire is that this affair should never be mentioned between us. We are living now in the same house, and though I see that this is killing her, yet I may not speak of it." Then he got up from his chair, and as he walked about the room he took his handkerchief from his pocket and wiped his eyes.

"I wish I could comfort you," said she. And in saying so she spoke the truth. By nature she was not tender-hearted, but now she did sympathize with him. By nature, too, she was not given to any deep affection, but she did feel some spark of love for Lucius Mason. "I wish I could comfort you." And as she spoke she also got up from her chair.

"And you can," said he, suddenly stopping himself and coming close to her. "You can comfort me—in some degree. You, and you only can do so. I know this is no time for declarations of love. Were it not that we are already so much to each other, I would not indulge myself at such a moment with such a wish. But I have no one whom I can love; and—it is very hard to bear." And then he stood, waiting for her answer, as though he conceived that he had offered her his hand.

But Miss Furnival well knew that she had received no offer. "If my warmest sympathy can be of service to you—"

"It is your love I want," he said, taking her hand as she spoke. "Your love, so that I may look on you as my wife; your acceptance of my love, so that we may be all in all to each other. There is my hand. I stand before you now as sad a man as there is in all London. But there is my hand—will you take it and give me yours in pledge of your love?"

I should be unjust to Lucius Mason were I to omit to say that he played his part with a becoming air. Unhappiness and a melancholy mood suited him perhaps better than the world's ordinary good-humor. He was a man who looked his best when under a cloud, and shone the brightest when every thing about him was dark. And Sophia also was not unequal to the occasion. There was, however, this difference between them. Lucius was quite honest in all that he said and did upon the occasion; whereas Miss Furnival was only half honest. Perhaps she was not capable of a higher pitch of honesty than that.

"There is my hand," said she; and they stood holding each other, palm to palm.

"And with it your heart?" said Lucius.

"And with it my heart," answered Sophia. Nor as she spoke did she hesitate for a moment, or become embarrassed, or lose her command of feature. Had Augustus Staveley gone through the same ceremony at Noningsby in the same way I am inclined to think that she would have made the same answer. Had neither done so, she would not on that account have been unhappy. What a blessed woman would Lady Staveley have been had she known what was being done in Harley Street at this moment!

In some short rhapsody of love it may be presumed that Lucius indulged himself when he found that the affair which he had in hand had so far satisfactorily arranged itself. But he was in truth too wretched at heart for any true enjoyment of the delights of a favored suitor. They were soon engaged again on that terrible subject, seated side by side indeed and somewhat close, but the tone of their voices and their very words were hardly different from what they might have been had no troth been plighted between them. His present plan was that Sophia should visit Orley Farm for a time, and take that place of dear and bosom friend which a woman circumstanced as was his mother must so urgently need. We, my readers, know well who was now that loving friend, and we know also which was best fitted for such a task, Sophia Furnival or Mrs. Orme. But we have had, I trust, better means of reading the characters of those ladies than had fallen to the lot of Lucius Mason, and should not be angry with him because his eyes were dark.

Sophia hesitated a moment before she answered this proposition—not as though she were slack in her love, or begrudged her services to his mother; but it behooved her to look carefully at the circumstances before she would pledge herself to such an arrangement as that. If she went to Orley Farm on such a mission would it not be necessary to tell her father and mother; nay, to tell all the world that she was engaged to Lucius Mason; and would it be wise to make such a communication at the present moment? Lucius said a word to her of going into court with his mother, and sitting with her, hand in hand, while that ordeal was passing by. In the publicity of such sympathy there was something that suited the bearings of Miss Furnival's mind. The idea that Lady Mason was guilty had never entered her head, and therefore, on this she thought there could be no disgrace in such a proceeding. But nevertheless, might it not be prudent to wait till that trial were over?

"If you are my wife you must be her daughter; and how can you better take a daughter's part?" pleaded Lucius.

"No, no; and I would do it with my whole heart. But, Lucius, does she know me well enough? It is of her that we must think. After all that you have told me, can we think that she would wish me to be there?"

It was his desire that his mother should learn to have such a wish, and this he explained to her. He himself could do but little at home because he could not yield his opinion on those matters of importance as to which he and his mother differed so vitally; but if she had a woman with her in the house—such a woman as his own Sophia—then he thought her heart would be softened, and part of her sorrow might be assuaged.

Sophia at last said that she would think about it. It would be improper, she said, to pledge herself to any thing rashly. It might be that as her father was to defend Lady Mason, he might on that account object to his daughter being in the court. Lucius declared that this would be unreasonable; unless indeed Mr. Furnival should object to his daughter's engagement. And might he not do so? Sophia thought it very probable that he might. It would make no difference in her, she said. Her engagement would be equally binding—as permanently binding, let who would object to it. And as she made this declaration there was of course a little love scene. But for the present, it might be best that in this matter she should obey her father. And then she pointed out how fatal it might be to avert her father from the cause while the trial was still pending. Upon the whole she acted her part very prudently, and when Lucius left her she was pledged to nothing but that one simple fact of a marriage engagement.

CHAPTER LVI.

HOW SIR PEREGRINE DID BUSINESS WITH MR. ROUND.

IN the mean time Sir Peregrine was sitting at home trying to determine in what way he should act under the present emergency, actuated as he was on one side by friendship, and on the other by duty. For the first day or two—nay, for the first week after the confession had been made to him—he had been so astounded, had been so knocked to the earth, and had remained in such a state of bewilderment that it had been impossible for him to form for himself any line of conduct. His only counselor had been Mrs. Orme; and though he could not analyze the matter, he felt that her woman's ideas of honor and honesty were in some way different from his ideas as a man. To her the sorrows and utter misery of Lady Mason seemed of greater weight than her guilt. At least such was the impression which her words left. Mrs. Orme's chief anxiety in the matter still was that Lady Mason should be acquitted; as strongly so now as when they both believed her to be as guiltless as themselves. But Sir Peregrine could not look at it in this light. He did not say that he wished that she might be found guilty; nor did he wish it. But he did announce his opinion to his daughter-in-law that the ends of justice would so be best promoted, and that if the matter were driven to a trial it would not be for the honor of the court that a false verdict should be given. Nor would he believe that such a false verdict could be obtained. An English judge and an English jury were to him the Palladium of discerning truth. In an English court of law such a matter could not remain dark; nor ought it, let whatever misery betide. It was strange how that old man should have lived so near the world for seventy years, should have taken his place in Parliament and on the bench, should have rubbed his shoulders so constantly against those of his neighbors, and yet have retained so strong a reliance on the purity of the world in general. Here and there such a man may still be found, but the number is becoming very few.

As for the property, that must of necessity be abandoned. Lady Mason had signified her agreement to this; and therefore he was so far willing that she should be saved from further outward punishment, if that were still possible. His plan was this; and to his thinking it was the only plan that was feasible. Let the estate be at once given up to the proper owner—even now, before the day of trial should come; and then let them trust, not to Joseph Mason, but to Joseph Mason's advisers to abstain from prosecuting the offender. Even this course he knew to be surrounded by a thousand difficulties; but it might be possible. Of Mr. Round, old Mr. Round, he had heard a good report. He was a kind man, and even in this very matter had behaved in a way that had shamed his client. Might it not be possible that Mr. Round would engage to drop the prosecution if the immediate return of the property were secured? But to effect this must he not tell Mr. Round of the woman's guilt? And could he manage it himself? Must he not tell Mr. Furnival? And by so doing, would he not rob Lady Mason of her sole remaining tower of strength? for if Mr. Furnival knew that she was guilty, Mr. Furnival must of course abandon her cause. And then Sir Peregrine did not know how to turn himself, as he thus argued the matter within his own bosom.

And then too his own disgrace sat very heavy on him. Whether or no the law might pronounce Lady Mason to have been guilty, all the world would know her guilt. When that property should be abandoned, and her wretched son turned out to earn his bread, it would be well understood that she had been guilty. And this was the woman, this midnight forger, whom he had taken to his bosom, and asked to be his wife! He had asked her, and she had consented, and then he had proclaimed the triumph of his love to all the world. When he stood there holding her to his breast he had been proud of her affection. When Lord Alston had come to him with his caution he had scorned his old friend and almost driven him from his door. When his grandson had spoken a word, not to him but to another, he had been full of wrath. He had let it be known widely that he would feel no shame in showing her to the world as Lady Orme. And now she was a forger, and a perjurer, and a thief—a thief who for long years had lived on the proceeds of her dextrous theft. And yet was he not under a deep obligation to her—under the very deepest? Had she not saved him from a worse disgrace; saved him at the cost of all that was left to herself? Was he not still bound to stand by her? And did he not still love her?

Poor Sir Peregrine! May we not say that it would have been well for him if the world and all its trouble could have now been ended so that he might have done with it?

Mrs. Orme was his only counselor, and though she could not be brought to agree with him in all his feelings, yet she was of infinite comfort to him. Had she not shared with him this terrible secret his mind would have given way beneath the burden. On the day after Lady Mason's departure from The Cleeve he sat for an hour in the library considering what he would do, and then he sent for his daughter-in-law. If it behooved him to take any step to stay the trial he must take it at once. The matter had been pressed on by each side, and now the days might be counted up to that day on which the judges would arrive in Alston. That trial would be very terrible to him in every way. He had promised, during those pleasant hours of his love and sympathy in which he had felt no doubt as to his friend's acquittal, that he would stand by her when she was arraigned. That was now impossible, and though he had not dared to mention it to Lady Mason he knew that she would not expect that he should do so. But to Mrs. Orme he had spoken on the matter, and she had declared her purpose of taking the place which it would not now become him to fill! Sir Peregrine had started from his chair when she had so spoken. What! his daughter! She, the purest of the pure, to whom the very air of a court of law would be a contamination—she, whose whiteness had never been sullied by contact with the world's dust—she set by the side of that terrible criminal, hand in hand with her, present to all the world as her bosom friend! There had been but few words between them on the matter, but Sir Peregrine had felt strongly that that might not be permitted. Far better than that it would be that he should humble his gray hairs and sit there to be gazed at by the crowd. But on all accounts how much was it to be desired that there should be no trial!

"Sit down, Edith," he said, as with her soft step she came up to him. "I find that the assizes will be here, in Alston, at the end of next month."

"So soon as that, father?"

"Yes; look here: the judges will come in on the 25th of March."

"Ah me—that is very sudden! But, father, will it not be best for her that it should be over?"

Mrs. Orme still thought, had always thought, that the trial itself was unavoidable. Indeed she had thought, and she did think, that it afforded to Lady Mason the only possible means of escape. Her mind on the subject, if it could have been analyzed, would probably have been this. As to the property, that question must for the present stand in abeyance. It is quite right that it should go to its detestable owners—that it should be made over to them at some day not very distant. But for the present, the trial for that old, long-distant crime was the subject for them to consider. Could it be wrong to wish for an acquittal for the sinner—an acquittal before this world's bar, seeing that a true verdict had undoubtedly been given before another bar? Mrs. Orme trusted that no jury would convict her friend. Let Lady Mason go through that ordeal; and then, when the law had declared her innocent, let restitution be made.

"It will be very terrible to all if she be condemned," said Sir Peregrine.

"Very terrible! But Mr. Furnival—"

"Edith, if it comes to that, she will be condemned. Mr. Furnival is a lawyer, and will not say so; but from his countenance, when he speaks of her, I know that he expects it!"

"Oh, father, do not say so."

"But if it is so— My love, what is the purport of these courts of law if it be not to discover the truth and make it plain to the light of day?" Poor Sir Peregrine! His innocence in this respect was perhaps beautiful, but it was very simple. Mr. Aram, could he have been induced to speak out his mind plainly, would have expressed, probably, a different opinion.

"But she escaped before," said Mrs. Orme, who was clearly at present on the same side with Mr. Aram.

"Yes; she did—by perjury, Edith. And now the penalty of that further crime awaits her. There was an old poet who said that the wicked man rarely escapes at last. I believe in my heart that he spoke the truth."

"Father, that old poet knew nothing of our faith."

Sir Peregrine could not stop to explain, even if he knew how to do so, that the old poet spoke of punishment in this world, whereas the faith on which his daughter relied is efficacious for pardon beyond the grave. It would be much, ay, in one sense every thing, if Lady Mason could be brought to repent of the sin she had committed; but no such repentance would stay the bitterness of Joseph Mason or of Samuel Dockwrath. If the property were at once restored, then repentance might commence. If the property were at once restored, then the trial might be stayed. It might be possible that Mr. Round might so act. He felt all this, but he could not argue on it. "I think, my dear," he said, "that I had better see Mr. Round."

"But you will not tell him?" said Mrs. Orme, sharply.

"No; I am not authorized to do that."

"But he will entice it from you! He is a lawyer, and he will wind any thing out from a plain, chivalrous man of truth and honor."

"My dear, Mr. Round I believe is a good man."

"But if he asks you the question, what will you say?"

"I will tell him to ask me no such question."

"Oh, father, be careful. For her sake be careful. How is it that you know the truth—or that I know it? She told it here because in that way only could she save you from that marriage. Father, she has sacrificed herself for—for us."

Sir Peregrine, when this was said to him, got up from his chair and walked away to the window. He was not angry with her that she so spoke to him. Nay; he acknowledged inwardly the truth of her words, and loved her for her constancy. But, nevertheless, they were very bitter. How had it come to pass that he was thus indebted to so deep a criminal? What had he done for her but good?

"Do not go from me," she said, following him. "Do not think me unkind."

"No, no, no," he answered, striving almost ineffectually to repress a sob. "You are not unkind."

For two days after that not a word was spoken between them on the subject, and then he did go to Mr. Round. Not a word on the subject was spoken between Sir Peregrine and Mrs. Orme; but she was twice at Orley Farm during the time, and told Lady Mason of the steps which her father-in-law was taking. "He won't betray me!" Lady Mason had said. Mrs. Orme had answered this with what best assurance she should give; but in her heart of hearts she feared that Sir Peregrine would betray the secret.

It was not a pleasant journey for Sir Peregrine. Indeed it may be said that no journeys could any longer be pleasant for him. He was old and worn and feeble; very much older and much more worn than he had been at the period spoken of in the commencement of this story, though but a few months had passed over his head since that time. For him now it would have been preferable to remain in the arm-chair by the fire-side in his own library, receiving such comfort in his old age as might come to him from the affection of his daughter-in-law and grandson. But he thought that it behooved him to do this work; and therefore, old and feeble as he was, he set himself to his task. He reached the station in London, had himself driven to Bedford Row in a cab, and soon found himself in the presence of Mr. Round.

There was much ceremonial talk between them before Sir Peregrine could bring himself to declare the purport which had brought him there. Mr. Round of course protested that he was very sorry for all this affair. The case was not in his hands personally. He had hoped many years since that the matter was closed. His client, Mr. Mason of Groby Park, had insisted that it should be reopened; and now he, Mr. Round, really hardly knew what to say about it.

"But, Mr. Round, do you think it is quite impossible that the trial should even now be abandoned?" asked Sir Peregrine, very carefully.

"Well, I fear it is. Mason thinks that the property is his, and is determined to make another struggle for it. I am imputing nothing wrong to the lady. I really am not in a position to have any opinion of my own—"

"No, no, no; I understand. Of course your firm is bound to do the best it can for its client. But, Mr. Round—I know I am quite safe with you."

"Well; safe in one way I hope you are. But, Sir Peregrine, you must of course remember that I am the attorney for the other side—for the side to which you are opposed."

"But still—all that you can want is your client's interest."

"Of course we desire to serve his interest."

"And with that view, Mr. Round, is it not possible that we might come to some compromise?"

"What—by giving up part of the property?"

"By giving up all the property," said Sir Peregrine, with considerable emphasis.

"Whew—w—w!" Mr. Round at the moment made no other answer than this, which terminated in a low whistle.

"Better that at once than that she should die broken-hearted," said Sir Peregrine.

There was then silence between them for a minute or two, after which Mr. Round, turning himself round in his chair so as to face his visitor more fully, spoke as follows: "I told you just now, Sir Peregrine, that I was Mr. Mason's attorney; and I must now tell you, that, as regards this interview between you and me, I will not hold myself as being in that position. What you have said shall be as though it had not been said; and as I am not myself taking any part in the proceedings, this may with absolute strictness be the case. But—"

"If I have said any thing that I ought not to have said—" began Sir Peregrine.

"Allow me for one moment," continued Mr. Round. "The fault is mine, if there be a fault, as I should have explained to you that the matter could hardly be discussed with propriety between us."

"Mr. Round, I offer you my apology from the bottom of my heart."

"No, Sir Peregrine. You shall offer me no apology, nor will I accept any. I know no words strong enough to convey to you my esteem and respect for your character."

"Sir!"

"But I will ask you to listen to me for a moment. If any compromise be contemplated, it should be arranged by the advice of Mr. Furnival and of Mr. Chaffanbrass, and the terms should be settled between Mr. Aram and my son. But I can not myself say that I see any possibility of such a result. It is not, however, for me to advise. If on that matter you wish for advice, I think that you had better see Mr. Furnival."

"Ah!" said Sir Peregrine, telling more and more of the story by every utterance he made.

"And now it only remains for me to assure you once more that the words which have been spoken in this room shall be as though they had not been spoken." And then Mr. Round made it very clear that there was nothing more to be said between them on the subject of Lady Mason. Sir Peregrine repeated his apology, collected his hat and gloves, and with slow step made his way down to his cab, while Mr. Round absolutely waited upon him till he saw him seated within the vehicle.

"So Mat is right after all!" said the old attorney to himself as he stood alone with his back to his own fire, thrusting his hands into his trowsers-pockets. "So Mat is right after all!" The meaning of this exclamation will be plain to my readers. Mat had declared to his father his conviction that Lady Mason had forged the codicil in question, and the father was now also convinced that she had done so. "Unfortunate woman!" he said; "poor, wretched woman!" And then he began to calculate what might yet be her chances of escape. On the whole he thought that she would escape. "Twenty years of possession," he said to himself; "and so excellent a character!" But, nevertheless, he repeated to himself over and over again that she was a wretched, miserable woman.

We may say that all the persons most concerned were convinced, or nearly convinced, of Lady Mason's guilt. Among her own friends Mr. Furnival had no doubt of it, and Mr. Chaffanbrass and Mr. Aram but very little; whereas Sir Peregrine and Mrs. Orme of course had none. On the other side, Mr. Mason and Mr. Dockwrath were both fully sure of the truth, and the two Rounds, father and son, were quite of the same mind. And yet, except with Dockwrath and Sir Peregrine, the most honest and the most dishonest of the lot, the opinion was that she would escape. These were five lawyers concerned, not one of whom gave to the course of justice credit that it would ascertain the truth, and not one of whom wished that the truth should be ascertained. Surely had they been honest-minded in their profession they would have all so wished—have so wished, or else have abstained from all professional intercourse in the matter. I can not understand how any gentleman can be willing to use his intellect for the propagation of untruth, and to be paid for so using it. As to Mr. Chaffanbrass and Mr. Solomon Aram—to them the escape of a criminal under their auspices would of course be a matter of triumph. To such work for many years had they applied their sharp intellects and legal knowledge. But of Mr. Furnival—what shall we say of him?

Sir Peregrine went home very sad at heart, and crept silently back into his own library. In the evening, when he was alone with Mrs. Orme, he spoke one word to her. "Edith," he said, "I have seen Mr. Round. We can do nothing for her there."

"I feared not," said she.

"No; we can do nothing for her there."

After that Sir Peregrine took no step in the matter. What step could he take? But he sat over his fire in his library, day after day, thinking over it all, and waiting till those terrible as-sizes should have come.

CONCERNING LAUGHTER.

LAUGHTER, sleep, and hope are the three bounties with which kind mother Nature compensates us for the troubles of a life which few, perhaps, would accept if they were asked beforehand. Sancho blessed the man who invented sleep, wherein the Hindoos are with him, who say "it is better to sit than to stand; better to lie down than to sit; better to sleep than to wake;" but they go one step beyond the illustrious Governor of Barrataria, and add "better to die than to live." The ancients seem to have set Hope before sleep, and left her as the one blessing in Pandora's box. "Spiro—spero," say the Italians yet. The ancients, indeed, seem to have had but a poor notion of that blessing which the good Sancho enjoyed so thoroughly, in common with other men of a good conscience and a healthy digestion. Zeno called sleep the image of death; and death to too many of the old philosophers meant annihilation.

Animals sleep—dogs even dream; and who shall say that the cat prowling for mice, or the young lions "seeking their prey of God," are not animated by hope? But man alone laughs. There is, to be sure, a "horse-laugh," but it is the explosion, not of the horse, but of the hostler; and that curious Australian bird, called the "laughing jackass," is not a jackass, and—brays. Man is a laughing animal, and laughter should be reckoned one of the four cardinal virtues. Plato's featherless biped—proud, erect, reasoning, talking—has perhaps but two great capacities to distinguish him from the plucked rooster which put Plato's definition to blush: he laughs and he commits suicide. A cynical Frenchman remarks, on this head, that animals were not made capable of laughter, because they were created before man, and had therefore nothing to laugh at!

I should perhaps add another distinctive feature of humanity—we alone are subject to nose-bleed. As for tears, we have them in common with the elephant and the crocodile; and Father Homer even lets the horses of Achilles shed tears at the death of Patroclus. The great moose, the camel, the seal, and even the common deer are capable of tears; and when we see how horses and dogs are ill-treated, one wishes that these "dear companions" could revenge themselves as easily as our womankind, with "a good cry."

It is an old proverb that laughter is akin to tears; and, according to Doctor Lemprière, the one seems to have grown very naturally out of the other: When Momus was born he filled all Olympus with his lusty cries; all the goddesses hastened to appease the terrible child; and Jupiter, who could not look without inextinguishable laughter at his last creature—Man—at once dedicated to him the weeping clown.

Almost every philosopher has felt it his duty to attempt a definition of "Man." Franklin calls us tool-making animals; Boswell, who was a gourmand, said, "Man is a cooking animal"—and, indeed, it would not be so far wrong to call most cooks animals. A Frenchman wrote: "L'homme est un animal qui crache—[Man is an animal that spits]," a definition which applies perhaps more especially to our "Southern brethren." But for a good solid definition, which will withstand all criticism, I here offer, "Man is a laughing animal." It may be urged that monkeys grin—but a grin is not a laugh; and if it were, let us not forget that Linnæus counted man and the long-armed ape (homo Lar) as one species; while Dr. Darwin warns us not rashly to cast off our cousin Jacko. Rousseau saw in the West African Pongo the original of man; and though he continued in his sober moments to walk upon his "hind legs," urged the advantages of quadrupedal locomotion so eloquently, that Voltaire writes him he was "often moved by the reading to run about on all fours at Ferney." The Pavian physician, Moscati, ascribed to our upright carriage many of the diseases to which mankind is subject, particularly palpitation of the heart, hypochondria, consumption, swelled feet, liver complaint, and rupture, the happy exemption of animals from which he ascribes to their horizontal posture. It may be added that, like most physicians, he did not take his own prescriptions. It is undeniable that the surest footing is upon all fours, as you may see in a rickety table or a three-legged stool; but the fine art of walking upon the hind legs, which monkeys so unsuccessfully practice, has yet—by long use, Mr. Darwin would say—become second nature with us; and a close observer may find many points wherein our grinning cousin comes nearer to us than in this—as, for instance, in South America monkeys are trapped by people who expose in their haunts vessels filled with intoxicating liquor, which Jacko drinking falls victim to his imprudence, as happens sometimes to young gentlemen from the country making their first visit to the city. For the rest: "Simia homo sine cauda, pedibus posticis ambulans, gregarius, omnivorus, inquietus, mendax, furax, salax, pugnax, artium variarum capax, animalium reliquorum hostis, sui ipsius inimicus teterimus."

Laughter is a pleasing convulsive motion of the organs of breathing, a convulsion of the facial and abdominal muscles, and an expression of joy and comfort, as tears are the expression of grief and pain. Extremes meet; and as immoderate laughter forces a flow of tears, so great grief often finds its expression in that unnatural laughter which we call hysterical. Novalis calls laughter venous and tears arterial. How near akin laughter is to tears was shown when Rubens, with a single stroke of his brush, turned a laughing child in a painting to one crying; and our mothers, without being great painters, have often brought us, in like manner, from joy to grief by a single stroke.

It has been noticed that children cry before they laugh. Aristotle maintains that they do not laugh before their fortieth day; and St. Cyprian asserts that they weep for the rite of baptism. The ancients held the laughter of young children to be a good omen; and it is related that Zoroaster laughed on the day of his birth, which is probably as true as that other story that the violent beating of his brain threw the nurse's hand from his head. Gargantua, that he might not vex the philosophers who held with Aristotle, put off laughing till after his fortieth day; but, in revenge, cried out constantly, "Au boire—[Give me to drink]!"

The Rabbins maintained that the smiling infant was possessed of Lilis, that famous she-devil who led poor Adam such a life; we Christians have a fond faith that the whisper of angels causes the unconscious smile; but doctors, who are matter-of-fact beings, pretend that it is the effect of wind.

If animals can not laugh, neither do they keep the world awake with their cries. They have other expressions for the joy they feel: dogs wag their tails, the cat purrs, and birds—the most joyous of creatures—twitter; old hens even sing. It is as true of laughter what the ancients said of tears, "Lacrima nil citius crescit—[Nothing comes quicker than tears];" and this is especially true of women, who are like a spring day, all rain and sunshine. It is odd that the physical causes of both are yet unknown; as also of that perhaps more mysterious phenomenon—the blush, concerning which a cynical Frenchman asked the puzzling question whether young ladies also blush in the dark? a question which I do not propose to answer.

Aristotle and Pliny held that laughter was an affection of the skin, and French physiologists assigned it to the spleen—as, indeed, the French yet say, S'épanouir la rate, désopiler la rate, as equivalents for to make merry. The English, on the other hand, speak of laughing heartily; and the Spaniards have a phrase, for forced mirth—"To laugh from the teeth outward," which is not so far amiss, when we remember that there are not only musculi risorii, but dentes risorii. When we sigh we draw air into our lungs, but laughter violently expels the air. Laughter draws backward the corners of the mouth, draws up the upper lip—especially in young women who have pretty teeth—wrinkles the cheeks, smooths the brow, causes the eyes to sparkle, and draws down the corners of the eyebrows, while the cheeks swell so that, in those fat persons who are given to laughter, one scarce sees the eyes. At the same time the veins of the neck swell, and the blood rushes with pleasant violence to the head, the heart, and the lungs. These are the phenomena of laughter, which, if unduly increased, are capable of endangering life. It is curious that we read only among the ancients and the French of people laughing themselves to death. We Americans have either more jokes, or a poorer appreciation of wit. Zeuxis is said to have died of laughing at a painting of an old woman, his own handiwork. Philemon expired of a donkey who so contentedly ate the philosopher's figs that, with his last articulate breath, he sent out a glass of wine to the beast, who drank it with equal enjoyment, and thus proved himself, it seems to me, not such a donkey after all. Pomponius Mela has a story of a blessed island in which were two springs, at one of which mortals could imbibe till they laughed themselves to death, when a swallow of the other restored them to life again.

To judge from the title of a book I once met in a French catalogue, many great men must have died of laughing; it was a list of famous men who have expired of laughter, by one R. Texter, whose name is less famous than doubtless it deserves to be. I have never met with the book, but without it the catalogue of dissertations de risu is sufficiently great. For the inquiring reader's benefit I may say that the best I know on the subject is by a French physician, Roy, entitled "Traité medico-philosophique sur le Rire," Paris, 1810, in 950 pages octavo; and the worst and least interesting "Bonifacii Historia Ludicra," printed at Basle, in 1756.

In an essay in the Guardian laughing is defined to be "an agreeable kind of convulsion, a symptom of inward satisfaction;" and those who practice it are divided into dimplers, smilers, laughers, grinners, horse-laughers, and sneerers. This is to lay down a science of laughing, for which there might be need, if General M'Clellan or General Beauregard should take up the idea of old Bulow, who proposed to form troops, in face of the enemy, in line of battle, and order them to advance with their arms at a shoulder and salute the foe with ringing bursts of laughter. "Be sure," said Bulow, "that your opponents, surprised and dismayed at this astonishing salute, would turn about and run off." This plan, perhaps, would not do so well while the present long-range artillery is used; but as nothing is too absurd to succeed once, it is related as matter of fact that the Mamelukes once turned tail from an assault upon the French in Egypt, on hearing the roar of laughter with which Napoleon's veterans greeted the command—" Un carré, les ânes et les savans au milieu—Form in square, asses and men of science in the centre."

Since Adam, who invented laughter—doubtless when he awoke and saw Eve by his side—no two men have laughed alike. The laugh is as distinct as the voice; perhaps more so, for the laugh of a full-bearded man is very different from that which he laughs when he has been clean shaven by a barber. Women laugh differently from men, children from women, and some writers even profess to detect national peculiarities in the laugh; as for instance, say they, the Frenchman laughs with his teeth, like the apes. The Abbé Damasceni thought he had discovered, in the various enunciations of laughter, a sure guide to the temperaments of the laughers. Thus he said Ha ha ha belonged to a choleric man, He he he to the phlegmatic, Hi hi hi to the melancholic, and Ho ho ho to the sanguine. It is true that men laugh commonly in A and O, and women in E and I; and it is singular that with all people, even the cockneys, the aspirate, H, precedes the vowel.

The old theologians held laughter to be one of the consequences of the first sin, and believed that Adam did not laugh till he was driven out of Paradise. They avoided laughter as unholy; but they forgot that it is written "the Lord Sabaoth laugheth them to scorn." The old literatists held to the words, "Woe unto you who laugh;" and the second council of Carthage forbade, with an anathema, all "verba jocularia risum moventia." Pope Innocent III. wrote, "New-born children cry, the boys in A, and the girls in E, mourning together over the sins of Adam and Eve." But, on the other hand, the Dominicans of Luther's time declared that they could hear the poor souls in purgatory laugh every time a coin rang in their begging dish. If we may believe Pliny and Ælian, there were even men among the ancients who abjured laughter, as Phocion, Anaxagoras, Heraclitus, and Cato. Lucilius Crassus was called the never-laughing, because he laughed but once in his life, and then at a very silly conceit of his own: he saw a donkey eating thistles, and saying "Rough lips, a rough salad," guffawed at this flimsy conceit. But father Homer calls Venus the laughter-loving and Pluto the never-laughing, and perhaps the loveliest passage in the Iliad is that where Hector and Andromache laugh at their boy hiding his face in fear of his father's nodding plumes. The old Greeks and Romans were laughers. The Greeks called the roar of angry waves the laughter of Neptune; Catullus says of the flowers, "domus jucundo risit adore;" and Virgil speaks of Jove, "risit pater optimus."

Great men have often fancied it a part of greatness to refrain from hilarity. Philip IV. of Spain is said to have laughed outright but once in his life, when his bride, Anne of Austria, wept at hearing that the Queens of Spain had no feet. She took with German literalness an old piece of overwrought Spanish courtesy. As she was journeying toward Spain some German nuns met her, and desired to present some stockings of their own knitting. The worthy princess was about to accept the gift when a Spanish grandee of her suite interfered, with the remark that it would be against etiquette, as the Queens of Spain were not supposed to have any use for stockings! whereat the princess began to weep—understanding, poor lady, that on her arrival in Madrid her feet would be cut off. Lord Chesterfield said, "Nobody has seen me laugh since I have come to use my reason;" and Congreve makes his Lord Froth, in the Double Dealer, say, "When I laugh I always laugh alone."

Nevertheless, the singer Robert gave lessons in laughter in Paris and London in 1805, and with considerable success—so far as filling his own purse went. He held that men and women could not laugh "decently and systematically" without proper training; and said that a person who could laugh in but one tone seemed to him like one who could say only oui and non; but that a trained laugh could express many things without words, and would often thus be spared the utterance of unpleasant words.

Young people and fools laugh easily, says an old proverb, which has often proved itself true; and with such, a great incentive to merriment is, that it is forbidden. Some young French naval officers once accompanied their captain to an audience of Pope Benedict XIV. When they came to kiss the sacred Pontifical toe they could not keep in their mirth. The captain looked on with rage and embarrassment, but the good Benedict said, "Never mind them; I am, to be sure, Pope, but I have not the power to keep Frenchmen from laughing." The Tyrrinthians consulted an oracle for a cure for the incessant laughter which afflicted them. "Throw an ox into the sea, in honor of Neptune, without laughing," was the reply; but they found obedience impossible, for as they were leading the animal along a boy joined the procession, and when the grave elders drove him away, cried out, "Do you fear that I want to eat your ox?" Whereat the assembly roared—and returned home.

However would-be-great men pretend to scorn laughter, it remains true that a good laugh is ever an honest fellow; and that laughter is good for the health we have an old proverb to prove: Laugh and grow fat. Think of honest Jack Falstaff, of Sancho Panza, of Dr. Slop—all fat, all dearly beloved. "When a man smiles, and much more when he laughs, it adds something to his fragment of life," says Sterne—who wished laughter enumerated in the materia medica, as an eminent English physician used to prescribe to his patients suffering from melancholy "3—4 pp. Peregrine Pickle;" and the great Sydenham maintained that the arrival of a clown in a village was as wholesome as that of twenty donkeys laden with drugs. Tissot, the famous French physician, cured consumptions and liver complaints by causing his patients to laugh; Erasmus, through immoderate laughter at the rude Latin of Hutten's "Letters of Obscure Men," broke an internal abscess which had long plagued him; and one of the Abderites was so grateful for his health, restored by laughter at the whimsies of a donkey, that he took the name Onogelastes, and called his son Onobolus, and his grandson Onomemnon. Honest laughter is a curative of the same kind as coughing, sneezing, and perhaps vomiting—only pleasanter than any of these; and a cheerful frame of mind has kept many a traveler in sound health when his companions were dying around him. Stedman, the explorer of Surinam, says that he escaped all the diseases of that deadly climate by bathing, singing, laughing, and, "God forgive me," he adds, "cursing," which last I by no means recommend.

FAILING LOVE.

"YOUR face has lost something, Helen. What is it?"

There was a look of concern in the speaker's inquiring eyes.

"Ten years have passed, dear friend!" answered the lady.

"Ten years of sunshine—fruitful years—Helen, should give the heart an abundant store of corn and wine. Your hives are full of honey."

The shade fell deeper on Helen's face.

"I am pained at this," said the friend. "Your letters have not betrayed the existence of a secret trouble."

"I was guarded."

"Guarded!"

"You know," answered Helen, rallying herself, and affecting a lighter state of mind, "that every house has its skeleton."

"Real or imaginary. Most of these skeletons are but shadows."

"Mine is real."

The two friends, met now for the first time in ten years, looked at each other in a strange way. The lightness of tone had died out in the sentence—"Mine is real."

"The best of husbands, good children, and a home like this! Where stands the skeleton? I can see no place for so unseemly an intruder."

"And yet, Margaret, the intruder is here; grinning at me all the while, and growing more and more ghastly."

"Dear friend, how you afflict me!"

Helen Ashby's face had become pale in this reference to a hidden sorrow which had never found voice before.

"It almost kills me to say it, Margaret; but—" Mrs. Ashby checked the sentence ere it found utterance.

"But what? Trust me, Helen. God gives wisdom to love. Through my love He may send healing to your soul. Let me look down into this haunted heart-chamber; let me see the ugly skeleton!"

"I am not loved as I once was, Margaret!" There was a cold shiver in Mrs. Ashby's voice.

"Not loved, Helen!"

"Not loved by my husband." Tears fell silently over Mrs. Ashby's face.

"You are under a dark delusion."

"No. Love has been steadily failing for years—slowly, almost imperceptibly, but surely. I shudder at the contrast, when I measure its height and depth, its length and breadth to-day, and then think how immeasurable it seemed ten years ago!"

"I am pained beyond expression, dear friend! Surely you are in a dream! My brief observation of your husband since I came reveals nothing like coldness or alienation. He is kind, gentle, and tranquil. As I watched his countenance last night, while he talked, and dwelt on the sentiments that fell from his lips, I could not help saying, 'He is fast growing to the stature of a man—that is, of an angel!' This could not be if he were getting cold toward the wife of his bosom."

"Oh, he is good, and true, and excellent!" answered Mrs. Ashby. "A purer, better man does not live. I reverence, I idolize him! He stands in my sight the embodiment of human perfection! But all the while I am conscious of an increasing distance between us. We are not so close together as we were one, two, three, four, or five years ago. My friend, this is terrible! Is it to go on—this widening of the space between us—until he vanishes out of sight, and I am left shivering alone in a universe of darkness? Give me annihilation rather!"

This was the skeleton in Mrs. Ashby's house;

no phantom of the imagination, but a real skeleton. The friend sat long before replying. What Helen now said brought into light some things casually noted since her arrival—some things which had been felt as inharmonious. Let us briefly refer to them: An awkward or confused servant spilled some water on the table, at tea-time, in filling a glass. Mrs. Ashby, instead of passing the incident without notice, reproved her sharply. Mr. Ashby was talking at the time in a cheerful, animated voice. He became silent, but resumed in a few moments. The most ordinary observer would have perceived a change of tone, marked by a certain depression of feeling. Soon after the conversation was resumed Mr. Ashby referred to a lady acquaintance, and spoke of her as an accomplished singer, when his wife threw in some remarks disparaging to her as a woman. To these Mr. Ashby offered a few mildly-spoken excuses; but his wife tore them away with an unseemly asperity of manner, that, to say the least of it, was unbecomingly. Her husband changed the subject. Again he mentioned with praise a lady friend; and again Mrs. Ashby came in with a "but" and an "if," veiling the good and exposing the defects of her character. Two or three times during the meal Mrs. Ashby spoke impatiently to the children, and with a quality of tone that left on the ear an unpleasing impression.

The friend now recalled these little inharmonious incidents. They gave her a glimmer of light.

"Love is never constrained," she said, after a long pause.

Mrs. Ashby sighed deeply.

"True love is of the soul. Why do you love your husband?"

"Because," answered Mrs. Ashby, "he is, in my eyes, the embodiment of all manly perfections. He is just, pure, truthful, full of gentleness and goodness."

"And if such be his quality, Helen, can he love in a wife any thing that is not pure and gentle, truthful and good? Have you ever asked yourself a question like this?"

Mrs. Ashby's form was lifted to a sudden erectness. Her brow contracted slightly; her eyes lost something of their softened expression; her lips grew firm.

"Forgive me, Helen, if I have hurt or offended. I love you too well to give fruitless pain," said the friend. "I was only trying to lead your thought inward. If, as you seem to fear, your husband is receding from you, it must be in consequence of inharmonious states of mind—of dissimilarities, or antagonisms. There must be affinities, or there can be no conjunctions. Our souls must be beautiful if we would be truly loved. Have you ever pondered these things? If not, the time has come when you should, in all faithfulness and all seriousness, do so. If your husband be indeed advancing toward all true manly excellences, be growing in spiritual stature, will he not, unless you also advance and grow toward womanly excellence and perfection, recede from you—get so far beyond as to be out of sight? Are not spiritual laws as unfailing as natural laws?”

Mrs. Ashby's face had already lost its gathering sternness. Her friend paused.

“Why have you said this to me?”

“Because I love you, Helen, and desire your happiness.”

Mrs. Ashby sighed deeply, dropped her gaze, and sat looking inward for a long time. Then sighed again, and looked up into the face of her friend.

“What have you seen, Margaret? Deal with me honestly as a friend.”

“A temper and disposition which your husband can not approve.”

“Margaret!”

“You have asked me to deal honestly, as with a friend. Shall I go on?”

“Yes, yes; speak of all that is in your mind.”

“Your husband is gentle and considerate, ready to excuse faults, free from hardness and harshness.”

“I saw that your impatient words, when a servant spilled water on the table last evening, jarred his feelings. He was talking cheerfully at the time; but the change in his tone that followed showed a depressed state. It was plain to me that you hurt him by your sharp reproof more than you hurt the servant. Then I noticed that as often as he spoke in favor of certain persons you placed evil against their good, and not in the most amiable spirit. Once or twice he tried to defend the good, and then you set yourself against him with a degree of asperity that must have produced in his mind a sense of pain. He did not contend; though I fear, had he done so, you would have been all ready for a sharp conflict. Before tea was ended your husband, who conversed at the beginning in an easy, cheerful way, was sitting almost silent. Evidently you had reacted upon him in a manner to depress his feelings. I did not comprehend this at the time, but it is plain enough now.”

“I think, Margaret,” said Mrs. Ashby as her friend ceased, “that you had on magnifying glasses last evening. A stranger listening to your speech would set me down as ill-natured, if not quarrelsome. Henry would smile to hear you. I am not perfect, I know; and my husband understands this, and makes all due allowance for infirmities of temper.”

“Can he in spirit, Helen, conjoin himself to these or any other infirmities? Do their indulgence draw him nearer or away from you? Can he love them?”

Mrs. Ashby's countenance changed. She did not reply.

“Would he choose to live forever conjoined to a disturbing and inharmonious spirit? No matter how feeble the disturbance or slight the lack of harmony, if conjunction must be eternal would not conjunction be avoided as a calamity? We can not bind the soul, my friend, by any laws but its own. Love is drawn by likeness of quality—affinities combine. If you and your husband are to reach an eternal union you must love and delight in the same things. You must be of like quality. Your hearts must so beat that the flow of life is reciprocal, and the pulses move in unity. You must become like him, or he must become like you. In which contingency lies the surer hope? Answer to your own soul, my friend. If he is receding from you, getting all the while to a farther distance, why is it? What does it mean? Is he rising or descending? Growing better or worse? Which is it, Helen?”

“I have felt it for a long time, Margaret.”

“Then gird your loins—bind sandals to your feet—up, my friend, and press onward in the way you see him going, and draw once more close to his side. As you love him with a pure heart tenderly, seek for the graces of spirit, for the qualities of soul he loves. Cultivate all heavenly affections. Be gentle, kind, considerate, loving—in a word, seek all the Christian graces—and there will be no happier wife in all the land. With such a husband as yours—and I will take your own portraiture—what can stand in the way of all felicities but an undisciplined will?”

“If he will only love an angel, there is no hope for me,” replied Mrs. Ashby. “I am but a woman, infirm of will, and stumbling along darkly in my path of life. Oh, Margaret! you are giving me light only to show me the hopelessness of my case.”

“Not so,” replied the friend. “Your husband is not very far away from you. If I were talking with him of his own state he would use language quite as strong as yours. The infirm will, the darkened way, the stumbling feet—they are his as well as yours and mine. Those who are in advance of us do not walk as serenely as we think. There are always difficulties in the way, and the farther advance we make, while in this world, the more of them we shall find; but for these a higher strength, with patience and humility, are given. Begin by shunning such things as, in the light of reason and God's Word, you know to be wrong. Lay a tranquil hand on your temper, and hold back from utterance all harsh words that can do no good. Have charity for the weaknesses, the infirmities, and shortcomings of others; and if you can not speak approvingly, say no ill. So shall you move onward in the way your beloved is going; so shall you draw near to him in spirit; so shall his soul reflect your soul, and that unity of life be attained which makes of two one forever.”

“And you think there is hope for me, Margaret—Hope of winning back the love that seems vanishing?” said Mrs. Ashby. “I see the way it has gone as my eyes follow your pointing finger.”

“In spirit; for love is of the spirit. If you indulge in passion, ill-nature, envies, evil-speaking, and uncharitableness, can one who is trying to put these unclean things out of his heart—who turns from them as foul and hateful—draw closer to you and take you as the embodiment of all perfection into his soul? It is simply impossible, Helen. The good can not love us unless we are beautiful in spirit. To ask them to do so is to require an impossibility."

More than a minute passed. Then lifting her eyes from the floor, where they had been resting, Mrs. Ashby said, "Whereas I was blind, now I see. Oh, my friend, you have come as an angel to lead me out of the wilderness into a plain way. If my husband is advancing while I stand still what wonder is it that he recedes? If I do not walk by his side as he ascends the mountain of spiritual perfection the necessity that divides us is of my own creation. As you have urged, my friend, so will I do—gird up my loins, bind sandals to my feet, and press onward in the way he is going."

"And sooner than you think for, Helen," was answered, "will you be at his side. He is not very far in advance. The road to perfection of life is never passed over with rapid feet. Very slowly the steps are taken. Your husband loves you, but he can not love in you what is unlovely. Put away, then, all the unbeautiful things that veil your attractions. Be in his eyes gentle, loving, charitable, and kind. Be more ready to see as he sees than to find ground of difference. If you do not see in the light of his understanding wait and reflect, but do not argue and oppose. To be truly united, as to the spirit, is to be one in affection and thought. If there is no harmony in your thoughts, the closer you draw together the more you will disturb each other. But why should I say more? Your eyes are open, and you see. The way is plain, walk in it and find peace and joy. You have a true man for a husband; be to him a true wife, and happiness beyond any thing conceivable now shall be yours in the ages of eternity."

THE ADVENTURES OF PHILIP.

BY W. M. THACKERAY.

CHAPTER XXXV.

RES ANGUSTA DOMI.

TO reconcile these two men was impossible after such a quarrel as that described in the last chapter. The only chance of peace was to keep the two men apart. If they met they would fly at each other. Mugford always persisted that he could have got the better of his great hulking sub-editor, who did not know the use of his fists. In Mugford's youthful time bruising was a fashionable art, and the old gentleman still believed in his own skill and prowess. "Don't tell me," he would say; "though the fellow is as big as a life-guardsmen, I would have doubled him up in two minutes." I am very glad, for poor Charlotte's sake and his own, that Philip did not undergo the doubling-up process. He himself felt such a wrath and surprise at his employer as, I suppose, a lion does when a little dog attacks him. I should not like to be that little dog, nor does my modest and peaceful nature at all prompt and impel me to combat with lions.

It was mighty well Mr. Philip Firmin had shown his spirit and quarreled with his bread-and-butter; but when Saturday came what philanthropist would hand four sovereigns and four shillings over to Mr. F., as Mr. Burjoyce, the publisher of the Pall Mall Gazette, had been accustomed to do? I will say for my friend that a still keener remorse than that which he felt about money thrown away attended him when he found that Mrs. Woolsey, toward whom he had cast a sidelong stone of persecution, was a most respectable and honorable lady. "I should like to go, Sir, and grovel before her," Philip said, in his energetic way. "If I see that tailor, I will request him to put his foot on my head and trample on me with his highlows. Oh, for shame! for shame! Shall I never learn charity toward my neighbors, and always go on believing in the lies which people tell me? When I meet that scoundrel Trail at the club I must chastise him. How dared he take away the reputation of an honest woman?" Philip's friends besought him, for the sake of society and peace, not to carry this quarrel farther. "If," we said, "every woman whom Trail has maligned had a champion who should box Trail's ears at the club, what a vulgar, quarrelsome place that club would become! My dear Philip, did you ever know Mr. Trail say a good word of man or woman?" and by these or similar entreaties and arguments we succeeded in keeping the Queen's peace.

Yes: but how find another Pall Mall Gazette?

PATERFAMILIAS.

Had Philip possessed seven thousand pounds in the three per cents., his income would have been no greater than that which he drew from Mugford's faithful bank. Ah! how wonderful ways and means are! When I think how this very line, this very word, which I am writing represents money, I am lost in a respectful astonishment. A man takes his own case, as he says his own prayers, on behalf of himself and his family. I am paid, we will say, for the sake of illustration, at the rate of sixpence per line. With the words "Ah, how wonderful," to the words "per line," I can buy a loaf, a piece of butter, a jug of milk, a modicum of tea—actually enough to make breakfast for the family; and the servants of the house; and the char-woman, their servant, can shake up the tea-leaves with a fresh supply of water, sop the crusts, and get a meal, tant bien que mal. Wife, children, guests, servants, char-woman, we are all actually making a meal off Philip Firmin's bones as it were. And my next-door neighbor, whom I see spinning away to chambers, umbrella in hand? And next door but one the city man? And next door but two the doctor!—I know the baker has left loaves at every one of their doors this morning, that all their chimneys are smoking, and they will all have breakfast. Ah, thank God for it! I hope, friend, you and I are not too proud to ask for our daily bread, and to be grateful for getting it? Mr. Philip had to work for his, in care and trouble, like other children of men: to work for it, and I hope to pray for it too. It is a thought to me awful and beautiful, that of the daily prayer, and of the myriads of fellow-men uttering it, in care and in sickness, in doubt and in poverty, in health and in wealth. Panem nostrum da nobis hodie. Philip whispers it by the bedside where wife and child lie sleeping, and goes to his early labor with a stouter heart: as he creeps to his rest when the day's labor is over, and the quotidian bread is earned, and breathes his hushed thanks to the bountiful Giver of the meal. All over this world what an endless chorus is singing of love, and thanks, and prayer! Day tells to day the wondrous story, and night recounts it into night. How do I come to think of a sunrise which I saw near twenty years ago on the Nile, when the river and sky flushed and glowed with the dawning light, and as the luminary appeared the boatmen knelt on the rosy deck and adored Allah? So, as thy sun rises, friend, over the humble housetops round about your home, shall you wake many and many a day to duty and labor. May the task have been honestly done when the night comes, and the steward deal kindly with the laborer!

So two of Philip's cables cracked and gave way after a very brief strain, and the poor fellow held by nothing now but that wonderful European Review established by the mysterious Tregarvan. Actors, a people of superstitions and traditions, opine that Heaven, in some mysterious way, makes managers for their benefit. In like manner, Review proprietors are sent to provide the pabulum for us men of letters. With what complacency did my wife listen to the somewhat long-winded and pompous oratory of Tregarvan! He pompous and commonplace? Mr. Tregarvan spoke with excellent good sense. That wily woman never showed she was tired of his conversation. She praised him to Philip behind his back, and would not allow a word in his disparagement. As a doctor will punch your chest, your liver, your heart, listen at your lungs, squeeze your pulse, and what not, so this wily woman studied, shampooed, auscultated Tregar-

van. Of course he allowed himself to be operated upon. Of course he had no idea that the lady was flattering, wheedling, humbugging him; but thought that he was a very well-informed, eloquent man, who had seen and read a great deal, and had an agreeable method of imparting his knowledge, and that the lady in question was a sensible woman, naturally eager for more information. Go, Dalilah! I understand your tricks! I know many another Omphale in London who will coax Hercules away from his club to come and listen to her wheedling talk.

One great difficulty we had was to make Philip read Tregarvan's own articles in the Review. He at first said he could not, or that he could not remember them; so that there was no use in reading them. And Philip's new master used to make artful allusions to his own writings in the course of conversation, so that our unwary friend would find himself under examination in any casual interview with Tregarvan, whose opinions on free-trade, malt-tax, income-tax, designs of Russia, or what not, might be accepted or denied, but ought at least to be known. We actually made Philip get up his owner's articles. We put questions to him privily regarding them—"coached" him, according to the university phrase. My wife humbugged that wretched Member of Parliament in a way which makes me shudder, when I think of what hypocrisy the sex is capable. Those arts and dissimulations with which she wheedles others suppose she exercised them on me? Horrible thought! No, angel! To others thou mayest be a coaxing hypocrite; to me thou art all candor. Other men may have been humbugged by other women; but I am not to be taken in by that sort of thing; and thou art all candor!

We had then so much per annum as editor. We were paid, besides, for our articles. We had really a snug little pension out of this Review, and we prayed it might last forever. We might write a novel. We might contribute articles to a daily paper; get a little parliamentary practice as a barrister. We actually did get Philip into a railway case or two, and my wife must be coaxing and hugging solicitors' ladies, as she had wheedled and coaxed Members of Parliament. Why, I do believe my Dalilah set up a flirtation with old Bishop Crosssticks, with an idea of getting her protégé a living; and though the lady indignantly repudiates this charge, will she be pleased to explain how the bishop's sermons were so outrageously praised in the Review?

Philip's roughness and frankness did not displease Tregarvan, to the wonder of us all, who trembled lest he should lose this, as he had lost his former place. Mr. Tregarvan had more country houses than one, and at these not only was the editor of the Review made welcome, but the editor's wife and children, whom Tregarvan's wife took in especial regard. In London Lady Mary had assemblies, where our little friend Charlotte made her appearance; and half a dozen times in the course of the season the wealthy Cornish gentleman feasted his retainers of the Review. His wine was excellent and old; his jokes were old too; his table pompous, grave, plentiful. If Philip was to eat the bread of dependence, the loaf was here very kindly prepared for him, and he ate it humbly and with not too much grumbling. This diet chokes some proud stomachs and disagrees with them; but Philip was very humble now, and of a nature grateful for kindness. He is one who requires the help of friends, and can accept benefits without losing independence—not all men's gifts, but some men's, whom he repays not only with coin but with an immense affection and gratitude. How that man did laugh at my witticisms! How he worshiped the ground on which my wife walked! He elected himself our champion. He quarreled with other people who found fault with our characters or would not see our perfections. There was something affecting in the way in which this big man took the humble place. We could do no wrong in his eyes; and woe betide the man who spoke disparagingly of us in his presence!

One day, at his patron's table, Philip exercised his valor and championship in our behalf by defending us against the evil-speaking of that Mr. Trail, who has been mentioned before as a gentleman difficult to please and credulous of ill regarding his neighbor. The talk happened to fall upon the character of the reader's most humble servant, and Trail, as may be imagined, spared me no more than the rest of mankind. Would you like to be liked by all people? That would be a reason why Trail should hate you. Were you an angel fresh dropped from the skies he would espy dirt on your robe, and a black feather or two in your wing. As for me, I know I am not angelical at all; and in walking my native earth can't help a little mud on my trowsers. Well: Mr. Trail began to paint my portrait, laying on those dark shadows which that well-known master is in the habit of employing. I was a parasite of the nobility; I was a heartless sycophant, house-breaker, drunkard, murderer, returned convict, etc., etc. With a little imagination Mrs. Candor can fill up the outline, and arrange the colors so as to suit her amiable fancy.

Philip had come late to dinner—of this fault, I must confess, he is guilty only too often. The company were at table; he took the only place vacant, and this happened to be at the side of Mr. Trail. On Trail's other side was a portly individual, of a healthy and rosy countenance and voluminous white waistcoat, to whom Trail directed much of his amiable talk, and whom he addressed once or twice as Sir John. Once or twice already we have seen how Philip has quarreled at table. He cried mea culpa loudly and honestly enough. He made vows of reform in this particular. He succeeded, dearly beloved brethren, not much worse or better than you and I do, who confess our faults, and go on promising to improve, and stumbling and picking ourselves up every day. The pavement of life is strewn with orange-peel, and who has, not slipped on the flags?

"He is the most conceited man in London," Trail was going on, "and one of the most worldly. He will throw over a colonel to dine with a general. He wouldn't throw over you two baronets—he is a great deal too shrewd a fellow for that. He wouldn't give you up, perhaps, to dine with a lord, but any ordinary baronet he would."

"And why not us as well as the rest?" asks Tregarvan, who seemed amused at the speaker's chatter.

"Because you are not like common baronets at all. Because your estates are a great deal too large. Because, I suppose, you might either of you go to the Upper House any day. Because, as an author, he may be supposed to be afraid of a certain Review," cries Trail, with a loud laugh.

"Trail is speaking of a friend of yours," cried Sir John, nodding and smiling to the new-comer.

"Very lucky for my friend," growls Philip, and eats his soup in silence.

"By-the-way, that article of his on Madame de Sévigné is poor stuff. No knowledge of the period. Three gross blunders in French. A man can't write of French society unless he has lived in French society. What does Pendennis know of it? A man who makes blunders like those can't understand French. A man who can't speak French can't get on in French society. Therefore he can't write about French society. All these propositions are clear enough. Thank you. Dry Champagne, if you please. He is enormously overrated, I tell you; and so is his wife. They used to put her forward as a beauty; and she is only a dowdy woman out of a nursery. She has no style about her."

"She is only one of the best women in the world," Mr. Firmin called out, turning very red; and hereupon entered into a defense of our characters, and pronounced a eulogium upon both and each of us, in which I hope there was some little truth. However, he spoke with great enthusiasm, and Mr. Trail found himself in a minority.

"You are right to stand up for your friends, Firmin!" cried the host. "Let me introduce you to—"

"Let me introduce myself," said the gentleman on the other side of Mr. Trail. "Mr. Firmin, you and I are kinsmen—I am Sir John Ringwood." And Sir John reached a hand to Philip across Trail's chair. They talked a great deal together in the course of the evening; and when Mr. Trail found that the great northern baronet was friendly and familiar with Philip, and claimed a relationship with him, his manner toward Firmin altered. He pronounced afterward a warm eulogy upon Sir John for his frankness and good-nature in recognizing his unfortunate relative, and charitably said, "Philip might not be like the doctor, and could not help having a rogue for a father." In former days Trail had eaten and drunken freely at that rogue's table. But we must have truth, you know, before all things; and if your own brother has committed a sin, common justice requires that you should stone him.

In former days, and not long after Lord Ringwood's death, Philip had left his card at this kinsman's door, and Sir John's butler, driving in his master's brougham, had left a card upon Philip, who was not over well pleased by this acknowledgment of his civility, and, in fact, employed abusive epithets when he spoke of the transaction. But when the two gentlemen actually met, their intercourse was kindly and pleasant enough. Sir John listened to his relative's talk—and it appears Philip comported himself with his usual free and easy manner—with interest and curiosity; and owned afterward that evil tongues had previously been busy with the young man's character, and that slander and untruth had been spoken regarding him. In this respect, if Philip is worse off than his neighbors, I can only say his neighbors are fortunate.

Two days after the meeting of the cousins the tranquillity of Thornhaugh Street was disturbed by the appearance of a magnificent yellow chariot, with crests, hammer-cloths, a bewigged coachman, and a powdered footman. Betsy, the nurse, who was going to take baby out for a walk, encountered this giant on the threshold of Mrs. Brandon's door, and a lady within the chariot delivered three cards to the tall menial, who transferred them to Betsy. And Betsy persisted in saying that the lady in the carriage admired baby very much, and asked its age, at which baby's mamma was not in the least surprised. In due course an invitation to dinner followed, and our friends became acquainted with their kinsfolk.

If you have a good memory for pedigrees—and in my youthful time every man de bonne maison studied genealogies, and had his English families in his memory—you know that this

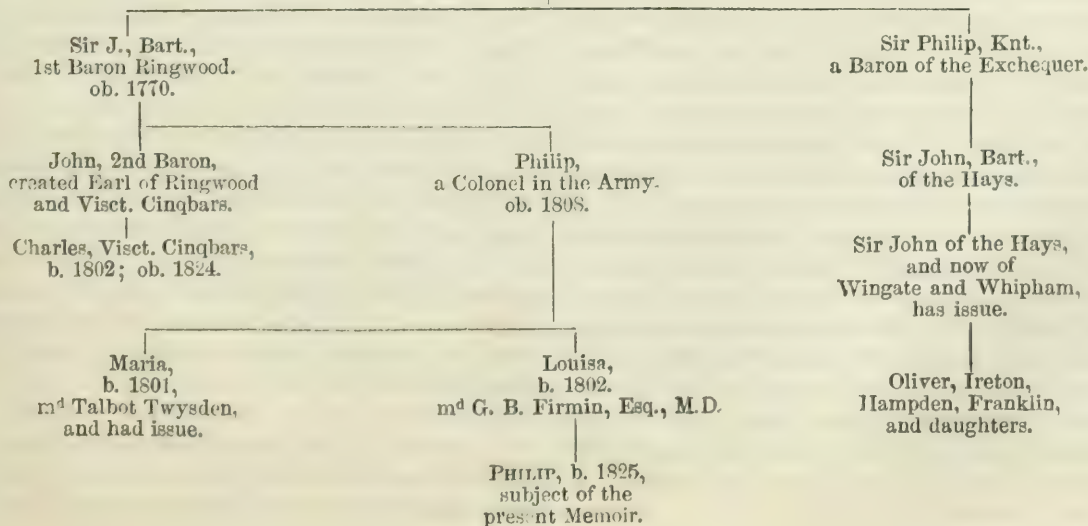

Sir John Ringwood, who succeeded to the principal portion of the estates, but not to the titles of the late earl, was descended from a mutual ancestor, a Sir John, whose elder son was ennobled (temp Geo. I.), while the second son, following the legal profession, became a judge, and had a son, who became a baronet, and who begat that present Sir John who has just been shaking hands with Philip across Trail's back.* Thus the two men were cousins; and in right of the heiress, his poor mother, Philip might quarter the Ringwood arms on his carriage whenever he drove out. These, you know, are argent, a dexter sinople on a fesse wavy of the first—or pick out, my dear friend, any coat you like out of the whole heraldic wardrobe, and accommodate it to our friend Firmin.

When he was a young man at college Philip had dabbled a little in this queer science of heraldry, and used to try and believe the legends about his ancestry which his fond mother imparted to him. He had a great book-plate made for himself, with a prodigious number of quarterings, and could recite the alliances by which such and such a quartering came into his shield. His father rather confirmed these histories, and spoke of them and of his wife's noble family with much respect: and Philip, artlessly whispering to a vulgar boy at school that he was descended from King John, was thrashed very unkindly by the vulgar upper boy, and nicknamed King John for many a long day after. I dare say many other gentlemen who profess to trace their descent from ancient kings have no better or worse authority for their pedigree than friend Philip.

When our friend paid his second visit to Sir John Ringwood he was introduced to his kinsman's library. A great family-tree hung over the mantle-piece, surrounded by a whole gallery of defunct Ringwoods, of whom the baronet was now the representative. He quoted to Philip the hackneyed old Horatian lines (some score of years ago a great deal of that old coin was current in conversation). As for family, he said, and ancestors, and what we have not done ourselves, these things we can hardly call ours! Sir John gave Philip to understand that he was a stanch liberal. Sir John was for going with the age. Sir John had fired a shot from the Paris barricades. Sir John was for the rights of man every where all over the world. He had pictures of Franklin, Lafayette, Washington, and the first Consul Bonaparte on his walls along with his ancestors. He had lithograph copies of Magna Charta, the Declaration of American Independence, and the Signatures to the Death of Charles I. He did not scruple to own his preference for republican institutions. He wished to know what right had any man—the late Lord Ringwood, for example—to sit in a hereditary House of Peers and legislate over him? That lord had had a son Cinqbars, who died many years before, a victim of his own follies and debaucheries. Had Lord Cinqbars survived his father, he would now be sitting an earl in the House of Peers—the most ignorant young man, the most unprincipled young man, reckless, dissolute, of the feeblest intellect and the worst life. Well, had he lived and inherited the Ringwood property, that creature would have been an earl: whereas he, Sir John, his superior in morals, in character, in intellect, his equal in point of birth (for had they not both a common ancestor?) was Sir John still. The inequalities in men's chances in life were monstrous and ridiculous. He was determined, henceforth, to look at a man for himself alone, and not esteem him for any of the absurd caprices of fortune.

* Copied, by permission of P. Firmin, Esq., from the Genealogical Tree in his possession.

Sir J. Ringwood, Bart., of Wingate and Whipham.

As the republican was talking to his relative a servant came into the room and whispered to his master that the plumber had come with his bill as by appointment; upon which Sir John rose up in a fury, asked the servant how he dared to disturb him, and bade him tell the plumber to go to the lowest depths of Tartarus. Nothing could equal the insolence and rapacity of tradesmen, he said, except the insolence and idleness of servants; and he called this one back, and asked him how he dared to leave the fire in that state?—stormed and raged at him with a volubility which astonished his new acquaintance; and, the man being gone, resumed his previous subject of conversation, viz., natural equality and the outrageous injustice of the present social system. After talking for half an hour, during which Philip found that he himself could hardly find an opportunity of uttering a word, Sir John took out his watch and got up from his chair; at which hint Philip too rose, not sorry to bring the interview to an end. And herewith Sir John accompanied his kinsman into the hall, and to the street door, before which the baronet's groom was riding, leading his master's horse. And Philip heard the baronet using violent language to the groom, as he had done to the servant within doors. Why, the army in Flanders did not swear more terribly than this admirer of republican institutions and advocate of the rights of man.

Philip was not allowed to go away without appointing a day when he and his wife would partake of their kinsman's hospitality. On this occasion Mrs. Philip comported herself with so much grace and simplicity that Sir John and Lady Ringwood pronounced her to be a very pleasing and ladylike person, and I dare say wondered how a person in her rank of life could have acquired manners that were so refined and agreeable. Lady Ringwood asked after the child which she had seen, praised its beauty; of course, won the mother's heart, and thereby caused her to speak with perhaps more freedom than she would otherwise have felt at a first interview. Mrs. Philip has a dainty touch on the piano, and a sweet singing voice that is charmingly true and neat. She performed after dinner some of the songs of her little répertoire, and pleased her audience. Lady Ringwood loved good music, and was herself a fine performer of the ancient school, when she played Haydn and Mozart under the tuition of good old Sir George Thrum. The tall and handsome beneficed clergyman who acted as major-domo of Sir John's establishment placed a parcel in the carriage when Mr. and Mrs. Philip took their leave, and announced with much respectful deference that the cab was paid. Our friends no doubt would have preferred to dispense with this ceremony; but it is ill looking even a gift cab-horse in the mouth, and so Philip was a gainer of some two shillings by his kinsman's liberality.

When Charlotte came to open the parcel which major-domo, with his lady's compliments, had placed in the cab, I fear she did not exhibit that elation which we ought to feel for the favors of our friends. A couple of little frocks, of the cut of George IV., some little red shoes of the same period, some crumpled sashes, and other small articles of wearing apparel, by her ladyship's order by her ladyship's lady's-maid; and Lady Ringwood kissing Charlotte at her departure, told her that she had caused this little packet to be put away for her. "H'm," says Philip, only half pleased. "Suppose, Sir John had told his butler to put up one of his blue coats and brass buttons for me, as well as pay the cab?"

"If it was meant in kindness, Philip, we must not be angry," pleaded Philip's wife; "and I am sure if you had heard her and the Miss Ringwoods speak of baby you would like them, as I intend to do."

But Mrs. Philip never put those mouldy old red shoes upon baby; and as for the little frocks, children's frocks are made so much fuller now that Lady Ringwood's presents did not answer at all. Charlotte managed to furbish up a sash, and a pair of epaulets for her child—epaulets are they called? Shoulder-knots—what you will, ladies; and with these ornaments Miss Firmin was presented to Lady Ringwood and some of her family.

The good-will of these new-found relatives of Philip's was laborious, was evident, and yet I must say was not altogether agreeable. At the first period of their intercourse—for this too, I am sorry to say, came to an end, or presently suffered interruption—tokens of affection in the shape of farm produce, country butter and poultry, and actual butcher's meat, came from Berkeley Square to Thornhaugh Street. The Duke of Doubleglo'ster, I know, is much richer than you are; but if he were to offer to make you a present of half-a-crown, I doubt whether you would be quite pleased. And so with Philip and his relatives. A hamper brought in the brougham, containing hot-house grapes and country butter, is very well, but a leg of mutton I own was a gift that was rather tough to swallow. It was tough. That point we ascertained and established among roars of laughter one day when we dined with our friends. Did Lady Ringwood send a sack of turnips in the brougham too? In a word, we ate Sir John's mutton, and we laughed at him, and be sure many a man has done the same by you and me. Last Friday, for instance, as Jones and Brown go away after dining with your humble servant. "Did you ever see such profusion and extravagance?" asks Brown. "Profusion and extravagance!" cries Jones, that well-known epicure. "I never saw any thing so shabby in my life. What does the fellow mean by asking me to such a dinner?" "True," says the other, "it was an abominable dinner, Jones, as you justly say; but it was very profuse in him to give it. Don't you see?" and so both our good friends are agreed.

Ere many days were over the great yellow chariot and its powdered attendants again made their appearance before Mrs. Brandon's modest door in Thornhaugh Street, and Lady Ringwood and two daughters descended from the carriage and made their way to Mr. Philip's apartments in the second floor, just as that worthy gentleman was sitting down to dinner with his wife. Lady Ringwood, bent upon being gracious, was in ecstasies with every thing she saw—a clean house—a nice little maid—pretty picturesque rooms—odd rooms—and what charming pictures! Several of these were the work of the fond pencil of poor J. J., who, as has been told, had painted Philip's beard and Charlotte's eyebrow, and Charlotte's baby a thousand and a thousand times. "May we come in? Are we disturbing you? What dear little bits of china! What a beautiful mug, Mr. Firmin!" This was poor J. J.'s present to his god-daughter. "How nice the luncheon looks! Dinner, is it? How pleasant to dine at this hour!" The ladies were determined to be charmed with every thing round about them.

"We are dining on your poultry. May we offer some to you and Miss Ringwood?" says the master of the house.

"Why don't you dine in the dining-room? Why do you dine in a bedroom?" asks Franklin Ringwood, the interesting young son of the Baronte of Ringwood.

"Somebody else lives in the parlor," says Mrs. Philip. On which the boy remarks, "We have two dining-rooms in Berkeley Square. I mean for us, besides papa's study, which I mustn't go into. And the servants have two dining-rooms, and—"

"Hush! Here," cries mamma, with the usual remark regarding the beauty of silence in little boys.

But Franklin persists in spite of the "Hushes:" "And so we have at Ringwood; and at Whipham there's ever so many dining-rooms—ever so many—and I like Whipham a great deal better than Ringwood, because my pony is at Whipham. You have not got a pony. You are too poor."

"Franklin!"

"You said he was too poor; and you would not have had chickens if we had not given them to you. Mamma, you know you said they were very poor, and would like them."

And here mamma looked red, and I dare say Philip's cheeks and ears tingled, and for once Mrs. Philip was thankful at hearing her baby cry, for it gave her a pretext for leaving the room and flying to the nursery, whither the other two ladies accompanied her.

Meanwhile Master Franklin went on with his artless conversation. "Mr. Philip, why do they say you are wicked? You do not look wicked; and I am sure Mrs. Philip does not look wicked—she looks very good."

"Who says I am wicked?" asks Mr. Firmin of his candid young relative.

"Oh, ever so many! Cousin Talbot says so; and Blanche says so; and Woolcombe says so; only I don't like him, he's so very brown. And when they heard you had been to dinner, 'Has that beast been here?' Talbot says. And I don't like him a bit. But I like you—at least I think I do. You only have oranges for dessert. We always have lots of things for dessert at home. You don't, I suppose, because you've got no money—only a very little."

"Well: I have got only a very little," says Philip.

"I have some—ever so much. And I'll buy something for your wife, and I shall like to have you better at home than Blanche, and Talbot, and that Woolcombe; and they never give me any thing. You can't, you know, because you are so very poor—you are; but we'll often send you things, I dare say. And I'll have an orange, please—thank you. And there's a chap at our school, and his name is Suckling, and he ate eighteen oranges, and wouldn't give one away to any body. Wasn't he a greedy pig? And I have wine with my oranges—I do: a glass of wine—thank you. That's jolly. But you don't have it often, I suppose, because you're so very poor."

I am glad that infant could not understand, being yet of too tender age, the compliments which Lady Ringwood and her daughter passed upon her. As it was, the compliments charmed the mother, for whom indeed they were intended, and did not inflame the unconscious baby's vanity.

"What would the polite mamma and sister have said, if they had heard that unlucky Franklin's prattle?" The boy's simplicity amused his tall cousin. "Yes," says Philip, "we are very poor, but we are very happy, and don't mind—that's the truth."

"Mademoiselle, that's the German governess, said she wondered how you could live at all; and I don't think you could if you ate as much as she did. You should see her eat; she is such a oner at eating. Fred, my brother, that's the one who is at college, one day tried to see how much Mademoiselle Wallfirth could eat, and she had twice of soup, and then she said sivoplay, and then twice of fish, and she said sivoplay for more; and then she had roast mutton—no, I think roast beef it was; and she eats the pease with her knife, and then she had raspberry jam pudding, and ever so much beer, and then—" But what came then we never shall know; because while young Franklin was choking with laughter (accompanied with a large piece of orange) at the ridiculous recollection of Miss Wallfirth's appetite, his mamma and sister came down stairs from Charlotte's nursery, and brought the dear boy's conversation to an end. The ladies chose to go home, delighted with Philip, baby, Charlotte. Every thing was so proper. Every thing was so nice; Mrs. Firmin was so ladylike. The fine ladies watched her and her behavior with that curiosity which the Brobdingnag ladies displayed when they held up little Gulliver on their palms, and saw him bow, smile, dance, draw his sword, and so forth, just like a man.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

IN WHICH PHILIP WEARS A WIG.

WE can not expect to be loved by a relative whom we have knocked into an illuminated pond, and whose coat-tails, pantaloons, nether limbs, and best feelings we have lacerated with ill-treatment and broken glass. A man whom you have so treated behind his back will not be sparing of his punishment behind yours. Of course all the Twysdens, male and female, and Woolcombe, the dusky husband of Philip's former love, hated and feared, and maligned him; and were in the habit of speaking of him as a truculent and reckless savage and monster, coarse and brutal in his language and behavior, ragged, dirty, and reckless in his personal appearance; reeking with smoke, perpetually reeling in drink, indulging in oaths, actions, laughter which rendered him intolerable in civilized society. The Twysdens, during Philip's absence abroad, had been very respectful and assiduous in courting the new head of the Ringwood family. They had flattered Sir John, and paid court to my lady. They had been welcomed at Sir John's houses in town and country. They had adopted his politics in a great measure, as they had adopted the politics of the deceased Ringwood. They had never lost an opportunity of abusing poor Philip and of ingratiating themselves. They had never refused any invitation from Sir John in town or country, and had ended by utterly boring him and Lady Ringwood and the Ringwood family in general. Lady Ringwood learned somewhere how pitilessly Mrs. Woolcombe had jilted her cousin when a richer suitor appeared in the person of the West Indian. Then news came how Philip had administered a beating to Woolcombe, to Talbot Twysden, to a dozen who set on him. The early prejudices began to pass away. A friend or two of Philip's told Ringwood how he was mistaken in the young man, and painted a portrait of him in colors much more favorable than those which his kinsfolk employed. Indeed, dear relations, if the public wants to know our little faults and errors, I think I know who will not grudge the requisite information. Dear Aunt Candor, are you not still alive, and don't you know what we had for dinner yesterday, and the amount (monstrous extravagance!) of the washer-woman's bill?

Well, the Twysden family so bespattered poor Philip with abuse, and represented him as a monster of such hideous mien, that no wonder the Ringwoods avoided him. Then they began to grow utterly sick and tired of his detractors. And then Sir John, happening to talk with his brother Member of Parliament, Tregarvan, in the House of Commons, heard quite a different story regarding our friend to that with which the Twysdens had regaled him; and with no little surprise on Sir John's part, was told by Tregarvan how honest, rough, worthy, affectionate, and gentle this poor maligned fellow was; how he had been sinned against by his wretch of a father, whom he had forgiven and actually helped out of his wretched means; and how he was making a brave battle against poverty, and had a sweet little loving wife and child, whom every kind heart would willingly strive to help. Because people are rich they are not of necessity ogres. Because they are born gentlemen and ladies of good degree, are in easy circumstances, and have a generous education, it does not follow that they are heartless and will turn their back on a friend. Moi qui vous parle—I have been in a gréat strait of sickness near to death, and the friends who came to help me with every comfort, succor, sympathy were actually gentlemen, who lived in good houses, who had a good education. They didn't turn away because I was sick, or fly from me because they thought I was poor; on the contrary, hand, purse, succor, sympathy were ready, and praise be to Heaven. And so too did Philip find help when he needed it, and succor when he was in poverty. Tregarvan, we will own, was a pompous little man, his House of Commons speeches were dull, and his written documents awfully slow; but he had a kind heart: he was touched by that picture which Laura drew of the young man's poverty, and honesty, and simple hopefulness in the midst of hard times: and we have seen how the European Review was thus intrusted to Mr. Philip's management. Then some artful friends of Philip's determined that he should be reconciled to his relations, who were well-to-do in the world, and might serve him. And I wish, dear reader, that your respectable relatives and mine would bear this little paragraph in mind and leave us both handsome legacies. Then Tregarvan spoke to Sir John Ringwood, and that meeting was brought about, where, for once at least, Mr. Philip quarreled with nobody.

And now came another little piece of good luck, which, I suppose, must be attributed to the same kind friend who had been scheming for Philip's benefit, and who is never so happy as when her little plots for her friend's benefit can be made to succeed. Yes: when that arch-jobber—don't tell me—I never knew a woman worth a pin who wasn't—when that arch-jobber, I say, has achieved a job by which some friend is made happy, her eyes and cheeks brighten with triumph. Whether she has got a sick man into a hospital, or got a poor woman a family's washing, or made a sinner repent and return to wife, husband, or what not, that woman goes off and pays her thanks, where thanks are due, with such fervor, with such lightness, with such happiness, that I assure you she is a sight to behold. Hush! When one sinner is saved, who are glad? Some of us know a woman or two pure as angels—know, and are thankful.

When the person about whom I have been prattling has one of her benevolent jobs in hand, or has completed it, there is a sort of triumph and mischief in her manner, which I don't know otherwise how to describe. She does not understand my best jokes at this period, or answer them at random, or laugh very absurdly and vacantly. She embraces her children wildly, and, at the most absurd moments, is utterly unmindful when they are saying their lessons, prattling their little questions, and so forth. I recall all these symptoms (and put this and that together, as the saying is) as happening on one especial day, at the commencement of Easter Term, eighteen hundred and never mind what—as happening on one especial morning when this lady had been astoundingly distracte and curiously excited. I now remember, how during her children's dinner-time, she sat looking into the square out of our window, and scarcely attending to the little innocent cries for mutton which the children were offering up.

At last there was a rapid clank over the pavement, a tall figure passed the parlor windows, which our kind friends know look into Queen Square, and then came a loud ring at the bell, and I thought the mistress of the house gave an ah—a sigh—as though her heart was relieved.

The street door was presently opened, and then the dining-room door, and Philip walks in with his hat on, his blue eyes staring before him, his hair flaming about, and “La, Uncle Philip!” cry the children. “What have you done to yourself? You have shaved off your mustache.” And so he had, I declare!

“I say, Pen, look here! This has been left at chambers; and Cassidy has sent it on by his clerk,” our friend said. I forget whether it has been stated that Philip's name still remained on the door of those chambers in Parchment Buildings, where we once heard his song of “Doctor Luther,” and were present at his call-supper.

The document which Philip produced was actually a brief. The papers were superscribed, “In Parliament, Polwheedle and Tredyddlum Railway. To support bill, Mr. Firmin; retainer, five guineas; brief, fifty guineas; consultation, five guineas. With you Mr. Armstrong, Sir J. Whitworth, Mr. Pinkerton.” Here was a wonder of wonders! A shower of gold was poured out on my friend. A light dawned upon me. The proposed bill was for a Cornish line. Our friend Tregarvan was concerned in it, the line passing through his property, and my wife had canvassed him privately, and by her wheedling and blandishments had persuaded Tregarvan to use his interest with the agents and get Philip this welcome aid.

Philip eyed the paper with a queer expression. He handled it as some men handle a baby. He looked as if he did not know what to do with it, and as if he should like to drop it. I believe I made some satirical remark to this effect as I looked at our friend with his paper.

“And he will hold this no doubt much to his credit. May this be the father of many briefs! May you have bags full of them!” Philip had all our good wishes. They did not cost much, or avail much, but they were sincere. I know men who can't for the lives of them give even that cheap coin of good-will, but hate their neighbors' prosperity, and are angry with them when they cease to be dependent and poor.”

We have said how Cassidy's astonished clerk had brought the brief from chambers to Firmin at his lodgings at Mrs. Brandon's in Thornhaugh Street. Had a bailiff served him with a writ Philip could not have been more surprised or in a greater tremor. A brief? Grands Dieux! What was he to do with a brief? He thought of going to bed, and being ill—of flying from home, country, family. Brief? Charlotte, of course, seeing her husband alarmed, began to quake too. Indeed, if his worship's finger aches, does not her whole body suffer? But Charlotte's and Philip's constant friend, the Little Sister, felt no such fear. "Now there's this opening, you must take it, my dear," she said. "Suppose you don't know much about law—"

"Much! Nothing," interposed Philip. "You might ask me to play the piano; but as I never happened to have learned—"

"La—don't tell me! You mustn't show a faint heart. Take the business and do it best you can. You'll do it better next time, and next. The Bar's a gentleman's business. Don't I attend a judge's lady, which I remember her with her first in a little bit of a house in Bernard Street, Russell Square; and now haven't I been to her in Eaton Square, with a butler, and two footmen, and carriages ever so many? You may work on at your newspapers and get a crust, and when you're old, and if you quarrel—and you have a knack of quarreling—he has, Mrs. Firmin. I knew him before you did. Quarrelsome he is, and he will be, though you think him an angel, to be sure. Suppose you quarrel with your newspaper masters, and your reviews, and that, you lose your place. A gentleman like Mr. Philip oughtn't to have a master. I couldn't bear to think of your going down of a Saturday to the publishing office to get your wages like a workman."

"But I am a workman," interposes Philip.

"La! But do you mean to remain one forever? I would rise, if I was a man!" said the intrepid little woman; "I would rise, or I'd know the reason why. Who knows how many in family you're going to be? I'd have more spirit than to live in a second floor—I would!"

And the little woman said this, though she clung round Philip's child with a rapture of fondness which she tried in vain to conceal; though she felt that to part from it would be to part from her life's chief happiness; though she loved Philip as her own son: and Charlotte—well, Charlotte for Philip's sake—as women love other women.

Charlotte came to her friends in Queen Square, and told us of the resolute Little Sister's advice and conversation. She knew that Mrs. Brandon only loved her as something belonging to Philip. She admired this Little Sister, and trusted her, and could afford to bear that little somewhat scornful domination which Brandon exercised. "She does not love me, because Philip does," Charlotte said. "Do you think I could like her, or any woman, if I thought Philip loved them? I could kill them, Laura, that I could!" And at this sentiment I imagine daggers shooting out of a pair of eyes that were ordinarily very gentle and bright.

Not having been engaged in the case in which Philip had the honor of first appearing, I can not enter into particulars regarding it, but am sure that case must have been uncommonly strong in itself which could survive such an advocate. He passed a frightful night of torture before appearing in committee room. During that night, he says, his hair grew gray. His old college friend and comrade Pinkerton, who was with him in the case, "coached" him on the day previous; and indeed it must be owned that the work which he had to perform was not of a nature to impair the inside or the outside of his skull. A great man was his leader; his friend Pinkerton followed; and all Mr. Philip's business was to examine half a dozen witnesses by questions previously arranged between them and the agents.

When you hear that, as a reward of his services in this case, Mr. Firmin received a sum of money sufficient to pay his modest family expenses for some four months, I am sure, dear and respected literary friends, that you will wish the lot of a parliamentary barrister had been yours, or that your immortal works could be paid with such a liberality as rewards the labors of these lawyers. "Nimmer erscheinen die Götter allein." After one agent had employed Philip, another came and secured his valuable services; him two or three others followed, and our friend positively had money in bank. Not only were apprehensions of poverty removed for the present, but we had every reason to hope that Firmin's prosperity would increase and continue. And when a little son and heir was born, which blessing was conferred upon Mr. Philip about a year after his daughter, our godchild, saw the light, we should have thought it shame to have any misgivings about the future, so cheerful did Philip's prospects appear. "Did I not tell you," said my wife, with her usual kindling romance, "that comfort and succor would be found for these in the hour of their need?" Amen. We were grateful that comfort and succor should come. No one, I am sure, was more humbly thankful than Philip himself for the fortunate chances which befell him.

He was alarmed rather than elated by his sudden prosperity. "It can't last," he said. "Don't tell me. The attorneys must find me out before long. They can not continue to give their business to such an ignoramus; and I really think I must remonstrate with them." You should have seen the Little Sister's indignation when Philip uttered this sentiment in her presence. "Give up your business? Yes, do!" she cried, tossing up Philip's youngest born. "Fling this baby out of window, why not indeed, which Heaven has sent it you!—You ought to go down on your knees and ask pardon for having thought any thing so wicked." Philip's heir, by-the-way, immediately on his entrance into the world, had become the prime favorite of this unreasoning woman. The little daughter was passed over as a little person of no account, and so began to entertain the passion of jealousy at almost the very earliest age at which even the female breast is capable of enjoying it.

And though this Little Sister loved all these people with an almost ferocious passion of love, and lay awake, I believe, hearing their infantine cries, or crept on stealthy feet in darkness to their mother's chamber door, behind which they lay sleeping; though she had, as it were, a rage for these infants, and was wretched out of their sight, yet, when a third and a fourth brief came to Philip, and he was enabled to put a little money aside, nothing would content Mrs. Brandon but that he should go into a house of his own. "A gentleman," she said, "ought not to live in a two-pair lodging; he ought to have a house of his own." So, you see, she hastened on the preparations for her own execution. She trudged to the brokers' shops and made wonderful bargains of furniture. She cut chintzes, and covered sofas, and sewed, and patched, and fitted. She found a house and took it—Milman Street, Guildford Street, opposite the Fondling (as the dear little soul called it), a most genteel, quiet little street, "and quite near for me to come," she said, "to see my dears." Did she speak with dry eyes? Mine moisten sometimes when I think of the faith, of the generosity, of the sacrifice, of that devoted, loving creature.

I am very fond of Charlotte. Her sweetness and simplicity won all our hearts at home. No wife or mother ever was more attached and affectionate; but I own there was a time when I hated her, though of course that highly principled woman, the wife of the author of the present memoirs, says that the statement I am making here is stuff and nonsense, not to say immoral and irreligious. Well, then, I hated Charlotte for the horrible eagerness which she showed in getting away from this Little Sister, who clung round those children, whose first cries she had heard. I hated Charlotte for a cruel happiness which she felt as she hugged the children to her heart: her own children in their own room, whom she would dress, and watch, and wash, and tend; and for whom she wanted no aid. No aid, entendez vous? Oh, it was a shame, a shame! In the new house, in the pleasant little trim new nursery (fitted up by whose fond hands we will not say), is the mother glaring over the cot, where the little, soft, round cheeks are pillowed; and yonder in the rooms in Thornhaugh Street, where she has tended them for two years, the Little Sister sits lonely as the moonlight streams in. God help thee, little, suffering, faithful heart! Never but once in her life before had she known so exquisite a pain.

Of course we had an entertainment in the new house; and Philip's friends, old and new, came to the house-warming. The family coach of the Ringwoods blocked up that astonished little street. The powder on their footmen's heads nearly brushed the ceiling, as the monsters rose when the guests passed in and out of the hall. The Little Sister merely took charge of the tea-room. Philip's "library" was that usual little cupboard beyond the dining-room. The little drawing-room was dreadfully crowded by an ex-nursery piano, which the Ringwoods bestowed upon their friends; and somebody was in duty bound to play upon it on the evening of this soirée; though the Little Sister chafed down stairs at the music. In fact, her very words were, "Rat that piano!" She "ratted" the instrument, because the music would wake her little dears up stairs. And that music did wake them; and they howled melodiously, and the Little Sister, who was about to serve Lady Jane Tregarvan with some tea, dashed up stairs to the nursery: and Charlotte had reached the room already: and she looked angry when the Little Sister came in: and she said, "I am sure, Mrs. Brandon, the people down stairs will be wanting their tea;" and she spoke with some asperity. And Mrs. Brandon went down stairs without one word; and happening to be on the landing conversing with a friend, and a little out of the way of the duet which the Miss Ringwoods were performing—riding their great old horse, as it were, and putting it through its paces in Mrs. Firmin's little paddock—happening, I say, to be on the landing when Caroline passed, I took a hand as cold as stone, and never saw a look of grief more tragic than that worn by her poor little face as it passed. "My children cried," she said, "and I went up to the nursery. But she don't want me there now." Poor Little Sister! She humbled herself and groveled before Charlotte. You could not help trampling upon her then, Madam; and I hated you—and a great number of other women. Ridley and I went down to her tea-room, where Caroline resumed her place. She looked very nice and pretty, with her pale sweet face, and her neat cap and blue ribbon. Tortures I know she was suffering. Charlotte had been stabbing her. Women will use the edge sometimes, and drive the steel in. Charlotte said to me, some time afterward, "I was jealous of her, and you were right; and a dearer, more faithful creature never lived." But who told Charlotte I said she was jealous? O treble bestia! I told Ridley, and Mr. Ridley told Mrs. Firmin.

If Charlotte stabbed Caroline, Caroline could not help coming back again and again to the knife. On Sundays, when she was free, there was always a place for her at Philip's modest table; and when Mrs. Philip went to church Caroline was allowed to reign in the nursery. Sometimes Charlotte was generous enough to give Mrs. Brandon this chance. When Philip took a house—a whole house to himself—Philip's mother-in-law proposed to come and stay with him, and said that, wishing to be beholden to no one, she would pay for her board and lodging. But Philip declined this treat, representing, justly, that his present house was no bigger than his former lodgings. "My poor love is dying to have me," Mrs. Baynes remarked on this. "But her husband is so cruel to her, and keeps her under such terror, that she dares not call her life her own." Cruel to her! Charlotte was the happiest of the happy in her little house. In consequence of his parliamentary success Philip went regularly to chambers now, in the fond hope that more briefs might come. At chambers he likewise conducted the chief business of his Review: and, at the accustomed hour of his return, that usual little procession of mother and child and nurse would be seen on the watch for him; and the young woman—the happiest young woman in Christendom—would walk back clinging on her husband's arm.

All this while letters came from Philip's dear father at New York, where, it appeared, he was engaged not only in his profession but in various speculations with which he was always about to make his fortune. One day Philip got a newspaper advertising a new insurance company, and saw, to his astonishment, the announcement of "Counsel in London, Philip Firmin, Esq., Parchment Buildings, Temple." A paternal letter promised Philip great fees out of this insurance company, but I never heard that poor Philip was any the richer. In fact, his friends advised him to have nothing to do with this insurance company, and to make no allusion to it in his letters. "They feared the Danaï, and the gifts they brought," as old Firmin would have said. They had to impress upon Philip an abiding mistrust of that wily old Greek, his father. Firmin senior always wrote hopefully and magnificently, and persisted in believing or declaring that ere very long he should have to announce to Philip that his fortune was made. He speculated in Wall Street, I don't know in what shares, inventions, mines, railways. One day, some few months after his migration to Milman Street, Philip, blushing and hanging down his head, had to tell me that his father had drawn upon him again. Had he not paid up his shares in a certain mine they would have been forfeited, and he and his son after him would have lost a certain fortune, old Danaus said. I fear an artful, a long-bow pulling Danaus. What, shall a man have birth, wealth, friends, high position, and end so that we dare not leave him alone in the room with our spoons? "And you have paid this bill which the old man drew?" we asked. Yes, Philip had paid the bill. He vowed he would pay no more. But it was not difficult to see that the doctor would draw more bills upon this accommodating banker. "I dread the letters which begin with a flourish about the fortune which he is just going to make," Philip said. He knew that the old parent prefaced his demands for money in that way.

Mention has been made of a great medical discovery which he had announced to his correspondent, Mrs. Brandon, and by which the doctor declared, as usual, that he was about to make a fortune. In New York and Boston he had tried experiments which had been attended with the most astonishing success. A remedy was discovered, the mere sale of which in Europe and America must bring an immense revenue to the fortunate inventors. For the ladies whom Mrs. Brandon attended the remedy was of priceless value. He would send her some. His friend, Captain Morgan, of the Southampton packet-ship, would bring her some of this astonishing medicine. Let her try it. Let her show the accompanying cases to Doctor Goodenough—to any of his brother physicians in London. Though himself an exile from his country, he loved it, and was proud in being able to confer upon it one of the greatest blessings with which science had endowed mankind.

Goodenough, I am sorry to say, had such a mistrust of his confère that he chose to disbelieve any statement Firmin made. "I don't believe, my good Brandon, the fellow has nous enough to light upon any scientific discovery more useful than a new sauce for cutlets. He invent any thing but fibs, never!" You see this Goodenough is an obstinate old heathen; and when he has once found reason to mistrust a man, he forever after declines to believe him.

However, the doctor is a man forever on the look-out for more knowledge of his profession, and for more remedies to benefit mankind: he hummed and ha'd over the pamphlet, as the Little Sister sat watching him in his study. He clapped it down after a while, and slapped his hands on his little legs as his wont is. "Brandon," he says, "I think there is a great deal in it, and I think so the more because it turns out that Firmin has nothing to do with the discovery, which has been made at Boston." In fact, Dr. Firmin, late of London, had only been present in the Boston hospital, where the experiments were made with the new remedy. He had cried "Halves," and proposed to sell it as a secret remedy, and the bottle which he forwarded to our friend the Little Sister was labeled "Firmin's Anodyne." What Firmin did, indeed, was what he had been in the habit of doing. He had taken another man's property, and was endeavoring to make a flourish with it. The Little Sister returned home, then, with her bottle of chloroform—for this was what Dr. Firmin chose to call his discovery, and he had sent home a specimen of it; as he sent home a cask of petroleum from Virginia; as he sent proposals for new railways upon which he promised Philip a munificent commission, if his son could but place the shares among his friends.

And with regard to these valuables, the sanguine doctor got to believe that he really was endowing his son with large sums of money. "My boy has set up a house, and has a wife and two children, the young jackanapes!" he would say to people in New York; "as if he had not been extravagant enough in former days! When I married I had private means, and married a nobleman's niece with a large fortune. Neither of these two young folks has a penny. Well, well, the old father must help them as well as he can!" And I am told there were ladies who dropped the tear of sensibility, and said, "What a fond father this doctor is! How he sacrifices himself for that scape-grace of a son! Think of the dear doctor at his age, toiling cheerfully for that young man, who helped to ruin him!" And Firmin sighed; and passed a beautiful white handkerchief over his eyes with a beautiful white hand; and, I believe, really cried; and thought himself quite a good, affectionate, injured man. He held the plate at Church; he looked very handsome and tall, and bowed with a charming melancholy grace to the ladies as they put in their contributions. The dear man! His plate was fuller than other people's—so a traveler told us who saw him in New York; and described a very choice dinner which the doctor gave to a few friends at one of the smartest hotels just then opened.

With all the Little Sister's good management Mr. and Mrs. Philip were only able to install themselves in their new house at a considerable expense, and beyond that great Ringwood piano which swaggered in Philip's little drawing-room, I am constrained to say that there was scarce any furniture at all. One of the railway accounts was not paid as yet, and poor Philip could not feed upon mere paper promises to pay. Nor was he inclined to accept the offers of private friends, who were willing enough to be his bankers. "One in a family is enough for that kind of business," he said, gloomily; and it came out that again and again the interesting exile at New York who was deploring his son's extravagance and foolish marriage had drawn bills upon Philip which our friend accepted and paid—bills, who knows to what amount? He has never told; and the engaging parent who robbed him—must I use a word so unpolite?—will never now tell to what extent he helped himself to Philip's small means. This I know, that when autumn came—when September was past—we in our cozy little retreat at the sea-side received a letter from the Little Sister, in her dear little bad spelling (about which there used to be somehow a pathos which the very finest writing does not possess)—there came, I say, a letter from the Little Sister in which she told us, with many dashes, that dear Mrs. Philip and the children were pining and sick in London, and that Philip, he had too much pride and spirit to take money from any one; that Mr. Tregarvan was away traveling on the continent, and that wretch—that monster, you know who—have drawn upon Philip again for money, and again he have paid, and the dear, dear children can't have fresh air.

"Did she tell you," said Philip, brushing his hands across his eyes when a friend came to remonstrate with him—"did she tell you that she brought me money herself, but we would not use it? Look! I have her little marriage gift yonder in my desk, and pray God I shall be able to leave it to my children. The fact is, the doctor has drawn upon me, as usual; he is going to make a fortune next week. I have paid another bill of his. The parliamentary agents are out of town, at their moors in Scotland, I suppose. The air of Russell Square is uncommonly wholesome, and when the babies have had enough of that, why, they must change it for Brunswick Square. Talk about the country! what country can be more quiet than Guildford Street in September? I stretch out of a morning and breathe the mountain-air on Ludgate Hill." And with these dismal pleasantries and jokes our friend chose to put a good face upon bad fortune. The kinsmen of Ringwood offered hospitality kindly enough, but how was poor Philip to pay railway expenses for servants, babies, and wife? In this strait Tregarvan from abroad, having found out some monstrous design of Russ—of the Great Power of which he stood in daily terror, and which, as we are in strict amity with that Power, no other Power shall induce me to name—Tregarvan wrote to his editor, and communicated to him in confidence a most prodigious and nefarious plot against the liberties of all the rest of Europe, in which the Power in question was engaged, and in a postscript added, "By-the-way, the Michaelmas quarter is due, and I send you a check," etc. etc. O precious postscript!

"Didn't I tell you it would be so?" said my wife, with a self-satisfied air. "Was I not certain that succor would come?"

And succor did come, sure enough; and a very happy little party went down to Brighton in a second-class carriage, and got an extraordinarily cheap lodging, and the roses came back to the little pale cheeks, and mamma was wonderfully invigorated and refreshed, as all her friends could have seen when the little family came back to town, only there was such a thick dun fog that it was impossible to see complexions at all.

When the shooting season was come to an end the parliamentary agents who had employed Philip came back to London, and, I am happy to say, gave him a check for his little account. My wife cried, "Did I not tell you so?" more than ever. "Is not every thing for the best? I knew dear Philip would prosper!"

Every thing was for the best, was it? Philip was sure to prosper, was he? What do you think of the next news which the poor fellow brought to us? One night in December he came to us, and I saw by his face that some event of importance had befallen him.

"I am almost heart-broken," he said, thumping on the table when the young ones had retreated from it. "I don't know what to do. I have not told you all. I have paid four bills for him already, and now he has—he has signed my name."

"Who has?"

"He at New York. You know," said poor Philip. "I tell you he has put my name on a bill, and without my authority."

"Gracious Heavens! You mean your father has for.....I could not say the word."

"Yes," groaned Philip. "Here is a letter from him." And he handed a letter across the table in the doctor's well-known handwriting.

"DEAREST PHILIP"—the father wrote—"a sad misfortune has befallen me, which I had hoped to conceal, or, at any rate, to avert from my dear son. For you, Philip, are a participator in that misfortune through the imprudence—must I say it?—of your father. Would I had struck off the hand which has done the deed ere it had been done! But the fault has taken wings and flown out of my reach. Immeritus, dear boy, you have to suffer for the delicta majorum. Ah, that a father should have to own his fault—to kneel and ask pardon of his son!

"I am engaged in many speculations. Some have succeeded beyond my wildest hopes: some have taken in the most rational, the most prudent, the least sanguine of our capitalists in Wall Street, and promising the greatest results have ended in the most extreme failure! To meet a call in an undertaking which seemed to offer the most CERTAIN PROSPECTS of success, which seemed to promise a fortune for me and my boy, and your dear children, I put in among other securities which I had to realize on a sudden, a bill, on which I used your name. I dated it as drawn six months back by me at New York, on you at Parchment Buildings, Temple; and I wrote your acceptance as though the signature were yours. I give myself up to you. I tell you what I have done. Make the matter public. Give my confession to the world, as here I write, and sign it, and your father is branded forever to the world as a —. Spare me the word!

"As I live, as I hope for your forgiveness—long ere that bill became due. It is at five months' date for £386 4s. 3d., value received, and dated from the Temple on the 4th of July. I passed it to one who promised to keep it until I myself should redeem it. The commission which he charged me was enormous, rascally; and not content with the immense interest which he extorted from me, the scoundrel has passed the bill away, and it is in Europe, in the hands of an enemy.

"You remember Tufton Hunt? Yes. You most justly chastised him. The wretch lately made his detested appearance in this city, associated with the lowest of the base, and endeavored to resume his old practice of threats, cajoleries, and extortions! In a fatal hour the villain heard of the bill of which I have warned you. He purchased it from the gambler to whom it had been passed. As New York was speedily too hot to hold him (for the unhappy man has even left me to pay his hotel score), he has fled—and fled to Europe—taking with him that fatal bill, which he says he knows you will pay. Ah! dear Philip, if that bill were but once out of the wretch's hands! What sleepless hours of agony should I be spared! I pray you, I implore you, make every sacrifice to meet it! You will not disown it? No. As you have children of your own—as you love them—you would not willingly let them leave a dishonored

FATHER.

"I have a share in a great medical discovery, regarding which I have written to our friend Mrs. Brandon, and which is sure to realize an immense profit, as introduced into England by a physician so well known—may I not say professionally? respected as myself. The very first profits resulting from that discovery I promise, on my honor, to devote to you. They will very soon far more than repay the loss which my imprudence has brought on my dear boy. Farewell! Love to your wife and little ones.—G. B. F."

Monthly Record of Current Events.

UNITED STATES.

OUR Record closes on the 8th of May. The events of the month have been of the utmost importance, and we close in hourly anticipation of tidings of decisive character from our armies in Virginia and the Southwest.—The session of Congress is evidently approaching its close. When it is concluded we intend to furnish a general resumé of its proceedings, noting the leading measures proposed, adopted, and postponed. Apart from general discussions, the leading topics of the month have been the passage by both Houses, and the signature by the President, of a bill for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia; the Tax bill, which, having passed the House, is still under consideration in the Senate; and the Confiscation bills now before the Senate.—For the time, however, military proceedings take precedence of all others. Reports of the operations of our forces have been so carefully guarded that we must confine our statements to a few ascertained facts:

Yorktown, where Cornwallis surrendered in 1781, virtually closing the war of the Revolution, was strongly fortified by the Confederates. The attack upon this place was opened on the 5th of April by our forces, under the immediate direction of General McClellan. While our works were pushed forward several sharp skirmishes took place, the most notable of which was on the 16th, at Lee's Mills, where the Vermont brigade charged one of the enemy's entrenchments, carried, and held it against overwhelming odds, but were finally forced back, having suffered a loss of 35 killed and 120 wounded. The approaches to the Confederate works were pushed on until the 4th of May, when all was ready for a vigorous attack. But on the previous night the enemy evacuated the place, leaving behind 70 heavy guns, and a large amount of stores and camp equipage.

They fell back to Williamsburg, their rear being closely pressed by our forces. Here they made a stand and a sharp encounter took place, resulting, according to the dispatch of General McClellan of the 6th, in their defeat, with considerable loss, and the abandonment of Williamsburg, which had, like Yorktown, been elaborately fortified.

General McDowell's division has been in the mean time pressing forward toward Richmond. The latest dispatches leave him in possession of the important town of Fredericksburg.

The battle of Pittsburg, or Shiloh, as it will probably be named, from a church standing near where it was fought, was hardly as decisive as our first reports indicated. On the first day, April 6, the result seemed to be wholly in favor of the Confederates, who, with greatly superior forces, attacked our lines, captured General Prentiss, with a large part of his command, and appeared to have won a decisive victory. General Beauregard telegraphed this result to Richmond, where it was received with great rejoicing. The advance of the enemy was checked by our gun-boats, and the opportune arrival of reinforcements under General Buell enabled us to assume the offensive on the following day, when the enemy were driven back toward Corinth. General Albert Sidney Johnston, the Commander-in-chief of the Western Division of the Confederate army, was killed in the action of the 6th. Our entire loss, as officially given, amounts to 1735 killed, 7882 wounded, and 4044 missing—these including the prisoners captured with General Prentiss—a total loss of 13,661 men. The loss of the enemy, in killed and wounded, probably exceeds our own; partial reports, gleaned from the Southern papers, already bring it up very nearly to our numbers. This battle, though not decisive, is the most bloody ever fought upon this continent. We close our Record for the month in hourly anticipation of important tidings from this quarter.

General O. M. Mitchell, long known as one of the foremost astronomers of the day, who was the first to enter the Confederate strong-hold of Bowling Green, performed a brilliant exploit on the 10th of April. Making a sudden dash forward, he took by surprise the town of Huntsville, Alabama, an important point on the line of the Memphis and Charleston Railroad, which connects Richmond with the Southwest.

Two important fortifications seized by the enemy at the outbreak of the rebellion have been recaptured. Fort Pulaski, near Savannah, Georgia, has been for some time closely invested. It was garrisoned by about 400 men, with abundant ammunition and provisions for six months, and was believed by the enemy to be able to resist any force that could be brought against it. Our batteries were placed on Tybee Island, at distances varying from 1700 to 3500 yards from the fort—a greater distance than has ever before been found available against strong fortifications. These were completed on the 10th of April, and the fort was summoned to surrender, and immediately on refusal fire was opened. At the end of 18 hours' bombardment a breach was effected, but the resistance was kept up 12 hours longer. Every thing was in readiness for storming the fort, when, on the 11th, it was surrendered, with all its stores, ammunition, and garrison. Our loss in the capture was but one man, and only four were injured within the fort.—Fort Macon, at Beaufort, North Carolina, surrendered on the 25th of April, after a bombardment of eleven hours.

Of still greater importance is the capture of New Orleans, which took place on the 26th of April. The accounts which have reached us come indirectly through Southern sources, and embrace only the leading points. It had been constantly reported that the whole course of the Mississippi below New Orleans was so fortified that no fleet could possibly reach the city; which was also said to be occupied by a large force, abundantly armed. Forts Jackson and St. Philip, on opposite sides of the river, about twenty-five miles above its mouth, and seventy-five miles below New Orleans, were relied upon to prevent any passage. The National fleet, under command of Commodore Farragut, approached these forts about the 20th of April, and opened a vigorous bombardment, which lasted for nearly a week. Besides the fire from the forts, our vessels were exposed to the assaults of fire-boats sent down against them, and gun-boats and steam batteries on the general plan of the Virginia. These proved unavailing, and at length the fire of the forts was silenced; but whether they were captured we are not as yet informed. But, in any case, the passage was forced, and our vessels made their way up to New Orleans on the 26th, with no further opposition. The city was now wholly at their mercy, and its surrender was demanded by Commodore Farragut. He required that the flag of the United States should be raised on the City Hall, Mint, and Custom-house, and that all other emblems of sovereignty should be removed, promising that the rights of persons and property should be respected; but insisting that no persons should be molested for expressions of loyalty to the Government of the United States. He gave special notice to the Mayor, to whom his demand was addressed, that he should "speedily and severely punish any person or persons who shall commit such outrages as were witnessed yesterday by armed men firing upon helpless women and children for giving expression to their pleasure at witnessing the 'old flag.'—The Mayor, Mr. John F. Monroe, replied that out of regard to the lives of women and children who crowded the city, General Lovell had evacuated it, and given back to him the administration of the government. The city was wholly without means of defense. To surrender such a place would be an unmeaning ceremony; it was at the disposal of the assailants by "brute force, and not by the choice or consent of the inhabitants." But no man was to be found there who would hoist a flag not of their own adoption. The people, he said, were "sensitive to all that could affect their dignity and self-respect," and he asked that their "susceptibilities should be respected;" they would not allow themselves to be "insulted by the interference of such as have rendered themselves odious and contemptible by their dastardly desertion of our cause in the mighty struggle in which we are engaged, or such as might remind them too forcibly that they are the conquered and you are the conquerors. . . . Your occupation of the city," concludes this singular document, "does not transfer allegiance from the Government of their choice to one which they have deliberately repudiated, and they yield the obedience which the conqueror is entitled to extort from the conquered."

MEXICO.

The latest intelligence from Mexico indicates that the coalition between Spain, France, and Great Britain is at an end. The Spanish part of the expedition has been withdrawn; that of England was too small to have any virtual influence; but the French commander, General Lorencez, intimating that he acts under the direct authority of the Emperor, announces that he will not recognize the existing Government, and has in effect declared war against it, with the purpose of subverting the Republican form of Government, and replacing it with a European monarch. Maximilian of Austria is the name still put forward, although it is more than likely that this is a mere pretense; and that the real design is to provide, if possible, a throne for some member of the Napoleon family. President Juarez and his Minister, General Doblado, meanwhile, announce their determination to resist by every means the French projects, while they offer to continue the negotiations with the Spanish and British plenipotentiaries.

EUROPE.

The leading features in our European intelligence relate to the reception of the tidings of the exploits of the Monitor and the Merrimac. It is universally admitted that a complete revolution has been wrought in the naval affairs of the world; that henceforth for all offensive purposes wooden vessels are worthless; and that, moreover, immense vessels like the Warrior and Gloire are failures. Batteries embodying the general principles which have been tested in America are the only reliance. In every dock-yard in England the work upon wooden men-of-war has been suspended, and all the resources of the establishments are employed in forwarding iron-clad vessels. Experiments, however, have been made under the direction of Sir William Armstrong, the inventor of the gun which bears his name, which are thought to demonstrate that vessels clothed with iron in the manner of the Monitor are perfectly vulnerable to round shot, fired from smooth bores at short range from guns of large calibre, although they are proof against elongated shot from rifled guns at long range.

Literary Notices.

The City of the Saints, by RICHARD H. BURTON, author of "The Lake Regions of Central Africa." (Published by Harper and Brothers.) Captain Burton, having visited the sacred cities of Hindoos and Jews, Mohammedans and Christians, was naturally anxious to see the Holy City of the Mormons. He is a veteran traveler, knowing how to gather facts from his own observation and from that of others; and was well prepared to describe the Saints and their famous city. Being an Englishman, he was not liable to the prejudice which exists among the Mormons against Americans. Still, he does not pretend that his stay of twenty-four days enabled him to penetrate into those secrets of the faith which are revealed only to the initiated. He undertakes to tell only what he saw and heard. He takes, moreover, the attitude of a philosophical observer, to whom the manners of any people, however strange, afford no cause of wonder. Thus he coolly sums up the advantages and disadvantages of polygamy, and calmly decides that though not adapted to a thickly-settled country, yet for the Mormons it is a very natural, and probably a desirable institution. We of course dissent wholly from Mr. Burton's conclusion; but it is worth while to examine the arguments by which he supports it. They enlighten us as to the process by which men and women, not deficient in intelligence, and with no special vicious proclivities, may hold a tenet so abhorrent to our feelings. But the special value of the book is its picture of Mormon life and manners, as they presented themselves to an impartial observer. Mr. Burton's representations are much more favorable than those to which we are accustomed. To him the Mormons appear a peaceful, industrious, law-abiding people. He saw no traces of the rudeness and profligacy of which we have been so often told; respectability, decorum, dullness even, is the law of the land. "A Moslem gloom, the result of austere morals and manners, and of the semi-seclusion of the sex, hangs over society." He utterly discredits the accounts so often repeated of obscene orgies said to be practiced in the secrecy of the Endowment House. Mr. Burton was introduced to Brigham Young by Governor Cummings. The description of the Prophet is interesting. Though verging upon threescore scarcely a silver thread appears in his light hair. His forehead is narrow; eyes of a bluish-gray, with one drooping lid; eyebrows thin; nose fine, sharp-pointed, set a little awry; lips close; teeth imperfect; form large, broad-shouldered, somewhat stooping. His dress was of gray homespun, cut large and baggy, with black satin vest, and a cravat knotted loosely around an unstarched fall-over collar. His whole appearance was that of a well-to-do Yankee farmer. Contrary to what is so often said, he is temperate almost to asceticism, abstaining from liquors and tobacco, and indifferent to the luxuries of the table, baked potatoes and butter-milk forming his favorite food. His manner is calm and quiet, though even in conversation he impresses one with an air of conscious power. He said nothing to his visitor on religious or political topics, but came out strong on agriculture and cattle-breeding. Mr. Burton, of course, made no inquiries as to the number of his family, though a casual remark of the Prophet intimated that he was a patriarch as well. "That," said he, pointing to a building of considerable size, "is a private school for my children." When he speaks in public he begins slowly, word creeping after word, the opening phrases being hardly audible. As he warms up his voice rises high and sonorous, the words pouring out with great fluency. His gestures are easy and rounded, and not ungraceful. Such, according to Mr. Burton, is the outward aspect of "His Excellency Brigham Young, once 'painter and glazier,' now prophet, revelator, translator, and seer; the man who is revered as king or kaiser, pope or pontiff never was; who, like the Old Man of the Mountain, by holding up his hand, could cause the death of any one within his reach." He is indeed the brain and heart of the Mormon theocracy. What form this will take, and by whose hands it will be guided when he is gone, no man can say. Mormons themselves profess no anxiety upon these points. "The Lord," they say, "who raised up Brigham when Joseph was taken, will provide a leader when he is wanted." Mr. Burton gives humorous but not unfavorable sketches of the other Mormon dignitaries; but not one of them seems likely to be able to fill the place of the Prophet. Life in Salt Lake City presents, at least among the Mormons, few ludicrous aspects. "Brother" and "Sister" take the place of the "Mr." and "Mrs." of the Gentiles. Ask a boy what is his name, and he will reply, "I am Brother So-and-So's son." To distinguish the sons of one father by different mothers, the name of the mother is prefixed to that of the father. Brother Smith's sons by Sisters Brown, Jones, and Robinson, will be Brother Brown Smith, Brother Jones Smith, and Brother Robinson Smith. Mr. Burton's representation of the Mormon doctrines has the merit of being faithfully compiled from their own recognized authorities, without being colored by the opinions of the writer, and on this account is well worthy of careful perusal. Even in his brief visit Mr. Burton was forcibly impressed with the disaffection of the Mormons toward the United States. The harangues in the tabernacle, the columns of the Deseret News, and the talk of the people all show it. "They regard the States as the States regarded England after the War of Independence, and hate them as the Mexican Criolles hate the Gachupins—and much for the same reason." Mr. Burton believes that absolute independence will be, until attained, the aim of the Mormon leaders; and that Deseret will in the end become a sovereign and independent State, as exclusive as Thibet and Northern China, where the rigors of the Mosaic code will be re-enacted, polygamy legalized, fornication punished with stripes and imprisonment, and adultery with death. As a whole, Mr. Burton's book is the most valuable as well as the most readable one which has been published concerning this peculiar people, and will amply repay careful perusal.

The Rebellion Record, edited by FRANK MOORE. The design and execution of this work are alike admirable. Its object is to furnish, in a digested and systematic shape, the materials from which is to be constructed a history of the great struggle through which the nation is now passing. Keeping somewhat behind the march of events, the editor selects from the mass of statements and documents which fill the columns of the newspapers of the day every thing the preservation of which will elucidate the varying aspects of the war. It comprises a diary of events as they occur in order of time, the ascertained facts being carefully sifted from the mass of floating rumors; all the important documents and narratives faithfully reproduced, upon both sides; with the lighter incidents, poetry, anecdotes, and adventures, which serve to make up the picture of the times. We have had almost daily occasion to consult this work, and have never failed to find any important document or fact duly noted. To the future historian this Record will be for this war what the archives of Simancas were to Mr. Motley in elaborating his history of the Dutch Republic. The Record is issued in weekly numbers, and afterward collected into volumes. The first, to which is prefixed as an introduction Edward Everett's noble address, contains the events to the middle of June, 1861; the second, those to the close of August; and the third, which has just been completed, brings the history down to February, 1862. A copious index to each volume gives every facility for referring to any incident or document. (G. P. Putnam, publisher.)

Considerations on Representative Government, by JOHN STUART MILL. (Published by Harper and Brothers.) Mr. Mill is the author of the article on the "Contest in America," which appeared in the April Number of this Magazine—the only well-considered paper on this subject which has yet been written by any Englishman. He is beyond doubt the ablest political thinker of Great Britain. In this treatise he discusses the whole theory of government, shows that a representative form is the best for any people who are prepared for it; points out the special dangers to which it is exposed, and suggests the means of obviating them. The argument in favor of universal suffrage, and the mode which he proposes for securing to minorities their appropriate share in the government, are especially worthy of attention. Although his scheme to provide for this latter object embraces details which will render it too cumbrous to be carried into practical effect, yet his observations are of great value. As a whole, his work is the ablest contribution made to political science since the publication of the "Federalist;" and it will command the attention of all American statesmen, at a time when it is probable that some modifications in the form of our institutions is likely to be demanded by the new posture of our affairs.

The "Household Edition" of the Works of CHARLES DICKENS, published by Sheldon and Company, is by far the most attractive form in which the works of "Boz" have been issued, either in this country or in England. "Martin Chuzzlewit," which commences the series, is comprised in four neat volumes of convenient size, beautifully printed, and illustrated with original sketches by Darley and Gilbert, who stand unquestionably at the head of the American and English schools of illustrators.

The Last of the Mortimers is the latest novel by MRS. OLIPHANT, the author of "Margaret Maitland," "The Laird of Norlaw," and other capital tales. This is one of the best of her works, characterized by a delicate vein of thought, with a larger element of incident and dramatic power than appears in most of her previous productions. (Harper and Brothers.)

The Struggles of Brown, Jones, and Robinson is an amusing story from the facile pen of Mr. ANTHONY TROLLOPE. The heroes—quite different personages from the trio of the same names whose foreign tour was immortalized by Doyle—are a firm of London shopkeepers, who, with little capital and small credit, attempt to do a "smashing" business by dint of enormous advertising and humbug. Their

"Magenta House" career, ending in most deserved bankruptcy, is detailed with infinite humor. It is just the book to while away the tedium of a railway ride on a summer's day. (Harper and Brothers.)

Mr. D. Van Nostrand has made the publication of military books a specialty. Among the more important of his recent issues is the Military Dictionary of Colonel H. L. SCOTT, late Inspector-General of the United States Army. This is a complete Encyclopædia of military science, comprising not merely definitions of technical terms, but profound and exhaustive treatises upon all the important subjects pertaining to the art of war and the duties of officers.—The New Infantry Tactics, by General SILAS CASEY, has received the approval of General M'Clellan, and may therefore safely be assumed to possess decided value.—GIBBON'S Artillerist's Manual is recognized as the standard authority for this important arm of the national forces.—BENTON'S Ordnance and Gunnery, compiled for the use of the Military Academy at West Point; and SIMPSON'S Treatise on Ordnance and Naval Gunnery, prepared as a textbook for the Naval Academy, appear in new editions, bringing the information down to the present time. So also does the treatise on American Military Bridges, by General GEO. W. CULLUM, Chief of the Staff of General Halleck.

Harper's Hand-Book for Travelers in Europe and the East, by W. PEMBROKE FETRIDGE. The author of this comprehensive book has performed a labor which will insure him the gratitude of all tourists. Within the compass of a single volume, so compact that it may be carried in the pocket, he has given a condensation of all the essential information which the traveler needs to guide him through France, Germany, Italy, Spain, Great Britain, Egypt, Syria, and Palestine; the substance, in fact, of all that is contained in more than a score of Guide-Books, which every tourist has heretofore found an essential though cumbrous part of his impedimenta. Mr. FetrIDGE lays down a series of routes for different classes of tourists. Making Paris his starting-point, he conducts the traveler who has only three or four months to spare through France, Holland, the most interesting portions of Germany, into Switzerland and Italy, and through Great Britain and Ireland. If he has two months more, in addition to these, he is taken still farther into Germany and Italy. If he has a year, his tour is extended to Egypt, up the Nile, through Syria and Palestine, visiting Jerusalem, the Dead Sea, Baalbeck, and Damascus. If he has an additional two months, they are spent in Spain and on the Mediterranean islands. He gives minute directions as to all the details of travel; tells where to go, and how; what to see, and what to avoid; what to pay, and what to refuse to pay, down to the minutiae of railroad fares and the proper fees for a cicerone or custodian of a gallery. The work is based upon a practical experience of the precise wants of the American tourist, and is no less valuable for what it omits than for what it contains. It is so compact in form, so clear in arrangement, so thoroughly practical in all points of detail, that it can not fail to be the recognized vade mecum of American tourists; while those who have already traveled will find in it an admirable resumé of what they have seen, or ought to have seen. Its value is greatly enhanced by an admirable map, in which all the main routes are clearly laid down in a separate color. (Published by Harper and Brothers.)

THE FORMATION AND ADOPTION OF THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES.

—On the 11th of June, 1776, the day on which the Committee for preparing the Declaration of Independence was appointed, Congress resolved that a Committee be appointed to prepare and digest a form of Confederation to be entered into between the colonies. This Committee, which consisted of one member from each colony, was appointed on the following day. In about a month this Committee reported to Congress a draft, which was debated for several days in the Committee of the Whole, who reported a new draft, which was ordered to be printed. It was not finally acted upon by Congress till November, 1777—more than two years after the Declaration of Independence—when the Articles of Confederation were agreed upon by Congress. Congress then addressed a circular to the Legislatures of the States, requesting them to authorize their Delegates in Congress to subscribe to the Articles of Confederation in behalf of their respective States. With this request the Legislatures were by no means prompt in complying. Many objections were made to the Articles, and they were not ratified by all the States till March, 1781—nearly five years after the Declaration of Independence. The Articles were not binding till they were adopted by all the States. Up to the time of their adoption Congress had, by common consent, exercised the powers of a General Government.

The States were now united by written articles of agreement. Each State was to “reserve its sovereignty, independence, and every power, jurisdiction, and right which were not by the Articles of Confederation expressly delegated to the United States in Congress assembled.” The Delegates to Congress—which was to consist of a single House—were to be appointed annually in such a manner as the Legislatures of each State should direct; each State to have not less than two nor more than seven Delegates; each State to pay its own Delegates; each State to have one vote, which was to be determined by a majority of its Delegates. Congress was to have power to declare war and make peace; to enter into treaties and alliances; to appoint courts for the trial of piracies and felonies on the high seas; to fix the standard of weights and measures; to establish post-offices; to coin money and emit bills on the credit of the United States; to ascertain and apportion among the States the sums necessary for defraying the public expenses. For the exercise of the more important of these powers the assent of nine States was necessary. No provision was made for a national judiciary, or for an executive department distinct from the legislative. The acts of Congress were thus, in fact, mere recommendations, which the States complied with or not as they saw fit. The defects of the Confederation were soon apparent. The National Government had no efficiency. Washington’s personal influence, and not the power of the Government, brought the Revolution to a successful issue. Washington said, “The Confederation appears to me to be little more than a shadow without the substance; and Congress a nugatory body, their ordinances being little attended to.”

After the close of the war matters grew still worse. The entire prostration of public credit, the dissensions between the States, and the utter neglect with which the resolves of Congress were treated, threatened the most alarming consequences. The time seemed rapidly approaching when, to use the language of Washington, it would seem to be a subject of “regret that so much blood and treasure have been lavished to no purpose; that so many sufferings have been encountered without compensation, and that so many sacrifices have been made in vain.” In this gloomy state of affairs James Madison made the first public legislative movement toward the establishment of a better government. He became a member of the Legislature of Virginia in May, 1784, but was not able to secure the co-operation of a majority of the Legislature till June, 1786, and then only so far as to adopt the following resolution: “Resolved, That Messrs. Randolph, Madison, Jones, Tucker, and Lewis be appointed Commissioners, who, or any three of whom, shall meet such Commissioners as may be appointed by other States in the Union to take into consideration the trade of the United States, to consider how far a uniform system in their commercial regulations may be necessary to their common interests and their permanent harmony, and to report to the several States such an act relative to this great object as, when unanimously ratified by them, will enable the United States effectually to provide for the same.”

All the States, except Maryland, Connecticut, South Carolina, and Georgia, appointed Delegates to a Convention to meet at Annapolis, September, 1786. The Delegates of five States attended the Convention, viz., New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, and Virginia. During the interval between the passage of the above-mentioned resolution and the meeting of the Convention the state of the country and the defects of the Confederation had formed the subject of earnest discussion throughout the States, and there had been an advance of public opinion in the direction of giving additional power to Congress. In consequence the Convention was led to decline the limited task assigned to it, and to recommend to the States the calling of a Convention with powers adequate to the occasion. A report containing this recommendation was drawn up by Alexander Hamilton. This recommendation was first acted upon by the Legislature of Virginia, where it met with a unanimous approval. New York was the next State that moved in the matter. Her Legislature instructed her Delegates in Congress to move a resolution recommending to the States the appointment of delegates “to meet in convention for the purpose of revising and proposing amendments to the Articles of Confederation.”

On the 21st of February, 1787, a resolution was adopted in Congress, recommending that the State Legislatures appoint Delegates to meet in Convention at Philadelphia on the second Monday in May, 1787. Delegates were accordingly appointed by all the States except Rhode Island.

On the day appointed for the meeting of the Convention (May 14) only a small number of the Delegates had arrived in Philadelphia. The Convention did not open till May 25, when there were present twenty-nine members, representing nine States. Others soon after came in, till the whole number amounted to fifty-five. Among them were Washington, Hamilton, Madison, Franklin, Sherman, Ellsworth, King, Livingston, the Morrisses, Pinckney, Wilson, and others scarcely less distinguished for talents and public services. Robert Morris, in behalf of the delegation from Pennsylvania, nominated Washington to preside over the Convention.

Franklin was to have made the nomination, but was prevented by ill health from being present. The Convention having adopted their standing rules—one of which was "that nothing spoken in the House be printed or otherwise published without leave"—Mr. Randolph, of Virginia, opened the main business of the Convention. After a speech, in which he enumerated the defects of the Confederation, he offered fifteen resolutions, which embodied the substance of a plan of Government which is the same as that contained in letters written by Mr. Madison to Mr. Jefferson, Mr. Randolph, and General Washington a few months previous.

The following is a brief outline of said plan: The National Legislature to consist of two branches—the members of the first branch to be elected by the people of the several States; the members of the second branch to be elected by the first branch, out of a proper number nominated by the State Legislatures; the National Legislature to have a negative on all the State laws contravening the Articles of Union, and to have power to legislate in all cases where the States were incompetent; the right of suffrage in the Legislature to be proportioned to the quota of contribution, or to the number of free inhabitants; a National Executive to be chosen by the National Legislature; a National Judiciary, to consist of one or more supreme tribunals and inferior ones, the judges to be chosen by the National Legislature; the Executive and a convenient number of the National Judiciary to compose a council of revision to examine every act of the National Legislature before it should operate, and every act of a particular Legislature before a negative thereon should be final; provision to be made for the admission of new States to the Union; a republican form of government to be administered to each State; provision to be made for amendments to the articles of Union; the Legislative, Executive, and Judiciary powers of the several States to be bound by oath to support the Articles of Union.

Such was the plan of Government presented to the Convention by the resolutions of Mr. Randolph. The resolutions were referred to the Committee of the Whole. Mr. Pinckney, of South Carolina, then submitted a plan of Government with supreme Legislative, Judiciary, and Executive powers. This was also referred to the Committee of the Whole. The resolutions of Mr. Randolph were debated from day to day, in the Committee of the Whole, till the 13th of June. The Committee then reported to the Convention a series of nineteen resolutions founded upon those proposed by Mr. Randolph. The first of these, and the first adopted by the Committee, was: "That a National Government ought to be established, consisting of a supreme Legislative, Executive, and Judiciary."

At the opening of the Convention the views of a large majority of the members were confined to amending the Articles of Confederation. The futility of this soon became apparent, and the first resolution adopted was that a National Government ought to be established. The prime movers in calling the Convention had from the first the formation of such a government in view. The nineteen resolutions reported to the Convention contained the following provisions: The Legislature to consist of two branches—the first to be elected by the people for three years, the second by the State Legislatures for seven years—to have powers superior to those of the Congress of the Confederation; the right of suffrage in the Legislature to be proportioned to the number of free persons and two-fifths of other persons; a National Executive to be chosen for seven years, and to be ineligible for a second term; a National Judiciary, with suitable powers; the whole to be submitted for ratification to assemblies chosen by the people for that express purpose.

Some progress had thus been made—not in the amendment of the Articles of Confederation—not in the formation of a League between the States—but in the formation of a Constitution for the United States. This progress was made not without great difficulty. There were some in the Convention who clung to the Confederation, and were unwilling that any considerable increase of power should be given to the Government of the Union. The small States were unwilling to surrender the equality of suffrage which they had hitherto enjoyed in Congress. From these and various other causes it seemed almost impossible for the Convention to unite upon any plan. But, by patient discussion and mutual concession, progress was made. Resolutions were offered, debated, postponed, called up again, passed, reconsidered, amended, again postponed, and others perhaps proposed in their place, until at length a majority agreed upon the nineteen resolutions above-mentioned. This was on the 13th of June.

On the 15th of June Mr. Patterson, of New Jersey, laid before the Convention a plan which had been concerted by the Delegates of New Jersey and Delaware, and by some of the Delegates of New York. This plan proposed to revise the Articles of Confederation, to enlarge the powers of Congress with respect to the revenue and the regulation of commerce; to empower Congress to appoint an Executive to execute Federal acts, to appoint Federal officers, and to direct all military operations; to establish a Federal Judiciary; to make the acts of Congress passed in accordance with the Articles of Confederation, and the treaties made and ratified under the authority of the United States the supreme law of the land. The plan of Mr. Patterson was referred to the Committee of the Whole, to whom were also recommended the resolutions reported on the 13th of June.

The two plans were now fairly before the Convention. It was admitted that the one aimed at perpetuating the League between the States; that the other aimed at forming a National Government acting upon individuals. "The true question is," said Mr. Randolph, "whether we shall adhere to the Federal plan, or introduce the National plan." "A National Government alone, properly constituted, will answer the purpose." The two plans were debated for four days, when the Committee reported the nineteen resolutions without alteration. Massachusetts, Connecticut, Pennsylvania, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia voted in favor of the National plan. New York, New Jersey, and Delaware voted against it. The vote of Maryland was divided.

It was during this debate, while the two plans were before the Committee, that Alexander Hamilton addressed the Convention for the first time, and gave the outline of a Government which he would prefer. He did not propose his plan with the hope that it would be adopted. "He did not mean to offer the paper he had sketched as a proposition to the Committee. It was only meant to give a more correct view of his ideas, and to suggest the amendments which he should probably propose to the plan of Mr. Randolph in the proper stages of its future discussion."

The following is an outline of Hamilton's plan which the reader will desire to know, though it had no marked influence upon the proceedings of the Convention: The Supreme Legislature to be vested in an Assembly and Senate; the members of the Assembly to be chosen by the people for three years; the members of the Senate to be chosen by electors elected for that purpose by the people; the Senators to serve during good behavior; the Supreme Executive Authority to be vested in a Governor holding office during good behavior; to be chosen by electors, who were to be chosen by the people; the Governor to have an unqualified veto on all laws about to be passed; to have the sole appointment of the heads of departments; to have the appointment of all other officers, subject to the advice and consent of the Senate; in most other respects to have the powers now possessed by the President of the United States; the Senate to have power of declaring war and of advising and approving treaties; the judges of the Supreme Court to hold office during good behavior; the Governors of each State to be appointed by the General Government, said Governors to have a veto on all acts of the State Legislatures; all laws of the States contrary to the Constitution and laws of the United States to be null and void.

The Convention had now, after much discussion, decided to form a Constitution for a National Government. Much as they had done, they had only made a beginning. To agree upon the details of the general plan was a work of great difficulty. There were times when it seemed impossible for the members to agree upon the details, when it was thought that the Convention must give up in despair. Even Washington said, in writing to a friend, "I almost despair of seeing a favorable issue to the proceedings of the Convention, and do therefore regret having had any agency in the business." But the patriots fainted not. They continued their discussions until the 23d of July, when Mr. Gerry, of Massachusetts, moved "That the proceedings of the Convention for the establishment of a National Government (excepting the part relating to the Executive) be referred to a committee to prepare and report a Constitution conformable thereunto." Messrs. Rutledge, Randolph, Gorham, Ellsworth, and Wilson constituted this Committee of Detail.

On the 26th of July the proceedings of the Convention respecting the Executive were referred to the Committee of Detail, and the Convention adjourned to the 6th of August, that the Committee might have time to prepare and report a Constitution.

On the 6th of August the Committee reported a Constitution in twenty-three articles, embodying the substance of the resolutions passed by the Convention. On the 7th of August this report of the Committee of Detail was referred to the Committee of the Whole. It was then debated, article after article, for about four weeks. During that time many amendments and modifications were made. On the 8th of September a committee was appointed to arrange the articles which had been adopted, and to revise the style of the same. This committee consisted of Messrs. Johnson, Hamilton, Gouverneur Morris, Madison, and King. The task was performed by Mr. Morris, who says in relation to it: "Having rejected all redundant and equivocal terms, I believed it to be as clear as our language would permit, excepting, nevertheless, a part of what relates to the judiciary. On that subject conflicting opinions had been maintained with so much professional astuteness that it became necessary to select phrases, which expressing my own notions would not alarm others or shock their self-love, and to the best of my recollection this was the only part which passed without cavil."

On the 12th of September this Committee reported the Constitution as arranged and revised, and the draft of a letter to Congress. The debates still continued till the 17th of September, when the last amendment was made. It was made at the suggestion of Washington. The Constitution as reported declared that "the number of Representatives shall not exceed one for every 40,000." This point had occasioned great discussion; and on Mr. Gorham's motion to strike out 40,000 and insert 30,000, Washington remarked, that "although his situation had hitherto restrained him from offering his sentiments on questions depending in the House, and it might be thought ought now to impose silence upon him, yet he could not forbear expressing his wish that the alteration proposed might take place. It was much to be desired that the objections to the plan recommended might be made as few as possible. The smallness of the proportion of Representatives had been considered by many members of the Convention as an insufficient security for the rights and interests of the people. He acknowledged that it had always appeared to himself among the exceptionable parts of the plan; and late as was the present moment for admitting amendments, he thought this of so much consequence that it would give him much satisfaction to see it adopted." The amendment was agreed to unanimously. The above were the only remarks made by Washington during the progress of the Convention.

On the 17th of September the Constitution, as finally amended, was signed by all the members of the Convention, except by Messrs. Randolph and Mason, of Virginia, and Gerry, of Massachusetts. There was not, probably, a single member of the Convention who was fully satisfied with all the provisions of the Constitution; yet, with the above exceptions, the members gave it their signature, believing it to be the best that could be obtained.

As they were about to affix their names Dr. Franklin remarked, "I confess there are several parts of this Constitution which I do not at present approve; but I am not sure that I never shall approve them: for having lived long, I have often been obliged, by better information or fuller consideration, to change opinions, even on important subjects, which I once thought right, but found to be otherwise. I doubt, too, whether any other Convention we can obtain may be able to make a better Constitution. For when you assemble a number of men to have the advantage of their joint wisdom, you inevitably assemble with those men all their prejudices, their passions, their errors of opinion, their local interests, and their selfish views. From such an assembly can a perfect production be expected? It therefore astonishes me to find the system approaching so near to perfection as it does. Thus I consent to the Constitution, because I expect no better, and because I am not sure it is not the best."

Mr. Hamilton remarked, "No man's ideas were more remote from the plan than his were known to be; but is it possible to deliberate between anarchy and convulsion on one side, and the chance of good to be expected on the other?"

Again, "It is the best which the present situation and circumstances of the country will permit."

When the Convention was about to dissolve, it was resolved that the President retain the Journal and other papers, subject to the order of Congress, if ever formed under the Constitution. After the Constitution was adopted and the new Government organized, the Journal was deposited in the office of the Secretary of State. It was published in accordance with a resolution of Congress, adopted March 27, 1818.

The Constitution was laid before Congress, then sitting in the city of New York. It was referred by that body to the Legislatures of the States, that they might call conventions chosen by the people to adopt or to reject it. As soon as it was published the Constitution was made the object of violent attacks, and it was for some time a matter of doubt whether it would be adopted by the people of any considerable number of States. In no State was the opposition greater than in New York. Hamilton and Jay were its earnest friends, and they were supported by a majority of the inhabitants of the city and of the southern portion of the State; but Governor George Clinton, a majority of the Legislature, and of the people of the whole State were its earnest opponents. The friends of the Constitution were called Federalists; its enemies, Anti-Federalists.

To explain and defend the Constitution, a series of papers, under the head of "The Federalist," were published in the columns of a newspaper in New York. These papers were written by Hamilton, Madison, and Jay—the larger portion by Hamilton—and exerted a strong influence in favor of the Constitution. They subsequently were collected into a volume, several editions of which have been published. Written, for the most part, by men who originated the Constitution and assisted in its formation throughout, it forms the ablest and best commentary which has been written. The power to call conventions to consider the Constitution rested with the Legislatures of the States, and was, under various influences, exercised at different times.

Delaware was the first State which moved in the matter of adopting the Constitution. It met with very little opposition on the part of any of her citizens, and was adopted by a unanimous vote by the Convention held for that purpose, on the 7th of December, 1787. Delaware was thus the banner-State.

Pennsylvania was the next State that wheeled into the Constitutional line. Wilson, who had been a member of the Federal Convention, was a member of the Convention of Pennsylvania. Washington pronounced him "as honest, candid, and able a member as the [Federal] Convention contained," and that Convention contained Franklin, Madison, and Hamilton. Mr. Wilson was called upon by the Convention to explain the Constitution. He did so, and his speeches in Convention form a very interesting and able commentary, second in value to the Federalist only—surpassing it, perhaps, in interest. After Wilson, the most prominent advocate of the Constitution was Chief Justice M'Kean. He remarked, "I have gone through the circle of office in the legislative, executive, and judicial departments, and from all my study, observation, and experience, I must declare that, from a full examination and due consideration of this system, it appears to me to be the best the world has yet seen." The opposition to the Constitution was chiefly confined to the members from the portion of the State lying west of the Susquehanna. It was adopted on the 12th of December, 1787, by a vote of 46 to 23.

The Convention of the State of New Jersey was in session at the same time with that of Pennsylvania, and adopted the Constitution by a unanimous vote on the 18th of December, 1787.

The Convention of Georgia, with a like unanimity, adopted the Constitution on the 2d of January, 1788.

Connecticut was the fifth in the order of adoption. A large majority of the Delegates elected to her Convention were friendly to the Constitution. The revenue system was the principal point objected to by the opposition. Oliver Ellsworth was the most prominent advocate of the Constitution in the Convention. He was aided by Oliver Wolcott, Governor Huntington, and others. It was adopted by a large majority January 9, 1788.

Massachusetts was the next State in order. Her Convention assembled on the 9th of January, 1788. A majority of the Delegates elected were opposed to the Constitution, and for a long time its fate, so far as Massachusetts was concerned, was doubtful. John Hancock was chosen president of the Convention, and, on motion of Samuel Adams, daily prayers were attended. The opposition was strong in numbers and in talent, though the most distinguished members of the Convention, Fisher Ames, Rufus King, Theophilus Parsons, and others, were warm friends of the new system. Under their lead it was voted that the Convention consider each article of the Constitution in order, and that every member have an opportunity of expressing his views on each part before the vote should be taken to adopt or reject. This course of proceeding saved the Constitution. The opinions of several members were changed in course of the discussions. The influence of Hancock was adroitly used to conciliate the opposition. Instead of a conditional adoption, which was strongly urged by some, it was proposed that the Constitution should be unconditionally adopted, and certain amendments earnestly recommended. This course finally prevailed. When the vote was taken the adoption was carried by a majority of nineteen. This was on the 6th of February, 1788. Several members who had strenuously opposed the Constitution during the discussion, when the adoption was carried, rose and declared they would now give the Constitution their hearty support. For example, one remarked, "Though I have opposed the adoption of the Constitution, yet, as a majority has seen fit to adopt it, I shall use my utmost exertions to induce my constituents to live in peace under, and cheerfully submit to it."

Maryland adopted the Constitution by a vote of 63 to 11 on the 28th of April. The opposition made an unsuccessful effort to adjourn the Convention, in view of the anticipated rejection of the Constitution by Virginia. The chief point of objection was to the power given to Congress to regulate commerce. It was feared that it might be so exercised as to give an undue advantage to the Eastern States.

In the Legislature of South Carolina Rawlins Lowndes opposed the calling of a Convention to consider the Constitution. He had much to say against those articles of the Constitution which gave Congress power to regulate commerce and to abolish the slave-trade. He declared that he wished for his epitaph, "Here lies the man who opposed the Constitution because it was ruinous to the liberties of America." The influence of the Pinckneys, the Rutledges, Barnwell, and others prevailed. A Convention was called which adopted the Constitution on the 23d of May, 1788.

New Hampshire was the next State to adopt the Constitution. When the Convention assembled, in February, 1788, it was found that a large number of its members came bound by instructions to reject the Constitution. After discussing the matter, the Convention adjourned to the 18th of June, that such members as desired it might confer with their constituents, and get released from their instructions. When it reassembled the vote to adopt was carried, June 21, 1788.

The Convention of Virginia met on the 9th of June, 1788. The opposition was very strong, and contained such men as Patrick Henry, George Mason, and James Monroe, afterward President of the United States. Henry's great point was that the new Government was not a compact between Sovereign States, but a consolidated National Government. Speaking of the preamble, he said, "Who authorized them to speak the language of 'We, the people,' instead of 'We, the States?' States are the characteristic and the soul of a Confederation. If the States be not the agents of this compact, it must be one great consolidated National Government of the people of all the States." Mason, who was also in the opposition, said, "Whether the Constitution be good or bad, the present clause clearly discovers that it is a National Government, and no longer a Confederation." Madison and others answered these questions by showing the necessity of a National Government. He was supported by Pendleton, Marshall, afterward Chief Justice, Randolph, Nicholas, and others. Henry introduced the authority of Jefferson as opposed to the Constitution. Jefferson had written: "I wish with all my soul that the first nine States may accept the Constitution, because this will secure to us the good it contains, which I think great and important; but I equally wish that the four latest Conventions may refuse to accede till a Declaration of Rights be annexed." This declaration he thought should contain "freedom of religion, freedom of the press, freedom of commerce against monopolies, trial by jury in all cases, no suspension of the habeas corpus, and no standing armies." Subsequently he wrote: "The plan of Massachusetts is far preferable, and will, I hope, be followed by those who are yet to decide." That plan was, as we have seen, to adopt the Constitution unconditionally, and to recommend that certain amendments be made. Nearly all the members from that part of Virginia west of the mountains and now constituting Kentucky, were opposed to the Constitution, since, as they supposed, it would give to the Eastern and Middle States power to surrender the navigation of the Mississippi. After long-continued debates, during which the whole Constitution was considered by paragraphs, the vote for adoption was taken and stood—for adopting 87, for rejecting 79. Previous to the vote Henry remarked, "If I shall be in a minority—yet I will be a peaceable citizen—I shall patiently wait in expectation of seeing this Government so changed as to be compatible with the safety, the liberty, and happiness of the people." In Virginia the issue was distinctly made between a conditional and unconditional adoption, and carried in favor of the latter. A long list of amendments to the Constitution were recommended by the Convention.

As has been already remarked, a majority of the Legislature of New York were opposed to the Constitution. At one time it was thought that the Legislature would refuse to call a Convention, and the act for so doing had only a majority of three in the Senate, and of two in the House. Two-thirds of the members elected to the Convention were opposed to the Constitution. The Convention met at Poughkeepsie, June 19, 1788. George Clinton was chosen President. The Convention was opened every morning with prayer. The leading advocates of the Constitution were Alexander Hamilton, Chancellor Livingston, and John Jay. The leading opponents were Governor Clinton and Messrs. Yates and Lansing, who had been members of the Federal Convention, and retired when the National plan was adopted by that body. For a time it seemed almost certain that the Convention would reject the Constitution. On the 24th of June Hamilton received news that New Hampshire adopted the Constitution. Thus nine States had adopted it, and it would go into operation. The Confederation was in effect dissolved. This gave a new aspect to the state of affairs, and increased the hopes of the Federalists. Still the danger of rejection was so extreme that Hamilton was inclined to yield so far as to consent to an adoption with a reserved right to recede in case certain amendments should not be made. On the 12th of July he consulted Madison on the subject, who replied that such an act would not be an adoption at all—that the Constitution "required an unconditional adoption in toto and forever." The Anti-federates brought forward a bill on conditional adoption, but after much debate the words "on condition" were stricken out, and the words "in full confidence" inserted. The Act then read, "In full confidence that Congress will not exercise certain powers till a General Convention be called." A list of amendments was agreed upon, and a circular letter adopted to be sent to all the States, recommending a General Convention. In this manner the Constitution was adopted, July 26, 1788, by a vote of 30 to 27.

Thus the Constitution was ratified by eleven States. When the ratifications of nine States had been received by Congress (the Congress of the Confederation), they were referred to a Committee to examine them, and to report an Act for putting the said Constitution in force. This was on the 2d of July, 1788. On the 14th of July such an Act was reported, but it was not adopted till the 13th of September. Elections for the new Government were directed to be held in January, 1789, and the first Wednesday of March, 1789, was designated as the time for commencing proceedings under the Constitution.

The Constitution was rejected by Rhode Island and North Carolina. When the Legislature of Rhode Island received a copy of the Constitution, it was printed and circulated in the State. In February, 1788, the Legislature referred the question of its adoption, not to a Convention of the people, but to the freemen in their town meetings. Owing to a restricted suffrage there were only about four thousand votes in the State. It is said that the friends of the Constitution, being disgusted with the course pursued by the Legislature, refused to vote. The vote stood—2708 against the Constitution, 232 in favor. Rhode Island called a Convention, and adopted the Constitution in May, 1790. North Carolina called a Convention, which met July 21, 1788. A conditional adoption was discussed, and a rejection voted, with the view of securing another General Convention, which might remove the objectionable features of the Constitution. North Carolina remained out of the Union till November, 1789.

The facts stated in this brief account of the origin, formation, and adoption of the Constitution, show conclusively that it is not a League between Sovereign States, but the fundamental law of a National Government.

The Southern Rebellion proceeds upon a view of the Constitution which has been zealously taught in the Southern States for many years. That view is, that the Constitution is a League of Sovereign States, from which each State may secede when in its own judgment its interests require it. We have seen that the Federal Convention assembled for the purpose of amending the Articles of Confederation, which were confessedly a league between the States. They were soon convinced that they had a more important work to do, and the first resolution passed by them was that "a National Government ought to be established." Subsequently Mr. Patterson proposed a plan for amending the Articles of Confederation. His proposal received the respectful attention of the Convention. The League plan and the National plan were fairly before the Convention at the same time. A large majority voted to adhere to the National plan, and proceeded to agree upon the details till they had completed the Constitution to be "ordained and established" by "the people of the United States." We have seen that a prominent objection to the Constitution, in the Convention of Virginia and elsewhere, was that it had departed from the League system and constituted a Government acting upon individuals. The original framers of the Constitution did in no case deny the fact on which the objection was founded, but answered the objection by showing the necessity of a National Government and the right of the people to establish the same.

The history of the Constitution shows that it was designed to form a National Government, that it was ordained and established by the People of the United States; hence it, as Washington says in his "Farewell Address," "UNTIL CHANGED BY AN EXPLICIT AND AUTHENTIC ACT OF THE WHOLE PEOPLE, IS SACREDLY OBLIGATORY UPON ALL."

Editor's Easy Chair.

TO WRITERS OF TALES, ESSAYS, POEMS, AND ALL OTHER LITERARY MISCELLANIES. When, some time since, the Easy Chair said that justice was done to all offerings for this Magazine, he certainly did not mean to invite every body in the country who could hold a pen and write to send their MSS. to the editor, with the expectation that he had nothing to do but decipher the various orthography, and send the manuscript to the printer. There has been such an avalanche of contributions—not a few of them very good—that fair notice must now be given to every contributor that the chance of the acceptance of his or her contribution is greatly diminished. Each Number of the Magazine contains about a dozen articles, while the Editor receives daily at least that number, which have more or less merit. Of those that are absolutely worthless the number passes count. When a paper is declined, it must not be assumed that in the judgment of the Editor it is worthless; but only that he does not think it one of the two or three best out of a hundred. But while the Magazine thus receives twenty times as many good articles as it can use, it is always in want of better; and those better articles will be gladly welcomed from any quarter. Meanwhile, as a personal favor to the Editor of this Magazine and to himself, the Easy Chair begs all correspondents to note the following hints:

VOL. XXV.—No. 145.—I

Write legibly, with such paper, ink, and pen that the writing may be read without a microscope. The eyes of editors and printers are valuable to them, at least. Punctuate properly, marking the paragraphs and quotations. Somebody must do this, and the Editor will not. If you do not know how to do this, learn before writing for publication. No MS. which fails in these points will be read.

Do not send a portion of an article, "as a specimen;" nor any thing which you have "written to amuse an idle hour." Do not send any translations, or stories of European life, or Indian legends, or long poems. Do not, above all things, send any verses, unless you are sure that they are poetry, and contain something fresh in subject and expression.

If your article is short, retain a copy: it is easier for you to do this than for the Editor to register and return it. If you wish it returned, say so, and inclose the necessary stamps. If you wish an answer, inclose an envelope directed and stamped; and do not think it discourteous if the answer is a printed form. Do not expect a reply in the pages of the Magazine; communications between editors and correspondents are private—the public have nothing to do with them.

Do not, in case your article is declined, ask for a detailed criticism, "pointing out faults and suggesting corrections." It may seem a small thing to ask an editor to spend a couple of hours in carefully criticising what has cost you weeks to prepare; but to comply with half a dozen such requests in a day would occupy all his time; and he has his own work to do.

Direct all contributions to "The Editor of Harper's Magazine"—not to the "Easy Chair," within whose province it does not come to decide upon contributions.

If the foregoing "hints" are complied with, the Editor will endeavor hereafter to read and decide upon all manuscripts sent to him within the month in which they are received. He will also endeavor to return those for whose transmission the proper provision has been made; but he can not hold himself responsible for them. They are at the risk of the authors.

THE Easy Chair prints the following note with pleasure. Of course he has relinquished any expectation that John Bull will either understand or try to understand what we are or what we are doing. A war that cuts off his cotton may happen to remind him that we are, and an iron ship that routs his whole navy three thousand miles off, and rifled siege-guns that breach fortifications at incredible distances, may possibly suggest that we are doing. But Bull is pachydermatous. The moral sense of fine gentlemen who blow rebels from the mouths of cannon is sadly vexed by savages who shut them up to seclude them from mischief. Oh, John! we may be bullies, and swaggerers, and loud talkers—yes, we may even spit upon the floor—but moral affectation is not one of our vices:

"The London literary journals have been quite as much exercised about the rebellion in this country as have the newspapers, and their dislike of the situation in America has manifested itself in malicious criticisms upon American authors, actors, poets, and painters, whom they heartily praised a year ago. A recent number of the London Review, in noticing the last-published volume of Mrs. Sigourney's poems, instituted a comparison between her and Mrs. Hemans, and says that there is a resemblance between Mrs. Hemans's 'Treasures of the Deep' and Mrs. Sigourney's lines to the 'Coral Insects,' 'plain enough to swear to in a court of justice.' In reply to this insinuated plagiarism, it should be stated that the lines referred to were written before any of Mrs. Hemans's poetry had been seen on this side of the Atlantic, and that these and a little poem of Mrs. Sigourney's on the 'Death of an Infant,' beginning, which has been published among Mrs. Hemans's poems, and claimed as hers, were both written in journals of Mrs. S. in 1820, and were published in the Boston edition of 1827.

"The Review finds fault with the story of 'Oriska,' and considers it imperfect—forgetting that the poet is not responsible for the narrative, which is derived from authentic sources. While thus captious, the Review candidly admits that, with the exception of Longfellow, no American poet is better known on that side of the Atlantic. Mrs. Sigourney has sometimes been called the 'Hemans of America'—improperly, as Mrs. Hemans is but little known and less regarded in this country, while the poems of Mrs. Sigourney have been extensively reprinted and circulated in England, and are more widely known and read, perhaps, than those of any of the English female poets."

—"Or in more general terms, taking it for granted that nine out of every ten young writers produce insufferable nonsense, has the tenth one, who writes what is really worth reading, any chance of success.... Is there fair play for young writers?"

The friend who asks this question can answer it by a moment's thinking. There is no secret in the reply. It does not require that a man should be a professional author to answer it. For what do publishers aim at? Certainly at prosperity. But what does their prosperity depend upon? Certainly upon their publishing books that the public will want to read. Hence their business sagacity consists in the ability to understand what will be popular.

Necessarily, therefore, they look upon every young and new author as a possible treasure. He is a closed casket to them. He may hold the rarest gem within. Do you think that they will throw the casket away until they have ascertained?

Publishers are not the natural enemies of authors. They are natural allies. Viewed from this world, an author is a cipher until the publisher is prefixed to him like a numeral. Then he becomes a distinctly appreciable quantity.

Nor, again, is there a certain limit of fame. It is as ample as the air. There is enough for all. The trophies of Miltiades would not let Themistocles sleep. But the fame of Themistocles does not obscure the earlier name. The parent who has one child can not comprehend that he should love two or three quite as dearly. But the two and three are not less loved than the one, yet they do not rob him.

Of course the possible fame as an author of a youth who brings a publisher his manuscript does not disturb the publisher's mind. "My dear Sir," said a shrewd publisher to the young man who with trembling fingers handed him the sacred roll, "this may be a more immortal poem than 'Paradise Lost,' but you understand that to us, as a matter of business, it is so much molasses and shirting. If we can do well by meddling with it, we will undertake it. If not, not." If, upon examination, they are not disposed to deal farther with the author, is that "rudely slamming the door to fame in his face?" Is it not clear that, if it really be a work destined to great success, and the publisher declines it, he rudely slams the door to fortune in his own face?

All publishers do sometimes decline such works, and those are the occasions upon which they fail in sagacity.

In what, then, does fair play for young authors consist? Simply in submitting their manuscripts to a sagacious critic to decide if the publication promises any advantage to the publisher. This advantage may be found in the subject, in the treatment, or in the circumstances of the author—not necessarily in the intrinsic value of the work. Twenty-five years ago a book upon Animal Magnetism would have been salable from the subject, but it would not be to-day. Yet a treatise upon that theme to-day might be so brilliantly treated that, for the rhetoric or the humor, the book would sell. Or, again, if Garibaldi should write a work upon that subject, however poorly he might write, the success would be sure.

These are but a few of the points which a skillful "reader" considers. But if Garibaldi had never been heard of, and his book, however well written and full of talent, had been declined by the critic of one house; and presently, when Garibaldi's name was precious, and his story familiar in every home, another house should publish the book, could you say that the critic of the first had not been just to the unknown author, and that now the scales had fallen from publishing eyes? Clearly it is not the seer but the seen that has changed. His name has an independent value which it had not before, and which it now confers upon every thing it touches.

I knew a young man of great gifts who was entirely unknown to the world. He was smitten with the old and sacred love of fame. He wrought for it patiently and with the most delicate honor, biding his time and carefully completing the works into which he put the vitality of his genius. Some of them he offered to publishers. They were all liked and praised. But one publisher wanted some change in the MS., slight but essential. Another feared the lowering aspect of the times. Still others had other excuses. They saw excellence, they felt promise, but they did not quite dare to risk the chances.

Suddenly the name of the young author became famous in an utterly different direction. Circumstances gave his career a hue of heroic romance that fascinated and inspired. A noble and early death completed his life. A new name had been added to history. Is it surprising that the publishers, who liked, but did not venture to undertake the issue of his works before, now felt secure of their success? Had they "rudely slammed the door of fame in his face?" Had he not opened it for himself?

You will say that this is a factitious and extrinsic reason for literary fame. Not necessarily. The occasion that gave him an audience was certainly not literary. But nothing except the genius can give any man literary fame. The occasion opens the casket, but it did not create the jewel.

The Easy Chair, then, can not see that young authors do not have as fair play as young lawyers or young merchants.

In his discourse at Dartmouth upon Webster, Rufus Choate personifies the college as a weeping mother bending over her great departed, and saying, with the proud parent of history, "I would not exchange my dead son for any living one of Christendom."

When a great man dies and the world mourns, when his name is familiarly and lovingly and respectfully mentioned, when solemn institutions of art or science or learning heap his grave with praise, when the newspapers recount every incident of his life, and paint as panegyrists paint the virtues and graces of the dead—all seems done that sympathy can do; and the bereaved, as they survey the evidence of the worth and work of the departed, may find some small consolation in their grief.

So in the dark year that ended in April many had passed from the full flush of happy and honorable life to death. Their heroic names and acts are repeated and remembered with joy and pride, and are henceforth parts of our history. But ah! for those who lived before Agamemnon and who had no poet to sing them! In the sad details of battles we read of twenty killed, of a hundred killed, of a thousand killed; and each one of them all was the centre of hopes as high, perhaps, though all unknown, as those whose fame survives the field and the day.

These are the unnamed heroes. They march often with no less lofty purpose and clear perception of the crisis than their leaders. They serve with the same heroism. They fight with the same bravery, and fall as nobly. There are, in our armies, of course, loose and bad men as in all armies; but how many of the whole, rough as they may be, are not also intelligent citizens, the very substance of the people, and the last reliance of a free popular government.

These are the unnamed heroes; but it is no willful neglect that they are so: nor do those who achieve glory enviously aim to outstrip the rest. Only, when we count our treasures, let us remember the unnamed, the devoted sons and brothers and husbands and lovers, who have obeyed the call of their country in the same spirit that Washington obeyed; who have suddenly turned from the quiet happiness of their lives, on which love and fortune smiled, and have marched to battle and to death, knowing that their fall must be unknown to all but those whose homes it would darken, and whose hearts it would break.

If to-morrow the news of the final victory were to come and the next day dawn upon peace, and the towns and cities and villages through the land were to be asked to illuminate in national gratitude for our salvation, yet with the understanding that all who had lost a friend need not join, how sadly the darkened panes would remind us of the blighted hopes and grieving hearts that lie in the wake of war!

There is a poem of Mrs. Browning's in the "Last Poems," lately published, which is the most pathetic and passionate expression of the woe of a mother who loses both her boys in the Italian war of liberation. They were unnamed upon the roll of Italian heroes; but she!—she had no others. They were her heroes. They were her Italy. They were her life and love and hope and heaven. If you do not happen to like Mrs. Browning's poems, as the Country Parson says he can not read Carlyle, it is not necessary to read the stanzas I am going to quote. But don't for a moment imagine that you have said a fine thing in saying so, or that you have shown yourself to be downright common-sensible. You may not like Shakespeare's music, the odor of magnolias—but they are good, nevertheless, and the other part is not of much consequence.

Both the singer's boys are dead, remember.

"Ah, ah, ah! when Gaeta's taken, what then?

When the fair wicked Queen sits no more at her sport,
Of the fire-balls of death crashing souls out of men?

When the guns of Cavalli, with final retort,
Have cut the game short?

"When Venice and Rome keep their new jubilee—
When your flag takes all heaven for its white, green, and red—
When you have your country from mountain to sea—
When King Victor has Italy's crown on his head
(And I have my dead)—

"What then? Do not mock me. Ah, ring your bells low,
And burn your lights faintly! My country is there,
Above the star pricked by the last peak of snow;
My Italy's there, with my brave civic pair,
To disfranchise despair!

"Forgive me! Some women bear children in strength,
And bite back the cry of their pain in self-scorn;
But the birth-pangs of nations will wring us at length
Into wail such as this—and we sit on forlorn
When the man-child is born.

"Dead! One of them shot by the sea in the east,
And one of them shot in the west by the sea.
Both! both my boys! If in keeping the feast
You want a great song for your Italy free,
Let none look at me!"

Doubtless it was the author of this poem who, had she lived, would have sung the great song for Italy free. The English poets have especially loved Italy. Milton is a part of Vallombrosa; Shelley, of the Tuscan shore; Byron, of Venice; Keats, of Rome, where he died. But the Brownings are very Italians. Nowhere else shall we find a more perfect dramatic portraiture of Italian medieval life and thought than in Robert Browning's poems, or of its modern emotions than in his wife's. The little volume called "Last Poems," containing the very last strains of the strongest and sweetest singer among women, is prefaced, in the American edition, by an affectionate, sympathetic, and admirable biographical and critical sketch by Theodore Tilton.

KING GEORGE THE THIRD of England, if he had lived with us, might have wondered why it is that Easter, spring bonnets, and the Academy Exhibition all come together. But he could not have denied that they do. And if that gracious monarch, with whom it was our misfortune to differ, had taken that ever-increasing family of his, whose expenses our English friends have had the pleasure of paying, to see the sights of the metropolis, he must have stopped in the spacious and handsome gallery where the National Academy Exhibition is held this year. It is known as the Derby Gallery, and is just above Houston Street, in Broadway.

As you go in the old difficulty presents itself. Shall you look at the pictures or at the spectators? The pictures are mainly portraits; but here are the originals without the impediment of paint—except, indeed, in the case of that truly amiable lady of a high-colored complexion who stands looking at the difference in the manner of laying it on between Huntington, or Page, or Hicks, or Baker, or Stone, or Elliott and herself. To see the seers is often more entertaining than to see the show. To hear them is not so delightful, if you chance to be an artist or the friend of one. Indeed, one of the first rules to be observed by every visitor to the National Academy Exhibition is abstinence from audible criticism. Don't say that the picture is a daub, because the modest gentleman at your elbow probably painted it, or is the brother, or cousin, or bosom friend of the painter. I went in the other day with a companion, and we were hastening to discover the best pictures. "Halloa!" said companion, pulling me on; "there's a Smith; I know it by the—" I nudged him, for the man in the slouched hat and long hair, just before him, was Smith himself. "—by the exquisite grace of outline and richness of coloring," continued companion, who is one of the most adroit and accomplished of men. "I thank you," he said, later, "for cutting me short in my charge at that atrocious daub of Smith's. What on earth do they hang such things in the large gallery for? That little drawing of mine is tucked up out of sight in the entrance passage. I suppose that Mrs. Croker is the only person who has seen it. Why not have intelligent men upon the hanging committee, and not people who only fight for the best places for their own pictures?"

Trekle's motto for a quiet life is a good one—speak well of every body and every thing. Yet even that is not infallible as he found when praising Smith's pictures to Jones.

The Exhibition this year has a few masterly portraits; but besides those not many remarkable pictures. Page, Elliott, Hicks, and Huntington have very conspicuous and admirable works, and Staigg, Stone, Baker, and Wenzler very beautiful specimens of their skill. Mr. Hicks's full-length of Dr. Cogswell, the late Librarian of the Astor Library, is the first picture that challenges attention. It is an admirable portrait, and a work which shows both the skill and the power of the artist. The arrangement and choice of the details are most fit, and the execution is masterly. The wood of the chair in which the Doctor sits is one of the most real bits of painting in the Exhibition. The leather of the bindings of the books and the ranges of Library shelves beyond, which make up the back-ground of the picture, are studied and rendered with charming fidelity. The Doctor sits in a chair holding open in his lap an illuminated missal. His dress is scholarly black—the regulation broadcloth of civilized society—and his feet are clad in low shoes or pumps. The likeness, as we said, is excellent. The whole picture is most interesting, and from its subject and its connection with the Library it has a historical value. Its proper place is, of course, the Library itself; and as the trustees could not hope for a more satisfactory portrait, they will naturally be inclined to possess this. And, indeed, the Astor Library ought to have this charming memorial of its first and famous Librarian.

Mr. Page has three "full-lengths" upon the walls. His portrait of Collector Barney is a striking likeness and a forcible painting, but it is very unpleasant. The accessories are ill chosen, and the whole effect of the details is patched and aimless. The portrait of Mr. Hopper is a most characteristic work, showing great power, and skill, and daring. It is certainly not displeasing, however singular its impression may be; neither is it satisfactory. It is a curiously suggestive work: to some persons it is even exasperating. A kindly and noted and accomplished painter with whom I talked, said that Page constantly piled up impediments in his own path, and did not always remove them. Perhaps the most unpleasant point of his works is, that each one seems to be an experiment. It may be very brilliant, very beautiful, very subtle, but you do not feel that the painter is sure of what he has done, or that he will not flout it to-morrow. Is all painting an experiment? But why, more than writing? Greater excellence, naturally, will always be sought by truly ambitious, artistic souls, whether in one form or another, but not different fundamental principles nor various manners. Page's pictures are always most interesting. They allure the eye; they excite the mind; but they do not—do they?—satisfy the æsthetic sense.

Huntington's full-length of Chancellor Ferris, of the New York University, is one of his happy portraits. It is harmonious, vigorous, and rich. There is a luxuriance of color and treatment in Huntington which makes you feel that he ought to paint portraits of Creole beauties lying, jeweled and languid, under branching tropic leaves. His larger portraits have the pleasing, high-bred grace of Copley's; works to pause by and muse upon in ancestral galleries. He preserves and elaborates the costume of to-day, yet in such a way that it shall only seem quaint to-morrow, and be an added charm.

But here is another full-length—George Law, by Mr. Powell. This is not exactly a Creole beauty, nor is there liteness or languor in the form. It is the huge steamboat king—one of the marked men of the city. It is very large and very dark, and the Committee have put it in the most unhappy light. It is the only exile among the full-lengths, and the painter and his friends doubtless complain. Nor is it clear why it should not have had an equal chance with the others of the same kind. But the Committee is a judicious Committee, and doubtless knows its own whys and wherefores. Of a picture, therefore, as Dr. Johnson would say, which can not be distinctly seen little can be discriminatingly said.

Mr. Elliott has at least one portrait upon the walls which he has not surpassed. It is marked in the Catalogue as No. 111. For vigor, brilliancy, and reality this work is seldom equaled in portraiture. It is a remarkable reproduction of the characteristic personality of the subject. The clear, keen, concentrated force; the quiet sagacity, the resolute challenge of persons and things, the repose and satisfaction of conscious executive skill, with a certain hidden pride of self-respect, and secret, steadfast kindness, are all readily discerned in the portrait which Elliott has treated with such mastery. It is evidently a work of sympathy. The portrait of a man whose powers are in full play, moulding the expression of every feature and of the whole aspect, is sure to kindle the painter who has the capacity of appreciation and discrimination. So many faces are shells—so many masks: upon so many the character is so lightly printed, or half effaced, or quite illegible, that a painter can hardly fail to be inspired by one which is an illuminated index of character. This portrait has been universally recognized as one of the best that Elliott has painted.

Among the other portraits is one of Huntington's, a half or three-quarter length of a lady in full gala costume, but as we said, so painted that it will still be the portrait of a lady to her great-grandchildren. In contrast of costume to this is a very beautiful portrait by Staigg, the half-length of a lady draped in the simplest muslin. The richness and elegance and exquisite handling of this picture, like that of a portrait by the same artist two years since, place him among the most skillful and satisfactory of his brethren. Mr. Wenzler shows two or three of his works, one of them a most actual likeness of the poet Bryant. The painter must certainly have denounced the razor that lays waste the poet's upper lip. With so fine a flowing and silvery beard how he must have longed to blend its natural companion! The execution has that smoothness and elaborate finish which mark all that Wenzler does. Every touch seems laid on with nervous care, but so affectionately that the critic is disarmed. This is a very different style from that in which Mr. W. H. Furness has painted an admirable likeness of Hamilton Wild. It is broad, rich, and sunny, with masses of transparent shadow, and a general ease and freedom which justify the promise of the artist's portrait of his father, two years ago. There is great conscience in the treatment—nothing slurred or botched, and yet the whole effect is sweeping and vigorous and luminous. Why do we not see Wild's pictures as well as his portrait in the gallery? Some strain of Venice he could have sung to us such as we have not heard. Some of us travel through Italy, some see it, some feel it. Wild has it in his heart, and when he holds a pencil it flows from his finger tips.

Near by is one of Mr. Ingham's heads. This is the thirty-seventh annual exhibition, and in the first Mr. Ingham, if he exhibited any thing, showed the very counterpart of this portrait. Such uniformity of execution, and indeed of excellence in his way, few painters achieve. But the way? Do people look so to Mr. Ingham? Is human society such a collection of wax statuary in his eyes as his portraits indicate? It must be so, for so he has always represented men and women. In what a curious world, then, the artist must live!

Here, for instance, to show what a different thing the same human flesh may seem to different eyes, is a picture of a Venus by Mr. Gray, The Apple of Discord. Mr. Gray is a Venetian in school. He thinks as Lawrence did (who drew heads here eight years ago), and as Page does, that Titian knew more about painting than any body else. Whether he had more of the qualities that make a great artist—whether he were in art (not in painting) the peer of Michael Angelo or Raphael—they may or may not concede. But that he understood the limits of pigments, that he had a wonderful eye in discriminating and a marvelous hand in executing, they would probably all agree. Then comes a difficulty. You may produce by glazing and scumbling and various processes a Titianesque surface upon your picture. But have you not superinduced that effect? Did not Titian produce it by simple, honest coloring? Or, indeed, is not what we call the Titian look partly the result of mingled time and dust, and would a new picture of Titian's, if painted to-day, resemble those that we now see of his three hundred years old? Or still again, if you had found the Titian secret, why not use it in painting other subjects than he chose?

The Apple of Discord is the pleasantest picture of Mr. Gray's which we recall, yet it would be pleasanter if the subject were different. If nothing were said to you, and you found it in a shop in Florence, or Paris, or Rome, you would say, "Halloa! here is a most lovely copy of one of Titian's Venuses;" which one you would not precisely remember, but you would have no doubt of the fact. Of course Mr. Gray does this by design. He knows it as well as any body. He has in view certain depths and harmonies, certain subtle qualities of form and color. The subject upon which he shall work them out is almost as indifferent to him, probably, as the characters of the different models who might sit to him. Is not this in painting what rhetoric is in literature?

The pearly quality of the flesh in this picture, the ripened, flexible, exquisite rounding of the forms, the luxuriance of voluptuous grace in which it is all steeped, and the prevailing sweetness of tone, are most striking and delightful. On the other hand, it is somewhat thin—it is a surface rather than a depth of color—and that wonderful gradation of warmth and tint which it suggests by reminding you of the Venetian pictures, it does not quite accomplish. This, of course, is trying it by the highest standard. But both the character and the excellence of the work suggest it.

We can only have a word where we would willingly tarry for a talk; so we must chat of one or two pictures in the Exhibition that are not portraits, and chief among these are Bierstadt's Sunlight and Shadow, and Kensett's Twilight. The former is a small picture, but it has the best effect of sunshine we ever saw. That was a famous beam in Church's Heart of the Andes, striking the old tree; but such quivering, soft, warm, real sunlight as this upon the half-crumbling travertine balustrade and cathedral wall we have not seen in painting. It is marvelously realistic and poetic, yet not in the least Pre-Raphaelite, in the technical sense. The little picture is like a happy thought of quiet. Mr. Kensett's larger landscape is very grand in its broad, solemn, twilight gloom. The great mountain dome muffled in dark verdure; the far-reaching, ample plain, infinitely varied, stretching away under the last dying red surfs of sunset, and the cool, tranquil heaven, breathing peace—all compose a most impressive landscape. Mr. Kensett has not painted many finer pictures than this; yet it must be thoughtfully studied to be truly perceived. The very fidelity of the work will cause many a spectator to pass it by with but a single note of admiration. If you read this before the Exhibition closes, siste viator!

Mr. Gifford has several pictures; two, at least, of subjects drawn from the war—a Sermon in the Camp of the Seventh at Washington, and a Bivouac of the same Regiment. They are both charming souvenirs. The Torre di Schiave, a well-known ruin upon the Roman Campagna, is another small work of Gifford's, which has all the clear brilliancy for which he is noted. It is almost too bright a portrait of the old tower, as the Easy Chair remembers it. It lacks that curious crust of dinginess which Time throws in Rome even over the gayest colors. But there is a delightful firmness and delicacy in the picture. Mr. Haseltine's Coast near Amalfi is a gorgeous work. The peculiar glow of the moist, smooth sea-beach is so evanescent an effect that the spectator can hardly criticise it justly. But the long lift of sea-water about to fall and slide up the shore is very fine, and every part of the picture is thought and treated with subtle sympathy and appreciation. Mr. Casilear has several of his refined and visionary landscapes. A singular exquisiteness of touch gives them a vignette character, while their rare tenderness and delicacy show how truly the painter is a lover of the scenes he draws. Mr. Suydam contributes some of his sea-perspectives, characterized by his customary open daylight effect and careful handling. Mr. Tait's Birds and Spaniels are as good as ever; and so are Mr. Hayes's Terrier and Trout.

Upon the whole, the Academy Exhibition of this year is remarkable for a few very fine portraits, but not for a variety or great number of excellent pictures. The pleasantness of the hall and the convenience of access have made it more than usual, and despite the war, a thronged resort. The pictures have been better seen than they could be in the series of cells in Tenth Street; and the only serious regret is that the space was so limited that there was no adequate room for the works of beginners. The entrance passage has several interesting and admirable drawings upon the walls, such as Farrar's pen-and-ink Head of a Gentleman Writing, and a color sketch of a tangled mass of Wild-flowers and Weeds, and Charles Parsons's View from the Ramparts of Panama, and Entrance to Somes Sound, Mount Desert.

It would be curious and instructive if the pictures of the first Academy Exhibition could be collected and seen. Cole and Inman would be among the names upon the catalogue, and Vanderlyn might be found there. A few striking portraits, some poetic landscapes—in certain points not yet surpassed—would probably exhaust the memorabilia of the Exhibition. The evidence of an awakened taste, of public interest, of enlarged artistic culture and experience, and of a variety of admirable talent—all which characterize the present Exhibitions—would be wanting.

And yet, doubtless, the wights who talked about the pictures in print were a hundred-fold more capable than their successors of to-day. O! brothers of the brush, if we of the pen seem unkind to you, it is a fault of knowledge, not of will.

THE Reverend Robert Collyer, of Chicago, was the pastor of many a brave man who marched to the battle-field of Fort Donelson, and was brought home only to be buried. On the day after the victory Mr. Collyer was one of the Samaritans who hastened to carry succor and sympathy to the wounded, and upon his return the next Sunday he preached a sermon to his congregation upon the Battle-Field of Donelson, which is one of the most pathetic tales which the war has inspired. It is a picture of the terrible other side—the anguish, the solitude, the far-scattered pangs that follow war.

The narrative is very brief and very simple.

"The day I spent there," he says, "was like one of our sweetest May-days. As I stood in a bit of secluded wood-land in the still morning the spring birds sang as sweetly and flitted about as merrily as if no tempest of fire, and smoke, and terror had ever driven them in mortal haste away. In one place where the battle had raged I found a little bunch of sweet bergamot that had just put out its brown-blue leaves, rejoicing in its first resurrection; and a bed of daffodils ready to unfold their golden robes to the sun; and the green grass in sunny places was fair to see. But where great woods had cast their shadows the necessities of attack and defense had made one haggard and almost universal ruin—trees cut down into all sorts of wild confusion, torn and splintered by cannon-ball, trampled by horses and men, and crushed under the heavy wheels of artillery. One sad wreck covered all.....

"Almost a week had passed since the battle, and most of the dead were buried. We heard of twos and threes, and, in one place, of eleven, still lying where they fell; and as we rode down a lonely pass we came to one waiting to be laid in the dust, and stopped for a moment to note the sad sight. Pray look out from my eyes at him as he lies where he fell. You see by his garb that he is one of the rebel army, and by the peculiar marks of that class that he is a city rough. There is little about him to soften the grim picture that rises up before you as he rests in perfect stillness by that fallen tree: but there is a shawl, coarse and homely, that must have belonged to some woman, and

His hands are folded on his breast;
There is no other thing expressed
But long disquiet merged in rest.

"Will you still let me guide you through that scene as it comes up before me?... Here you meet a man who has been in command and stood fast; and when you say some simple word of praise to him in the name of all who love their country, he blushes and stammers like a woman, and tells you he tried to do his best: and when we get to Mound City we shall find a man racked with pain, who will forget to suffer in telling how this brave man you have just spoken to not only stood by his own regiment in a fierce storm of shot, but when he saw a regiment near his own giving back because their officers showed the white feather, rode up to the regiment, hurled a mighty curse at those who were giving back, stood fast by the men in the thickest fight, and saved them. And, says the sick man, with tears in his eyes, 'I would rather be a private under him than a captain under any other man.'... I notice one feature in this camp that I never saw before—the men do not swear and use profane words as they used to do. There is a little touch of seriousness about them. They are cheerful and hearty, and in a few days they will mostly fall back into the old bad habit so painful to hear: but they have been too near to the tremendous verities of hell and heaven on that battle-field to turn them into small change for every day use just yet.... I may not judge harshly of what should be done in a time of war like this in the West: it is very easy to be unfair. I will simply tell you that had it not been for the things sent up by the Sanitary Commission in the way of linen, and things sent by our citizens in the way of nourishment, I see no possibility by which those wounded men could have been lifted out of their blood-stained woolen garments, saturated with wet and mud, or could have had any food and drink except corn-mush, hard bread, and the turbid water of the river.

".....Here is one who has lost an arm, and there one who has lost a leg. This old man of sixty has been struck by a grape-shot, and that boy of eighteen has been shot through the lung. Here a noble man has lived through a fearful bullet-wound just over the eye, and that poor German, who could never talk English so as to be readily understood, has been hit in the mouth and has lost all hope of talking except by signs.... The doctor comes to this young man and says, quietly, 'I think, my boy, I shall have to take your arm off;' and he cries out in great agony 'Oh, dear doctor, do save my arm!' and the doctor tells him he will try a little longer; and when he has gone, the poor fellow says to me, 'What shall I do if I lose my arm? I have a poor old mother at home, and there is no one to do any thing for her but me.'

"That man who has lost his arm is evidently sinking. As I lay wet linen on the poor stump he tells me how he 'has a wife and two children at home, and he has always tried to do right and live a manly life.' The good, simple heart is clearly trying to balance its accounts before it fares the great event which it feels to be not far distant. As I go past him I see the face growing quieter; and at last good Mr. Williams, who has watched him to the end, tells me he put up his one hand, gently closed his own eyes, and then laid the hand across his breast and died.

"That boy in the corner, alone, suffers agony such as I may not tell. All day long we hear his cries of pain through half the length of the boat; far into the night the tide of anguish pours over him; but at last the pain is all gone, and he calls one of our number to him, and says: 'I am going, I want you to please write a letter to my father, tell him I owe such a man two dollars and a half, and such a man owes me four dollars, and he must draw my pay and keep it all for himself.' Then he lay silently a little while, and, as the nurse wet his lips, said: 'Oh, I should so like a drink out of my father's well!' and in a moment he had gone where angels gather immortality—

"By life's fair stream, fast by the throne of God."

And so all day long, with cooling water and soft linen, with morsels of food and sips of wine, with words of cheer and tender pity to every one, and most of all to those that were in the sorest need, we tried to do some small service for those that had done and suffered so much for us."

These are long extracts, but they are more profitable in these bright but bitter days of early summer, when the murmur of distant battles is in the air, than the talk of this Easy Chair would be. The times have not occasioned a more graphic picture of the terrible episodes of war than the story of this practical Christian who, like his Master, goes about consoling the wounded and the weary. The most tender and thoughtful charity pervades the entire discourse. The rebels, in the pastor's eyes, though they have slain his friends and brothers for maintaining the laws of their country, which are the security of liberty and peace for all citizens, are still fellow-men. "Finally," he says, "I came to feel a more tender pity for the deluded men on the other side, and a more unutterable hatred of that vile thing that has made them what they are. On all sides I found young men, with faces as sweet and ingenuous as the faces of our own children, as open to sympathy, and, according to their light, as ready to give all they had for their cause."

Our Foreign Bureau.

WITH the whole Western world wrapped in the red flame of war—with those to whom our hearts are knit by such ties as death only breaks and sorrows only make stronger—busy at scoop of graves or tending wounded—with steamers that we knew once plying peacefully under shadow of overhanging cotton-wood now burdened with the human débris of battle—it seems like mockery that we should give a thought, a line, a pen-stroke to the everyday, easy life of the European capital.

So, when fierce cold is smiting with its white wand all the crops of the North, it seems but fatuity and heartlessness to record how balmy heats are making the fields bask in sunnier latitudes; how blossoms are bursting, and sweet fruit forming, and blithe workers going afield on the very day and the very hour when, in other lands, killing frosts are sowing famine.

From the European stand-point what most surprises, perhaps, in regard to the American war, is the insouciance, the indifference, the calm with which all tidings of fierce battles are met. "Twenty thousand wounded and killed" carries no more stab to the public sensibility than, in other days, a blown-up steamer with its hundred of victims. We will venture to say that the news of the late American battles, and the tale of killed and wounded, have startled to a quicker sense of the actual horrors involved the European public than even the neighbors of the sufferers at home. How is this? Do we Americans, as is alleged, put so small an estimate on life and health? or have we, with philosophic calm, so reckoned the cost from the beginning as not to be stirred by the abounding justification of our estimates?

To all who question and express amazement at the extraordinary result, we answer that both causes have their weight.

A young people, battling with bears on the frontiers and risking all the hazards of climate in its uncontrollable love of "spread," must rate life at a far lower estimate than those who, these thousand years, have been multiplying every device to make it long and easy and luxurious. Keen sensibility to the horrors of war is the result of a mature civilization. If the pioneer were hampered by the refinements of cities he would never trample down the savagery of the border.

The composure with which, as a people, we have received and forgotten each year our record of accidents by boat and rail demonstrates a comparative indifference to the value of life which astonishes European observers, but which, after all, is perhaps attributable, not so much to sheer insensibility as to a conviction that our swift progress as a nation must have a commensurate waste of blood and life. We strike for grand results, and we pay the grandest of prices.

There is yet another explanation of the apparent coolness with which the American public digests its record of losses. The authorities commanding battle are corporated authorities, and corporate bodies ignore sympathy. When Napoleon tracked his way over the bloody ground of Solferino, the groans and the stark corpses made an appeal to his heart which quickened the negotiations of Villafranca. But let a Republican general or cabinet officer declare the force of such appeal, and straightway his loyalty is questioned. No sympathies must stand in the way of duty to the state. The sheriff must not flinch. The law has no heart to be touched.

Hence a Republican war, directed against Republican subjects, must be the bitterest and most unrelenting of all wars. The People alone, who are the authors of the Law, must temper its issues.

YESTERDAY we read of battles in which our heart leaped to the story; and to-day the paper is full of the last masquerade at the hotel of the Count de Persigny. Who should care, in such times, if the Countess was beautiful in her white satin of a pierrette, with diamonds to her buttons? Who should care if a diplomat plays the clown perfectly? These jollities of the mi-carême have a larger life than usual. Yet it is no indication that serious things are not engrossing the serious thought of France. Even in America, if we may believe the newspapers (which, indeed, involves something of hardihood), there was never more noisy and lawless pursuit of pleasure than in the great capitals. The concert saloons—which are understood here to be a harsh reproduction of the Mabilles and the Montesquiens—are represented as thriving upon the costs of the Republican war. And in Paris, while the workers of Lyons and of Rouen are pinched with real want (growing stronger every day), the balls have been brilliant, the private theatricals have made their claque heard upon the Boulevards, and a circle of admiring friends of an actress of the Vaudeville have made an émeute at that theatre in decrying a play whose partition did injustice to their favorite.

Yet again, this metropolitan world—whose soberer citizens are anxious to learn what may become of the lingering Papal question or the sharp Mexican problem—is all agog with the recent sale of the effects—paintings and other—of a distinguished and pretty member of the demi-monde, Mademoiselle Anna Deslion.

It appears an absurd thing to mention that a few weeks since all the furniture was sold from the rooms of a pretty unmarried lady of the Chaussée d'Antin: and yet, when the sale came about, the streets were crowded with carriages—some coroneted—all evidencing wealth. That there should be Aubusson tapestry, was looked for: every woman who lives in luxury at Paris possesses it. That there should be art of a certain kind, was looked for: since wealth can every where command it. But the singularity of this sale was the fact that its art was of the chiefest order, and its objects of vertu most severe in their class.

A necklace of pearls which came to the hammer was regal; the report says it brought forty thousand francs. Other jewelry of various kinds sold for some seven hundred thousand francs. The paintings counted such names as Troyon, and Meissonnier, as well as a crowd of amateurs. The very inkstand was a rare copy from Michael Angelo, mounted upon onyx, and its sale price was five thousand francs.

And yet the Deslion's is a name which good people do not talk of. You know she had wealth; you know she commanded the complimentary gifts of distinguished artists, princes; you hear she was witty, beautiful, young.

Yet with this sale of her effects she disappears. An impropriety eclipses her splendor. She holds upon the brilliant round of Paris life by so frail a tenure that an impropriety makes the end. We shall never hear of her after this sale of her jewels. Perhaps, years hence, some haggard woman at the opera may offer us a footstool for a few centimes, or may crave a sous or two at the street-crossings in charity, and her name may be Mademoiselle Deslion.

For it is in this way such mock splendors vanish.

Yet still the carriages buzz, and the princes make carnival of Easter. The sale, the splendor, the story call to mind Victor Hugo's new work of the "Miserables." It is just now published in Paris, in Belgium, and (by translation) in half a dozen different capitals of Europe. It deals with the accidents and incidents of social life. It deals, in short, with larger problems than the author has ever dealt with before. But he brings more of age and experience to the discussion.

We speak now only in view of a synopsis of its contents. We may return to it again.

The son of the poet, Charles Hugo, is understood to be engaged upon a dramatic adaptation of the book.

This mention leads us naturally to speak of the new election to the French Academy in place of M. Scribe. The successful candidate has been M. Octave Feuillet. His best opponent was M. Camille Doucet, who holds a position under Government in connection with the theatrical régime, and who received ten votes out of the thirty-one recorded.

Octave Feuillet, the new Academician, is some fifty odd years of age, and his best known work is the "Roman d'un jeune homme pauvre," which was originally published in the Revue des Deux Mondes, and which has been translated in various countries. He is also said to have contributed largely to the success of certain plays which bear the full imprint of "Alexandre Dumas, author."

On the same column upon which we record the success of M. Octave Feuillet, we are compelled to name the decease of a prominent man in the musical world of Paris; we speak of M. Fromental Halevy, a member (as well as perpetual secretary) of the Academy des Beaux Arts, and author of "La Juive," and of the "Queen of Cyprus." These two were, perhaps, his best compositions; but they never commanded the admiration which made a brilliant success; and poor Halevy died without any adequate provision for his family. We have hardly the right to speak of him as "poor Halevy;" the world can not count us ten names which have won a larger musical popularity. "La Juive" has had the largest placarding in the largest capitals of Europe. A great army of mediocre composers have envied the great Halevy; and yet we say, en connaissance de cause, "poor Halevy!" And the brothers Pereire, in the spirit of true Hebrew fellowship, have instituted a subscription for the benefit of the family of the deceased. He died at Nice; but the funeral obsequies in Paris were attended by many of first distinction in art and literature, as well as by a large representation of the imperial authorities.

Another French death of note has been that of M. Henri Schaeffer, brother of the late Ary Schaeffer, and himself a painter of no mean distinction. The works best known of his perhaps are the Bible Reading and Joan of Arc on her Way to Execution.

This mention of an artist leads us, naturally enough, to speak of sun-painting, and of the chances for the speedy perfection of a polychromatic photography. For some time it has been known to experimental chemists that certain colors could be seized and repeated upon chemically prepared plates. Latterly this number of colors has been largely extended; but it was found that while a definite period of exposure perfected certain colors, the same time was not sufficient to duplicate others. If, however, the duration and intensity of light was extended so as to repeat these latter, the first were destroyed by over-exposure. This difficulty, however, has been surmounted by an adroit use of screens, which shade the more sensitive colors while the others are being fixed. In this way a great variety of colors are caught; but unfortunately they are found to fade after a certain period of exposure. It only remains to discover some sure means of fixing them, and helio-chromics are thenceforth certain.

Meantime the beautiful art of polychromic lithography, which has made wonderful advance in delicacy and brilliancy, is almost filling the place of sun-painting. There has just now been published at Paris, by Curmer, a singularly rich work, "Les Evangiles," which repeats with all the original brilliancy of coloring some of the rarest missal illustrations of the early centuries of Christian art. Among others, the rare old breviary of Grimani, which is one of the chiefest manuscript treasures of the library of St. Mark at Venice, has been copied to the last point of its delicate caligraphy; and the illustrative miniatures and borders have been rendered with a delicacy and grace that leave nothing to be desired. Several manuscript treasures of the Breda and Vatican libraries are also laid under contribution for the adornment of "Les Evangiles."

It is gratifying to know that the photographic reductions of the great paintings are not driving into neglect the good old art of line engraving. Even the sneers of Mr. Ruskin can not blind the world to an abiding faith in such conscientious and patient labor as belonged to the burin of Raphael Morghen.

And now the great Madonna of Foligno is to have worthy transcript at the hands of Jos. Keller. A generous subscription has been raised among his friends to give him seven good years of leisure for devotion to the work. In that time he hopes to complete it; his drawing from which the engraving is to be made is represented to be every way admirable.

THE affairs of Italy do not promise a peaceful summer. Ratazzi may succeed in establishing a strong Government which shall have full legislative support; but it is doubtful if even thus early the extreme Garibaldi element of the population is not to a certain extent alienated. The General himself has been receiving extravagant ovations throughout the cities of Lombardy, where he has gone nominally for the purpose of establishing rifle-clubs, of which Prince Humbert is chief patron. Every where the street crowds are excited to frenzy by the sight of the red-shirted patriot; and his speeches are of that abrupt, impulsive, unstudied, earnest cast which add fuel to the popular enthusiasm. There is no diplomacy about Garibaldi; and he talks of the brother Venetians, and the brother Romans, and the tyrant Pope, in a way which must startle the French ambassador. He proposes to extend his journeying into the old Sicilian kingdom; and it remains to be seen what effect his presence may have upon the now chronic brigandage of the south.

All the official accounts of quietude in that region have, it appears, been strangely exaggerated; and the Bourbon reactionists are now showing themselves within cannon-shot of Naples.

But aside from the Bourbon brigandage, and the possible extravagant action of the immediate followers of Garibaldi, Italy is experiencing a new and growing danger in the persistent jealousies of the different provinces. An anti-Piedmont feeling of alarming significance is rapidly extending over the south of the peninsula, and has long been entertained in the island of Sicily. Tuscany, too, is feeling aggrieved by the slights which she claims have been thrust upon her favorite Ricasoli. Emilia has its own sectional pride, and demands with some fiercé its representation in the Government. Nor is Lombardy silent, but full of round and confident assertion of its traditional privileges and importance to the new State of Italy. In the midst of this conflict of jealousies, which we dare say the local papers may magnify unduly, it is pleasant to let the eye rest upon that little, serene, compact Republic of San Marino, which from its scarred mountain eyrie of the Apennines, has seen fourteen centuries of change sweep over the Italian plains, leaving its own integrity and independence unscathed and almost unchallenged.

From the Montanara gate of the mouldy old city of Rimini a carriage road runs south, winding up the pleasant and shaded hill of Covignano; beyond are abrupt ascents and descents, volcanic ravines, mossy and stunted olives, scarred and blighted oak-trees, a noisy brook which is leaped by a stout arch of stone; and midway of the arch a tablet bearing on its east face the tiara and keys of Rome, and on the west face R. S. M., which means Repubblica Sancti Marini. It marks the border line of the little State which dates from the heroic times of Rome.

There was never much wealth to tempt an aggressor; the soil is bare, broken, seamed with the track of torrents. A few grape-vines struggle for life; a few acorns feed the swine, and scanty fields of wheat make up the agricultural resources. Three little bourgs or villages contain its population of some seven thousand. The chiefest of these bourgs, San Marino, crowns a rocky cliff in whose recesses the winter snows lie until late spring. From the walls of its miniature defensive castle one can see looking northward the Adriatic; and of a clear day catch glimpses of the hazy blue of the Dalmatian mountains. Faenza, Forli, Cervia, Cesenne, Rimini can all be spotted on the plains. Westward the mountain lines are lashed together in inextricable confusion, and the eye follows their gray-brown peaks till they are lost in the purple distance of Tuscany.

Every man of twenty-one in San Marino is a voter; legislative power rests in a General Assembly of some sixty members, and a lesser one (Senate) of twelve. Every six months these assemblies name two captains, who are charged with the executive power; one for the city, the other for the country. A judge is appointed from without the State, who holds office under salary for three years; and there is appeal from his decisions to the council of twelve. All other civic functionaries serve without remuneration. The little army of the State consists of some forty men, of whom nearly half are musicians. The total State revenue reaches the sum of forty thousand francs.

A plenipotentiary of this little republic is just now at Turin negotiating with Victor Emanuel a treaty of amity and commerce. The Count Cibrario, Minister of State, and patrician of San Marino, acts for the Republic, and the Chevalier Carutti for Italy. We trust the negotiations may come to a happy issue, and the wise little State carry its Republican gonfalon bravely down to the latest time.

WE have for some time lost sight of the Suez Canal project of M. Lesseps, nor have the public journals, in the engrossment with more important matters, given it other than the most casual mention. Yet, notwithstanding British opposition and sneers, the work is being pushed zealously forward. A steamer in the employ of the company runs regularly between Damietta and Samanhout. At the former place is the present dépôt for the Mediterranean terminus of the canal, which is to enter the sea by Port Said. Some seventeen millions of francs are said to have been already expended. A private traveler makes the following report:

"On the morning of the 11th we took boats and, traversing the lake, soon came to the first station on the canal, sixteen kilometres (ten miles) from Port Said. We followed the line of dredging-boats which are deepening the passage, and in the evening reached Kantara-el-Kasné, 48 kilometres from Port Said. The channel through which we passed varied in width from 5 to 12 metres, but will soon have the latter width throughout. We had thus accomplished in ten hours a journey which would have required three days a year ago. The houses at Kantara are built of old bricks taken from the ruins of an ancient city about half a league distant. This town is likely to become a place of some importance, owing to its position on the road taken by the caravans between Syria and Arabia. The climate is healthy, and provisions are abundant." Next morning we resumed our journey along a canal cut through the waterless lakes of Ballah; and at noon reached Ferdane, at the foot of the Threshold, where the canal ends for the present. Ferdane is 67 kilometres from Port Said. To give some idea of the result already obtained, I need only state the carriage of goods from Port Said to Ferdane, which used to cost 150 to 200 francs the 1000 kilogs., is now only 7 francs, and will soon be reduced to 3 francs.

"Ferdane is situated on one of the downs bearing that name, and the canal will there enter a cutting with rather high banks on each side. Here we were received by the engineer of the division and Ishmail Bey, the Governor of the Isthmus, who has a guard of one hundred black horsemen. We left Ferdane in the afternoon, the gentlemen on horses or dromedaries and the ladies in a carriage, and crossed the famous sands of Ferdane, which have been represented as an insuperable obstacle, but which experience will prove to be no obstacle at all. When we had journeyed about half a league we came within sight of a range of small acclivities on which we saw men at work, and were told that those heights were the threshold of Elguirs, where 20,000 men were cutting a passage for the canal. We found that these Arabs, notwithstanding the fast of the Ramadan, when they usually refuse to work, were toiling away with all their might under the stimulus of regular pay in proportion to the work done."

M. Lesseps expresses the utmost confidence that within two years ships will pass through from sea to sea. Twenty thousand laborers are at present engaged upon the work of cutting through the "Threshold;" and this number is shortly to be doubled under the somewhat despotic direction of the Viceroy.

THE Greek Revolution engages the attention of Europe, only to a very limited degree. The insurgents have been rashly importunate; and the King, with his advisers, rashly obstinate. The world seems content that both should pay the price of a small war without intervention or remark. All German sympathies are with the King; and Russian sympathies are with the revolutionists. France and England appear neither to entertain nor express sympathy on either side. A projected demonstration, however, of the Greek students in Paris, in honor of the insurgents of Nauplia, was recently checked by the Imperial Government, in obedience to the wishes of the Greek chargé.

THE late signal success of the new Turkish Loan upon the London Exchange has called out the eager antagonism of those Continental journals which are in the Russian interest. The color of the whole discussion lies in these facts: Russia is waiting hopefully and faithfully for Ottoman decay; Great Britain is nervously apprehensive of the same result, and staves it off by her subsidies. Austria sympathizes with England, and coyly assists Turkey in her military repression of the Slavic insurgents along the Adriatic. France and Prussia are represented to be on terms of agreement with Russia in all that relates to the slowly evolving problems of the Orient.

A LITTLE on dit, which has almost the kindling matter in it for a romance, we pluck from the current talk and fling into our record.

A poor shoemaker, with wife and one child, lived upon the fourth floor of a hotel in the Rue St. Martin. A lodger upon the same floor, having only a solitary chamber and no ostensible means of support, attracted their attention and their sympathies. He was of middle age, lived poorly, had no companions, and had the bearing of a decayed gentleman. The kind cobbler and his wife continued to bestow upon him, in an unnoticed and quiet way, a great many little attentions, which they hoped might relieve his loneliness and contribute to his comfort.

The single lodger accepted these graciously, cultivated familiarity with the little daughter of his fourth-floor neighbor, and ended by making engagement with the cobbler to furnish him his dinner each day at their own table. The sum proposed in payment seemed larger to the humble couple than the unfortunate gentleman could afford. But he persisted in his generous offer, and a close intimacy was established.

One day the postman left a letter for the single lodger, which was handed him as he sat with the little family of his host. It disturbed him grievously: he thrust the letter in the fire—paced up and down the chamber, kissed affectionately his protégée, the cobbler's daughter, went out, and has never been seen by them since.

A week thereafter the shoemaker received a letter post-marked at a village upon the extreme borders of France. It proved to be from the missing lodger. It hinted at family griefs which could never be repaired, and at threats hanging over him which could only be escaped by the utmost seclusion. It begged the little family of the attic to forget him—to forget his very appearance, if possible: it begged them to take possession of his furniture for their own benefit, and also of ten Bank of France notes of a thousand each, which would be found in one of his drawers, hoping it might be enough to establish the shoemaker in a little business of his own.

That is all.

The people of the village upon the French border, where the letter of the lodger was posted, knew nothing of him. The police, to whom the grateful shoemaker made application—fearing possible suicide—knew no more.

It would be hard to overstate the degree of interest, which, since the demonstrations of the Monitor and Merrimac, has attended the discussions, both public and private, concerning iron-bound ships. The European mind is quick to detect the significance of such a war-lesson as that of Hampton Roads. British journals and Parliament will have made their own report to you; and if French publicists have been less eager and demonstrative, as they certainly have been, you may be assured that those who hold the question of a possible French war in their hands are not idle or unobservant.

It is not too much to say, that within two years' time not an important harbor of France but will have its iron-bound, bomb-proof floating battery, and not another order will be issued to the Naval dépôts of France for the building of a wooden warship. Italy, Denmark, Russia are all astir in this business, and are occupied with schemes for the conversion of their old naval craft into iron-cased batteries. Nor must Americans commit the mistake of thinking that England has only her Warrior and Black Prince in a state of readiness for the year to come. Besides the Achilles, of 50 guns and 6000 tons burden, building at Chatham dock-yard, there are now under contract with private builders, and in an advanced state, the Agincourt, of 6000 tons; the Northumberland, of equal capacity; the Valiant, of 4000; the Minotaur, of 6000; the Orontes, of 3000; the Hector, of 4000.

Some half dozen of the heaviest line-of-battle ships, of the class of the Duke of Wellington, are being cut down for equipment with the armed cupolas of Captain Coles. The character and success of Ericsson's turret has given new favor to the device of Captain Coles; and, in justice to the Captain, we copy a brief notice of his cupola from a British paper of the date of July, 1861:

"One of the great advantages derived from the aid of the shield is found to be the port-hole, which is entirely closed by the gun, save the small space sufficient to permit an elevation of 10 and a depression of 7 degrees. The horizontal motion, or training, is effected by turning the shield itself, with the gun, crew, and platform on which they stand. The whole apparatus thus becomes, as it were, the gun-carriage, and, being placed on a common turn-table, is revolved to the greatest nicety of adjustment. The shield is provided with a hollow cylinder 3 feet in diameter, through which the powder is handed up from the magazine and communication obtained. A current of air is likewise kept up through the hollow pivot by means of a fan, which causes the smoke, directly it leaves the breech of the gun, to escape through the opening immediately above it. The exposed portion above the glacis of 3 feet 8 inches (the entire shield being 7 feet high) is covered with blocks of iron, and the lower part is sunk into the deck, and protected by an iron glacis. The face of the shield presents a slanting surface of 45 degrees elevation, on a solid substance of 4½-inch plates of iron, backed up by 18-inch timber blocks. It is calculated that any amount of pounding from the enemy's guns would produce no injurious effect, as no horizontal fire can strike this structure above the water-line except at an angle of 40 degrees. It is completely protected against a vertical fire by its arched roof, and is supported on each side by stanchions, or fore-and-aft bulkheads."

AMONG the more recent improvements in Paris which are deserving of notice we may name the final completion of the beautiful Park of Monceau, and its opening to the free enjoyment of the public. Old visitors to Paris will remember it only as a charming closed garden, of princely extent, of which one only caught straggling glimpses from the raised roadway of a portion of the exterior Boulevard. Unlike the gardens of the Tuileries and of the Luxembourg, it does not depend for its attractions upon stately avenues, mossy statues, or its courtly reminiscences of the great gardener, Le Nôtre. It is joyous with the free life of trees in all the abandon of wide-spread branches, trailing vines, and unfettered growth. It rivals and surpasses St. James's. Grottoes, fountains, naiads, charming tufts of flowering shrubs delight the visitor with continued surprises.

The great Hôtel de la Paix, near the head of the regal street of that name, is soon to be opened for the reception of guests; and it will give some idea of its magnitude when we state that it contains no less than seven hundred bedchambers; twenty-five miles of wire have been ordered for the bells of service; there are to be within it thirty thousand square yards of inlaid oak-flooring, eighteen thousand yards of carpeting, and ten thousand square yards of mirrors.

Upon the decorations of its dining-hall one of the most successful sculptors of France has been employed; while the contract price for the dinner "centre" and accompanying plate, of the noted plate manufacturer, Christople, is stated to be 240,000 francs.

Its name is auspicious; may it long deserve it!

THE Japanese Embassadors have recently arrived in Paris, by the overland passage, and are exciting the same crowds of curious street-gazers they commanded in America. The personnel of this diplomatic convoy differs somewhat from that known to the New Yorkers, but many members are the same. The Emperor and officials generally have received them with great courtesy, and treated them with an exaggerated show of ceremonial calculated to make a deep impression on statesmen who wear golden girdles and half a dozen stilettos to their waistband.

Not since the year 1652 has Japan been officially represented among the nationalities of the West. At that date a few princes converted to Christianity conceived the idea of paying personal homage to the Vicar of Christ at Rome. Three years of difficult and dangerous travel lay between their starting-point of Nangasaki and the triple crown of the Pope. But the Christian-Pagans bravely surmounted all dangers and trials, did reverence to his Holiness, and in eight years were in their own city again, only to find the Christian zeal they had left in such flame utterly gone out. It is understood that the present embassy will visit London and the World's Exhibition before their return.

THE Industrial Palace draws near to completion, and for a month past the various courts have been cumbered with goods. Englishmen are not proud of the architectural effect of the Palace; and if rumor respecting its appearance may be trusted, their moderation in this regard is discreet.

With the single exception, perhaps, of Barry's Houses of Parliament, all recent architecture in England of a grandiose or monumental type is a failure. Their hospitals and union work-houses are admirable for convenience, for propriety, and unity of effect; their parish churches are charming studies of grace; their country houses are models which all the world will copy and never excel; they give an air of sanctity to their little churches which beguiles one into reverence; and they add an indescribable tone of cheerful, cozy homeness to their domestic buildings which is quite unmatchable; but their public monuments, galleries, exchanges, theatres, are either repetitions of established classicism of line, or crude and ineffective enormities.

Editor's Drawer.

WHAT part of the world where the English language is read does not enjoy the Drawer? Now and then a letter from China tells of the pleasure it carries to the Universal Nation whose wandering sons and daughters dwell among the Celestials. We have had tidings from the interior of Africa, and here comes one from the middle of the Pacific Ocean, bringing testimony to the virtues of the Drawer, and telling a story besides. A correspondent in Honolulu, Sandwich Islands, writes to us, and is pleased to say:

"Even here in these isles of the sea the Drawer of Harper's Magazine is an institution. We regard it a sovereign remedy for the blues, and we take it both when we have them and when we haven't, so that it does us good all times. I send you a little story of our Governor. You know the old song:

"Three wise men of Gotham
Went to sea in a bowl;
If the bowl had been stronger,
My song had been longer."

"Two of our citizens, Judge B—— and Dr. N——, had occasion to go to the island of Kauai, the land of sugar and coffee. They returned in a schooner, and among the passengers was the Governor of the island, who was coming to visit the metropolis—this great city of Honolulu. The Governor is a native, and so was the Captain of the schooner—a first-rate seaman as long as land is in sight. There came up a gale that blew them off; and having no compass, and a short supply of provision, they were soon in a sad plight indeed. On and on for nine days they sailed, when they ought to have been in port in two. The Judge and the Doctor thought it about time to take matters into their own hands or they would all be starved to death; for neither law nor physic would serve them without something to eat. They deemed it proper to ask the Governor what he thought best to be done. His Excellency took the subject into consideration, and, with great sagacity, remarked:

"Well, now, as we are lost, I think we had better go back to where we started from."

"The poor Captain would have been but too happy to comply with the Governor's suggestion, had there been any such thing as knowing where that place was; but that day a whaler hove in sight, and supplying them with provisions led them into port. They were actually on the way to America."

DR. RADCLIFFE lived neighbor to Godfrey Kneller. Kneller had a fine garden, and being a painter of fine taste delighted in ornamenting his grounds. The Doctor was so fond of his neighbor that he proposed to have a gate between the premises, through which he could readily pass into the painter's garden. The servants, however, used it so much that it became a nuisance, and the painter sent word to the Doctor that he should have to brick up the wall.

"Tell him," said the Doctor, "to do what he likes to the door so long as he does not paint it."

When this was reported to the painter he said to the messenger, "Go back to the Doctor, and tell him I will take any thing from him but his physic."

ONE never wearies of the peculiar wit and repartee of the Irish.

On one occasion Mr. F—— called his two servants, Bridget and Patrick, to his aid; but they undid, in their awkward zeal, faster than he could put things together, which so annoyed him that he cried out, contemptuously, "Oh, you Paddies!"

"And who is it ye are spaking to?" asked Bridget, indignantly.

"To you, for one!"

"And who else, if you plaze?"

"Isn't Patrick another?"

"Ah, yes; faith and that makes jest three of us!"

ONCE upon a time Bridget complained that the nurse, who sat at the second table with her, ate and drank more than her share of the goodies.

"Well, Bridget, you must give her a hint, in your pleasant way, that will secure your rights."

The next day, when nurse monopolized, Bridget sat back in her chair very despairingly.

"Are you sick to-day?" asked nurse, helping herself to the last potato.

"Niver a bit of it; but me jaws are jist growing together intirely!"

"Who ever heard of such a thing?" cried nurse, as she drained the tea-pot [Bridget adored tea].

"Sure, and it's not your jaws that will be after troublin' ye in that way!" shouted Bridget, with her flaming eyes upon the exhausted tea-pot; "for the divil of a chance have I had to open my own since ye entered the house! Bad luck to the like of ye!"

Bridget used to boast that the way she snubbed "that nus" was "illegant!"

DOMESTICS, as the reader may have had occasion to remember, are very tenacious in regard to their payments.

The usual pay-day had been allowed to pass unnoticed, and Bridget had asked for her dues, which it had not been convenient to give her. In the evening I went below to see that the doors were secured for the night.

"Bridget," I said, "you left the basement-door unlocked last night, and the thieves are unusually active just now. Such negligence is inexcusable."

"Faith," cried Bridget, with dilating nostrils, "it's not into this house a thaif would be after coming!"

"And why not into this as well as another?"

"Sure there's niver a thaif in Ameriky but would know there was no money here!"

"THERE lives in a neighboring town a genuine son of the Emerald Isle, who, like too many of his countrymen, was much inclined to the use, and abuse too, of strong drink. During one of the temperance reforms Pat signed the pledge, and made himself quite useful to the cause in portraying at public meetings, with true Irish humor and pathos, his experience in the drunkard's ways.

"Not long since he visited our city of B——, when he was presently met by one of his old temperance friends carrying a very heavy brick in his hat, causing eccentric movements in his gyrations about town highly amusing to the young and rising generation, and truly astonishing to his cold water friend, who accosted him with, 'Why, Brother C——, I am astonished to see you in this state! I thought you were lecturing on temperance!'

"An' shure, yer honor, so I be; but d'ye mind, me ould expariance was aboot worn out, and I thot I'd jest take a bit of new to make me lectures more interesting!"

MRS. JONES has long been wanting to visit Greenwood Cemetery, and now in early summer she says to her husband, "You have never yet taken me to Greenwood."

"No, dear," he replied, "that is a pleasure I have yet had only in anticipation."

EDMUND BURKE's pun on Brocklesby's name is a good instance of the elaborate ingenuity with which the great orator adorned his conversation and his speeches. Pre-eminent among the advertising quacks of the day was Dr. Rock. It was therefore natural that Brocklesby should express some surprise at being accosted by Mr. Burke as Dr. Rock, a title at once infamous and ridiculous. "Don't be offended," said Burke, with a laugh: "your name is Rock; I'll prove it algebraically: Brock less B equals Rock."

It is an old "dodge" for doctors who want to get into notice to have a servant come into church and call them out. But Dr. Mead, of London, rejoiced in a father who was the minister of a large congregation, and whenever his medical son was summoned in church time, the good minister was wont to call on the people to unite in prayers for the body and soul of the sufferer to whom the physician had just been called. This was a grand advertisement, and helped to set up his son rapidly.

THE clerk of a county in Kentucky sends us the original of the following notice posted near his office:

"Stray Sture rather a brinel white beley crumpley horne hy Sholderd about 9 years old crooced hind legs wines hise hind legs verry mutch when travling the year mark not rectilected"

"I AM a Yankee schoolmaster. Several years of my life were spent in teaching in a locality known as 'Away down East,' though the past three years have been spent in the same avocation in the 'City of Brotherly Love.'

"A class of half a dozen girls were analyzing and parsing Cowper's 'Alexander Selkirk,' and all had acquitted themselves creditably, until this passage was presented to the favorite pupil—favorite, I say, for it is impossible for a teacher not to have favorites:

"My sorrows I then might assuage
In the ways of religion and truth;
Might learn from the wisdom of age,
And be cheered by the sallies of youth."

"The word 'sallies' falling to the lot of our heroine, she cast an arch glance at the teacher, and then inquired, 'Might not "Sallies" have been a noun proper, in the plural, under the circumstances, Sir?'

"I thought so, and she parsed it."

MR. EDITOR,—The contemplation of Tennyson's "Eagle," which I greatly admire, led me to compose the following:

THE EAGLE.
BY J. E. MURRAY.

O! thou noble, lofty bird,
Of all the fowls thou'rt lord;
Disdaining man and all his laws,
And holding Earth within thy claws

* * * * *
An eagle soaring in the sky,
Nearly to the blazing sun,
Cast his keen, sun-glaring eye
Far adown the vasty dun.
And there an acorn he espied
Swiftly through the ether whirl'd;
The sea a white spot on its side;
He swooped, and grasped—the solid world.

CENTREVILLE, CALIFORNIA, April 15.

JARRAD is a clever fellow—rather too clever, in fact; and though he works hard, he seems to get behindhand all the time. Jarrad has a sister. She got married. Jarrad was asked how he liked his brother-in-law. Said he, "I don't like him, Sir; he's a mean man." Being pressed for his reasons for not liking him, "Well, I will tell you," said he, reluctantly; "he swindled me clean out of fifty dollars—isn't that reason enough?" Jarrad's friends wanted to know how he swindled him. "Why, Sir, he promised to lend me fifty dollars, and he didn't do it—that's how!" and all who know Jarrad acknowledge that it was barefaced swindling, and nothing else.

FROM a budget of clever stories sent us by an obliging correspondent we take two for present use:

"A little girl of ours had been trying to learn the alphabet, and succeeded very well in remembering A, I, S (the 'crooked letter'), and O. Soon after having recited her lesson she came running to her papa with her book containing the alphabet, and, pointing to Q, said, 'See, papa! O has got a little tail!'

"ON a Sabbath morning, feeling somewhat indisposed to go to church, I determined to stay at home, and requested Dinah, my colored housemaid, to remember the 'text' and as much of the sermon as she could, and report to me on her return. After service Dinah came into the parlor to report; but her memory being rather a 'forgettery,' all she could say of the text was that 'it was sothin' 'bout dey was weighed in de balance an' come up missin'."

A MICHIGANDER writes to the Drawer of a brace of doctors:

"In one of the many stump cities for which Michigan is somewhat noted live two individuals who put 'M.D.' at the end of their names. They are bitter enemies, defaming each other's character at every opportunity. Dr. A— pretends to have the more classical education of the two, though for that matter both can use and have at their tongue's end any quantity of unpronounceable words. Much rivalry existed between them as to which should be the regular physician of a certain family, who, when any member was sick, called in the one first found.

"One day Dr. A— was sent for to attend one of the children. He and the old lady soon began discussing the merits and demerits of Dr. B—. Finally Dr. A— said to the old lady, 'B— is one of the most ignorant men you ever saw. The next time you see him ask him if he knows the modus operandi, and if you ain't satisfied then I'm a stoker.'

"Soon after she saw Dr. B—, and asked him the question.

"'Moder sapprandi,' says B—; 'moder sapprandi. Why, yes; there's lots of it grows wild right out here in the fields.'

"The old lady was convinced."

"I HAVE a little boy six years old, who is inclined to be pugnacious.

"One day at dinner the conversation turned upon the evil habit of lying. He joined in by saying, 'I know a boy who never told a lie, because I asked him yesterday if he could lick me, and he said No!'"

A fair inference from the premises, the Drawer decides.

IN Memphis, Tennessee, a correspondent tells a story for the Drawer, of old election times, that is very rich and very true to the life. It is to show the candidate before and after election.

Jackson was the man's name who was running for Congress. He was hale fellow well met with Thomas, Richard, and Henry, shaking hands with every body, and all that. He got in. Suddenly his manner changed. He didn't know half the people he met—he was too big to speak to every body. A Dutchman by the name of Stoever came along—a rough blacksmith—and, holding out his black fist, said, "How do, Mr. Jackson?"

The Congressman, a crowd standing around, took hold of his hand reluctantly, and remarked, "Your face is familiar, but for my life I can't recollect your name."

The Dutchman, without giving his name, cried out:

"Gentlemen, I now tell you von goot story.

Ven I live in Germany de lort-mayor of de down he die. Den dey have 'lection for von nudder lort-mayor. Now dere live in de down von man pie de name of Dinks. He pe von osler. Now von tay Dinks he come long de street vid his back on his pack, and de beeples say, 'Spose ve maks Dinks lort-mayor!' And sure nuff dey votes for Dinks and makes him mayor. Dey den takes Dinks up to de pig house, and butts de pig vite robe pon him, and butts de pig crown pon his head, and den butts him in de pig arm-cheer, and den Dinks set like von vool. After vile, Dinks' vife she miss him. She run up and town de street look vor him; ven de beeples tell her Dinks pe lort-mayor. So she go to de pig house and beep in and jumb pack. Den she beeps in gin, an say, 'Dinks, O Dinks!' Dinks say, 'Hoo dat call me?' She say, 'Dis is your vife, Dinks; don't you know me?' He say, 'You pe von vool! How you speck I know you, ven I no know myself now?'

The story made its own application. The crowd roared with laughter at the expense of Jackson, who sloped. I venture to say that Jackson never forgot the name of the Dutchman after that day.

A KENTUCKY correspondent says:

"A little brother of mine, twelve years old, quarreling with one of my negroes, who was about his own age, threw a rotten apple at him, which took effect between two very large-sized lips, and liberally bespattered the remainder of his face. The little 'contraband' spit and sputtered for a moment, and indignantly marched off, exclaiming, 'Mass' Horace, I take dis countenance right in and show it to your father.'"

A MR. THOMAS OGDEN, having arrived in New York from England, went several successive mornings to the post-office to ask for letters. Inquiring always for letters addressed to Thomas Hogden, the postmaster invariably replied that there were none for him. But becoming at length quite impatient at these frequent disappointments, he thrust his head through the delivery window, and soon discovered the cause. "You are looking among the Haitches, Sir," he said to the officer within; "you should look among the Hoes!"

IN California the Drawer has several correspondents, one of whom mentions "Old Clarkson," noted for the size of the stories he tells, and for never backing down when he has once committed himself. He was one day flush, having $500 all in gold, and showing it among his cronies, boasted that he had two thousand more at home. One of them offered to bet him $500 that he hadn't the money. Old Clarkson was not to be frightened. He put down the money, the other covered it, and the whole crowd therewith adjourned to Clarkson's home to see the bet decided. He pulled out his trunk; he took up the clothes, shook them, felt in all the pockets, reached the bottom—not a cent was there. "Gentlemen," said he, "I've lost the bet!" So the old fool paid $500 for sticking to a lie.

At another time, being at a horse-race opposite New Orleans, after the race was over he was accosted by a fellow-sportsman thus: "Clarkson, old fellow, I say, lend me a dime to take me over the river. I am flat broke by the race." Looking at him with the most unutterable contempt, he replied: "Well now, if you are broke, I would like to know what possible difference it makes which side of the river you are on?"

DR. FRANKLIN thought that judges ought to be appointed by the lawyers; for, added the shrewd man, in Scotland, where this practice prevails, they always select the ablest member of the profession, in order to get rid of him and share his practice themselves.

"I HAVE received to-day," says a friend in the West, "a letter opening with the following words, in reply to mine mentioning the death of an excellent man:

"I received your letter, by which I learn that my respected friend has departed from this world to enjoy and inherit a better. I feel extremely sorry for him, for he was good and honest."

"MOTHER," said my six-year-old, "did they have newspapers before the war?"

"Yes, my child; but why do you ask?"

"Well, what did they put in them, mother?"

AN Irishman, a soldier of Warren's brigade, in the Revolution, was suddenly stopped by a party of men during a dark night; a pistol was presented to his breast, and they asked to which side he belonged. The supposition that it might be the British party rendered his situation critical. He replied, "I think you might have the civility to drop a hint as to which side you favor." "No jesting!" said the speaker; "declare your sentiments, or die!" "Then I will not die with a lie in my mouth—American to the death; do your worst!" The officer replied, "We are friends, and I rejoice to meet with a man so faithful to the cause of his country."

IN Western Virginia, where 'possums and persimmons are a legal tender, a free negro, who rejoiced in the title of Big Ben, was indebted to Joe — to the amount of one bushel of walnuts, to be paid in the fall. Joe met Big Ben about the time the debt fell due, and hailed him:

"Hello, Ben! what about those walnuts?"

"Times war hard," "warmits scase," and Ben couldn't pay.

"Well, Ben, if you can't pay the walnuts, you must give me your note for the amount."

Ben studied a while, scratched his head, and finally 'lowed "he'd as soon pay it wid a note as wid de warmits"—and he did so.

SOME friends were standing in a court-room one day contemplating a lot of hard-looking jurymen, who could, without any detriment to their physiognomies, have changed places with the prisoners, when Tom H— remarked that it was "very fortunate such men were created."

"Why?" asked his friend.

"That the conditions of our glorious Constitution might be fulfilled, which guarantees to every man the right to be tried by his peers."

"It is said somewhere that 'Praise to the face is open disgrace.' But that was said when any thing that would rhyme was a sign or proverb. I don't consider it a disgrace to tell you my opinion of the Drawer. I follow the Celestials in reading Harper, and always begin at the end."

"Paddy's shoes," in April number, brings to my mind a remark by one who didn't go to the war, as he was making a personal examination of some straw-board shoes provided for those who have gone to be soldiers: 'There!' said he, 'I should be mortified to death to be found dead by the rebels with a pair of those shoes on my feet!'

"A FEW years ago some of the boys of older growth went blueberrying. In the course of their perambulations through the swamp one of the party came very suddenly upon the remains of some poor outcast who, some months before, had wandered away and perished. There was just enough left to identify the mass as once a living and walking piece of humanity. Calling the other members of the party to see the spectacle, they all rushed up, and stood gazing for some time in perfect silence; when Brown shocked the company by saying, 'Well, it's no use to try to bring him to, is it?'"

A VERY good Yankee story comes to the Drawer by way of Baltimore:

A certain live Yankee having graduated at the law in the good old wooden-nutmeg State, removed to our beautiful, bustling, and busy city of Baltimore, and when walking up the hill of Fayette Street attracted, by his evident verdancy, the attention of two sprouts of the bar seated in one of the numerous offices in that neighborhood. One of them, addressing the other, says, "Hold still, and we'll have some fun!" Stepping out, he accosts Yankee:

"Halloa, friend! don't you want to buy some gape-seed?"

"Wa'al, look here, neow; yeou be Mister Leawyer, beant ye?"

"Yes, Sir."

"Well, neow, what will yeou charge me to do me some writing?"

"Oh, step in—step in; we will do it for you."

"Yeas, but the price; heaow about that, Mister?"

"Well, if it is no more than one sheet full, five dollars; if less, the same; more, another five—and so on."

"Well, and if yeou deon't write it down just as I tell yeou, it is no charge at all?"

"Certainly not; but no fear—we'll fix it right."

Seizing a pen, and making a rattling with his paper, he gets into an attitude: "Go on, Sir."

"Well, pappy up to hum in Connecticut, whar I cum from"—put that thar down." "Well," says the lawyer. "'He had an old hoss named Dobbin'—put that thar down." "Well." "'And Aunt Sallie, she's Deacon Zeb Williams's wife, you know, what is a mighty pious man, is the deacon, and Aunt Sallie is a mighty smart woman too, is Aunt Sallie'—put that thar down." "Well, well; go on." "'And Aunt Sallie, she's the beatenest woman, and Sister Patience—I suppose you've hearn tell of Sister Patience'—put that thar down. 'They took a ride; they rid along for some time, and presently the old hoss stopped, and would not go'—put that thar down. 'And Aunt Sallie she shook the reins, and sez, Go long!' [chirruping, chirruping, chirruping, and making the noise caused by sucking in with the lips somewhat twisted.]—Put that thar down." "What's that?" says the lawyer. Our friend goes over the same performance, again winding up with his "Put that thar down."

"And how am I to put that thar down?" says the lawyer, in a heat.

"Wa'al, beant as I don't kneow, Measter Lawyer," says Green un, "I can't tell you; but if you deon't, yeow can jest take that ere peaper to wrap up your gape-seed in!"

Exit with a smile; but hadn't gone far before lawyer overtook him, and took him to Barnum's and had a good time.

FROM Massachusetts we have the following little pleasantry:

"General O——, formerly Mayor of our city, is a great wit. Not long since one of his daughters was married to a gentleman by the name of Battles. On this occasion the General was sparkling and brilliant. After the interesting ceremony was concluded, he made some remarks; and, turning to the bride, he said 'that he had always tried to do by her the best that he knew how, and that for years he had stood forward as her champion; but he thought it proper to state that he was now done, and he gave her fair warning that henceforth she must fight her own BATTLES!'"

A VENERABLE lawyer in Connecticut writes to the Drawer:

"Years ago, before my head was silvered o'er with gray, I filled the responsible office of a lawyer's clerk. One fifth of July, hearing a hasty step approaching through the long hall that led to the office of the good lawyers N—— and F——, in which I was employed, and seeing the ever-smiling countenance of Sheriff B—— peering in the open doorway, inquiringly, 'Come in,' said I, 'come in.'

"All alone, eh?"

"Yes, Sir; please be seated."

"Thank you. There is a man coming in presently; answer all his questions, and— But here he is. This, Sir," said he, addressing the gentleman, 'is the lawyer I was speaking of. He is gentlemanly, smart, and, above all, a good lawyer. He will answer your questions.'

"While he was speaking I had scrutinized my client closely. A more striking figure one seldom encounters. A phiz thickly studded with a stiff, unshaven beard, gray and rough, a pair of eyes that peered like two balls of ice from under the folds of the dark matted hair that hung down over his narrow forehead, with a mouth wide and overshadowed by an upper lip of a thickness that defies belief, and this surmounted by a nose that reminded me of the sentence in our good old geography, 'A promontory is a high point of land extending into the sea;' and the red pimple on the end of it furnished the remainder of the paragraph, 'upon the extremity of which is often built a light-house.' I need not describe his dress; for when I say 'twas a snuff-colored countryman's suit it will be enough.

"As he made his bow he commenced drawing off his coat, when, suddenly recollecting himself, he drew it on, and motioned me to go with him into the hall, that he might not be overheard.

"Mr. Lawyer—I now smelled his breath, and noticed other tokens of intoxication—'yesterday I bought a ticket to go hum; now—hic—tha'sall right, hain't it?"

"Certainly," said I, just beginning to enjoy it with Sheriff B——, whom I could see in the office laughing heartily to himself.

"Wa'al, I lost the 'foresaid ticket—tha'sall right, I s'pose?"

"I nodded my head.

"Now the railroad ought ter take me hum—d'ye think they will?"

"I expressed my doubts. Then his cold eyes fired up and darted among the dangling locks like fire-flies in a woodland copse.

"Then flax 'round here! Make out a writ, and we'll 'tach the train!"

IN the Revolutionary War Captain Robinson's company of militia was captured in Virginia by Colonel Simcoe, and were informed that they would all be paroled. One of the men went to a noted wag in the neighborhood, by the name of Hicks—from whom Hicksford, Virginia, is named—and asked him what kind of a death it was they were to be put to, to be paroled. Hicks took the idea, and told the poor fellow it was the most horrid of all deaths in the world. They were to be put into a hogshead with spikes driven through it, and rolled down-hill till they were dead. The frightened soldier went back to the Colonel, and begged that their punishment might be changed to something more merciful than being paroled.

ON the first night that Cooper performed on the Cincinnati boards the following amusing variation was unwittingly introduced into the play, which was "Othello." Among a large audience composed of every description of people was a country lass. Now the innocent Peggy had never before set foot within the play-house. She entered just as Othello makes his defense before the Duke and Senate of Venice. The audience were unusually attentive to the play, and Peggy was permitted to walk in the lobby until she arrived at the door of the stage-box, when some one handed her in without withdrawing his eyes from the play; while her beau, a country boy, was compelled to remain in the lobby. Miss Pegg stared about her for a moment, as if wondering if she were in the proper place, till casting her eyes on the stage she observed several chairs which were unoccupied. Perhaps this circumstance alone would hardly have determined her to take the step she did, but she observed that the people on the stage appeared more at ease than those among whom she was standing, and withal more sociable; and as fate would have it, just at that moment Othello, looking nearly toward the place where she was situated, exclaimed, "Here comes the lady!" The Senators half rose in the expectation of seeing the gentle Desdemona appear, and Othello advances two steps to meet her, when, lo! the maiden from the country steps from the box plump on the stage and advanced toward the expectant Moor! It is beyond human power to give any idea of the confusion that followed. The audience clapped and cheered, the Duke and Senators forgot their dignity, while poor Peggy was ready to sink with consternation. Even Cooper himself could not refrain from joining in the general merriment. The uproar lasted for several minutes, until the gentleman who handed her into the box helped the blushing girl out of her unpleasant situation. It was, however, conceded on all hands that a lady never made her début on the stage with more éclat than Miss Peggy.

MINISTERS love a joke sometimes; and a Western correspondent sends us the best one we have read in many a day:

"I would like to tell you a short story, Mr. Drawer, that will prove that even the best of ministers love fun, even if it should raise a laugh on an earnest, eloquent, little dominie whose burning words and noble life have accomplished much for Christ's cause in the West.

"I was spending the night in a hotel in Freeport, Illinois. After breakfast I came into the sitting-room, where I met a pleasant, chatty, good-humored traveler, who, like myself, was waiting for the morning train from Galena. We conversed freely and pleasantly on several topics, until seeing two young ladies meet and kiss each other in the street, the conversation turned on kissing, just about the time the train was approaching.

"Come," said he, taking up his carpet-bag, 'since we are on so sweet a subject, let us have a practical application. I'll make a proposition to you. I'll agree to kiss the most beautiful lady in the cars from Galena, you being the judge, if you will kiss the next prettiest, I being the judge.'

"The proposition staggered me a little, and I could hardly tell whether he was in earnest or in fun; but as he would be as deep in it as I could possibly be, I agreed, provided he would do the first kissing, though my heart failed somewhat as I saw his black eye fairly sparkle with daring.

"Yes," said he, 'I'll try it first. You take the back car, and go in from the front end, where you can see the faces of the ladies, and you stand by the one you think the handsomest, and I'll come in from behind and kiss her.'

"I had hardly stepped inside the car when I saw at the first glance one of the loveliest looking women my eye ever fell on. A beautiful blonde, with auburn hair, and a bright, sunny face, full of love and sweetness, and as radiant and glowing as the morning. Any further search was totally unnecessary. I immediately took my stand in the aisle of the car by her side. She was looking out of the window earnestly, as if expecting some one. The back door of the car opened and in stepped my hotel friend. I pointed my finger slyly to her, never dreaming that he would dare to carry out his pledge; and you may imagine my horror and amazement when he stepped up quickly behind her, and, stooping over, kissed her with a relish that made 'my mouth water' from end to end.

"I expected of course a shriek of terror, and then a row generally, and a knock-down; but astonishment succeeded astonishment when I saw her return the kisses with compound interest.

"Quick as a flash he turned to me, and said, 'Now, Sir, it is your turn;' pointing to a hideously ugly, wrinkled old woman who sat in the seat behind.

"Oh, you must excuse me! you must excuse me!" I exclaimed. 'I'm sold this time. I give up. Do tell me who you have been kissing.'

"Well," said he, 'since you are a man of so much taste, and such quick perception, I'll let you off.'

"And we all burst into a general peal of laughter as he said, 'This is my wife! I have been waiting here for her. I knew that was a safe proposition.'

"He told the story to his wife, who looked tenfold sweeter as she heard it.

"Before we reached Chicago we exchanged cards, and I discovered that my genial companion was a popular Episcopalian preacher of Chicago whose name I had frequently heard.

"Whenever I go to Chicago I always go to hear him, and a heartier, more natural, and more eloquent preacher it is hard to find.

"He was then but a young man; he is now well known as one of the ablest divines of the Episcopal denomination in the West."

"'HENTZ,' who is slightly blacker than the 'ace of spades,' enjoyed last session the enviable position of waiter to a table of boarding-school ladies, among whom one bright particular star, Lizzie C——, commanded his best services. His fellow-servants soon rallied him upon his devotion; and Richmond informed him, in a taunting manner, that his lips were so thick that Miss Lizzie could ride upon them to Memphis.

"'Indeed no, she wouldn't,' retorted Hentz, quickly, 'for I would just laugh and spill her off!' And 'Rich' was silenced, if not convinced."

"In 1859 the steamer Messenger left New Orleans with banners flying, music sweet, and smoke plenty, for Camden, on the Ouachita River. She was crowded with passengers, and among them was 'mine frient,' Mr. Stewart. Now he was one of those few who were happy in the enjoyment of any good thing, provided some one else paid the piper. On this occasion he had an opportunity of enjoying this idiosyncrasy, as he supposed, free from annoyance. Never did the band play without our appreciating audience. Night or day Stewart was by them.

"Now it so fell out by the way that there was a witty gentleman on board named Traylor, who, being somewhat disgusted with the conduct of the aforesaid Stewart, and giving the wink to officers and passengers, approached S., paper in hand, and thus accosted him:

"'Well, Mr. Stewart, I am now making up money to pay the band. They have enlivened the otherwise monotonous trip by their cheering music, and having faithfully performed their duty, we wish to do ours toward them—come, let's have a quarter.'—'Who,' Mr. Traylor, 'who "give a quarter?" Not me; for I had nothing to do with hiring them.' 'True, you did not; but you have enjoyed their music—none better—and you certainly do not begrudge the "two bits."'

"'Look here, Mr. Traylor, you're jokin'; for I never did like music. Oh, ef I liked music, I'd be first to pay; for I ain't in favor of a feller's hearin' a thing he likes 'thout payin' for it.'

"'But why did you hang 'round the players if you did not like their music?'

"'Me! Did—I—s—t—a—n—d round 'em? Well, yes, a leetle; but not to hear them 'ternal horns. I thout I knowed one of 'em; but I wasn't list'nin'. No, Sir; I dislike music.'

"'It's only "two bits," Mr. Stewart,' persisted his tormentor. Stewart's face grew red, his eyes swam in tears, and in the fullness of the soul he exclaimed, 'I've paid my 10s. passage-money, and I'll go to Captain Kirk, and ef I have that tax to pay he'll lose 250 bales next year sartin!' And in deep despair he ascended to the Captain's deck.

"'Captain Kirk was posted, and loving a 'good one,' put on a grave look while Stewart told his wrongs, in a nasal tone full of agony. 'Well,' said the Captain, 'I have nothing to do with the boat's finance; maybe the clerk will help you out.'

"On the arrival of Stewart at the clerk's office a crowd of passengers stood awaiting his return. At the hall door he was met by Traylor, who kindly led him to the balusters, and holding a five-cent piece over the water exclaimed, 'Now, Stewart, is your chance!' But before the invitation to jump overboard for a five-cent was concluded Stewart bolted, amidst the prolonged laughter and jeers of the crowd.

"During the remainder of the trip he kept his room, and when he left the steamer at his own landing two cheers were extended to the man who didn't like music.

"Stewart is very wealthy, but to this day he feels like leaving when music is spoken of."

"DURING the last political war a certain John Toppin, but who is generally known by the name of Judge Toppin, became a candidate for the office of Coroner of New Castle County, and employed a simple country fellow to distribute his bills. Among other places, he sent him to the county town (New Castle). In due time Tom Wilson returned, and, upon being questioned by his employer, alleged that he had put up a bill in each hotel in the place, naming at the same time the landlords, calling one 'Push's Tavern.' 'Why,' remarked the Judge, 'there is no one of that name that keeps tavern in New Castle!' 'Yes, there is,' replied Tom, 'for I seen his name painted on the door.'"

DR. FOWLER, of Boston, was up in Exeter delivering a lecture on his hobby of a science. Among his audience was Bill Strothers, a wag, who has a habit of stuttering that makes even his dull speeches comical. In the midst of his lecture Dr. Fowler was driving away at his opponents, and exclaimed,

"When doctors differ, who shall decide?"

Pausing emphatically, as if waiting for an answer, Bill broke the silence by crying out,

"L-l-leave it to a m-m-man of s-s-sense!"

"THE following inscription is copied from a tombstone in the old burying-ground at Augusta, Maine:

"Here lies, till the general resurrection, William, son of Henry and Tabitha Sewall, who, after nine days' violent seizure of a canker rash, calmly resigned his infant life to the King of Terrors, June 17, 1787, aged five months and seventeen days. He cometh forth like a flower, and is cut down."

"THERE was a public sale of cigars at the auction house of Messrs. Flint, in Front Street. The auctioneer was dwelling on one of the finest lots of 'imported,' and according to custom was passing a brand among the company to allow those who saw proper to judge of the quality by smoking. A man near me, with a florid complexion, curved nose, bright black eyes, and withal rather a respectable representation of the used-up man of the world who had not abused himself much, took two of the last three; the remaining one being handed to me. With the greatest care he wrapped them in a piece of paper, and placed them in the watch-pocket of his vest. I inspected the one I took, cut off the end, and was about reaching for a light when a hand tapped me lightly on the shoulder. Turning, I beheld my red-faced friend smiling very graciously, and holding out his hand he asked, with the utmost politeness,

"Will you allow me to look at that cigar, Sir?"

"Certainly, Sir," I replied, handing it to him.

"He examined it very minutely, turning it over and over, placing it occasionally to his nasal organ by way of variety. When my patience was nearly exhausted, and I was about demanding it of him, he reached for a candle, placed the cigar complacently between his lips, and commenced to light and smoke it with the greatest expression of satisfaction I ever saw pictured on a countenance. I must confess I felt somewhat ruffled; but determined to show him that I did not appreciate his 'good joke,' I turned my back to him, and endeavored to devote my attention to the sale. To my astonishment my pleasant neighbor again touched me on the shoulder. I met his gaze with any thing but pleasure depicted on my countenance.

"Sir!" said I.

"He smiled, and looking me full in the face all the time, remarked, with a patronizing air that made me almost feel as if I was guilty of rudeness toward him,

"A very fine cigar, Sir. I haven't smoked a cigar like that in a twelvemonth, Sir. See what a beautiful ash! If I was buying cigars that would be the brand for me, Sir.'

"'Yes, Sir,' said I, completely floored. And touching his hat with a 'Good-morning, Sir,' he departed. I hastily inquired of several who he was, but none knew him; and as we can not tell how soon any of us may be 'short' in these war times, I forgive him."

"ONE of my little twins said to me the other day (being not quite three years old), after some dispute with her brother to which I was not listening:

"'Papa, papa! don't I wear a toat?"

"'Why, no, daughter; little boys wear coats.'

"'Yes, but I wear a toat.'

"'What, little girls wear coats!"

"'Yes, papa' (and oh what a twinkle in her little eyes!), 'petti-toats.' Papa gave in instanter."

"MR. DRAWER,—Some time during the first quarter of the present century it happened that, in that portion of the State of New York known as the Mohawk Valley, there lived a fine old well-to-do Dutch farmer, who took it into his head that at the place near his house where two ways met would be a good place for a tavern, and as he had always more cider and sauer-kraut than he could well get through with in his own family, thought it would be an excellent way of turning the same into money to dispense it, with other appropriate condiments, to such as would no doubt patronize his house.

"The house was built, and himself and wife duly installed as host and hostess.

"Very soon the fame of their house and their fare spread far and wide, and the old gentleman sooner than he expected found himself on the high road to fortune and to fame. His popularity was unbounded, and his opinions on all subjects became the law in all that section, until at length his neighbors insisted upon his fitness to dispense justice as well as juleps, and accordingly elected him justice of the peace.

"Almost the first business in this line was the issue of a summons in behalf of one of his neighbors and patrons in an action of debt against a person living a few miles away, and who, it may be remarked, was not either a patron of the landlord nor yet one of his constituents. We would not intimate that the decision in the case was at all affected by this fact: our duty is merely that of the historian, and we will proceed with the story.

"On the parties appearing before the Justice he looked sternly at the defendant, and said, 'Sir, I am sorry that we should meet for the first time under such painful circumstances. Sir, you are sued.'

"'Why, yes, Sir,' the defendant replied. 'I believe I am; but I shall hope to introduce witnesses who will swear—'

"'Schtup, schtup!' said the Justice. 'I will not have any schweearing in dish court, nor any tam lies neider. Vot did he sue you for if you didn't owe him? I gives shudgment for de blaintiff.'

"Whereupon the Justice left his seat, simply remarking, 'De court ish done; ant I musht quick make dwenty chulips, ordered by de blaintiff just so quick ash the court wash done.'

In a spirit of profound resignation, and making the best of their troubles, two newly-made widowers met for the first time after their affliction, to console each other. With a deep sigh, one of them said,

"Well may I bewail my loss, for I had so few differences with my dear wife, that the last day of my married life was as happy as the first."

"There I am ahead of you, my friend," said the other, "for the last day of mine was happier!"

"THERE seems to be a propensity in all new countries to the use of intoxicating drinks. Kansas was no exception. One of our politicians was found at two o'clock in the morning in front of the hotel addressing the horse-post in the most earnest manner.

"Hullo, Smith," said the discoverer, "what are you about?"

"Hush, don't you see? This is Councilman Brown. I'm arguing with him for a free ferry; he's a little c-corned, and don't say nothing; but I'll talk him over, and it'll be the making of Omaha."

"Captain Smith was not a regular soaker, and when he did take a drop too much disliked to own up. Being caught in this way once, he started, as he said, for home. I saw him take the opposite direction, out into the prairie. I watched his winding course till he was almost lost in the distance, then started after him.

"Where are you going, Captain?" I asked when I had overtaken him.

"Going? I'm going home."

"But this is not the way. There's your house." And I turned him square around, and showed him the light from the window.

"He straightened himself up, and putting on a look of the profoundest gravity, surveyed the position.

"I know that well enough," he said. "I ain't drunk—not a bit—I know the way; I just deviated a little to smoke out my cigar."

PERHAPS in no place in the world are there greater extremes of society shown than in Kentucky; certainly none more elegant, intelligent, or refined, and perhaps none more crude and uncultivated—though through all there runs the same generous hospitality. And this difference seems to run coincident with the surface of the country. In those beautiful garden spots of Bourbon, Fayette, and Scott counties you may with certainty depend on the finest society in the world. But pass into the hilly white-oak regions of the rivers, and you equally know the people. It has been the custom, time out of mind, for opposing candidates for office to canvass their district in company, and discuss together their issues before the people. In the good regions the candidates discuss principles, but in the white-oak they take other means of convincing or persuading the people. On one occasion two very distinguished opposing candidates offered themselves for Congress from the same district—both since deceased—W. W. Southgate, Whig, and John W. Tibbatts, Democrat. Of course they canvassed together. Both were talented, accomplished, and witty, and both knew well how to please the people. Personally they were friends and relatives. In the intelligent districts they battled like intellectual giants.

In the poor regions they fired wit at each other, and made the people laugh. In one of these places they had been peculiarly happy in their remarks, and the people greatly enjoyed it. When they left, sentiment was about equally divided, and the even cry of "Hurrah, Southgate!" "Hurrah, Tibbatts!" was shouted from the harmonious throats of even parties. Both candidates mounted their horses, and left together for their next appointment; but the people, determined to have a good time, remained to finish the enjoyment with a dance. As the opposing aspirants slowly left the scene of mirth each longed for the finishing touch in moulding political sentiment, and each distrusted the other. When they had gone a mile, Tibbatts discovered he had left something at the meeting, and, asking Southgate to wait for him, rode back. Southgate, distrusting him, waited a while, and then also returned, where his suspicions were verified; for there he found Tibbatts playing the fiddle, and the people dancing. Sentiment was all on one side; it was all "Hurrah for Tibbatts!" He had carried the day. (Both played with equal skill, but Tibbatts only left-handed.) Southgate, mortified at his loss, determined to regain his position. Making his acknowledgments, he told the people that with their leave he would play a second to his brother Tibbatts's delightful music, and with a bow he played his best, and soon divided again the people. Throwing aside his violin, he remarked, he hated fiddling, but by their leave he would join in the dance. In that he had no equal, and soon brought the unanimous "hurrahs" for Southgate. He had triumphed, and Tibbatts was vanquished.

Before filling their next appointment Southgate was taken sick, and Tibbatts, after waiting two weeks, continued his canvass alone. When recovered, Southgate followed. He found his rival had stolen the hearts of the people, and it was an up-hill business with poor Southgate. In one place, like that mentioned, Tibbatts had pleased them so well—telling stories and jokes, and playing for them—that they utterly refused to hear Southgate. They said Tibbatts was the man for them, that they wanted no better, and Southgate had better go home; they wouldn't vote for him, etc. He told them that Tibbatts was a dear friend and relative of his, and a noble fellow—no better man was to be found (Southgate seems like an honest fellow, said they; let us hear him). "And, fellow-citizens," said Southgate, "if I can't go to Congress without abusing my dear friend Tibbatts, I'll stay at home forever." (Hurrah for Southgate! Good! He ought to go to Congress too.) "Why, fellow-citizens! he is the most talented man in Kentucky; and for accomplishments, he hasn't his equal in the world!" (We know; we heard him; he played for us. Hurrah for Tibbatts!) "But here, my friends, is one thing I can not approve of in my dear brother: he plays better left-handed than most musicians with their right! But if you only heard him right-handed, he would bend the trees with his sweet tones. What I blame in him is, that when he is among nice people whom he likes he plays right-handed; but when he is among ignorant people for whom he has no regard, whom he thinks jackasses, he says any thing is good enough for them, and so he plays for them left-handed!" (What! Why he played left-handed here! Does he mean to insinuate we are ignorant jackasses? D—n Tibbatts; away with him! Southgate is my man! Hurrah for Southgate! etc.) When the election came Tibbatts got but sixteen votes in that precinct.

REV. DR. B—— lately gave this pulpit notice:

"This congregation is respectfully invited to attend the funeral of the only surviving son of Mr. Thomas Miller, to-morrow, at two o'clock P.M."

AFTER SUPPER.

"Miss Jones, will you favor me for the next waltz?"

"I should be most happy, Mr. Brown; but I'm full."

"J. B. M——, a well-known brewer in a small way, near this city," writes a Philadelphia friend, "never studied book-keeping, and has always kept his accounts with his customers in chalk on the back of his shop door. A few days since, while out on business, his wife (careful body), in cleaning up, wiped them all out. He was in great trouble as to what he should do in the dilemma. Says she, 'Can't you remember the most of them? Try if you can't.' He commenced, and put down a number of names with the amounts to each. 'Do you think,' says she, 'you have charged them enough yet?' 'I don't know about the enough,' says he; 'but I have put down better men, by a long shot, than I had there before.'"

A YOUNG lady writes: "Will you allow me to give you the correct version of a story which was spoiled one day by the process of insertion into your Drawer? I ought to know it, for, pars fui, I was a part of it; and, by the same token, I 'can't abear to see' the only pun I ever perpetrated come to grief. 'Peduncks,' indeed!

"What is the learned name for the foot-stalks of flowers, Cousin Mary?" asked a young gentleman.

"Peduncles," was the reply.

"Oh, yes," said he, 'ped-uncles; I had forgotten what kind of "uncles" they are.'

"They are ped-uncles," said his cousin; 'but it isn't of much consequence, for only ped-aunts call them so!'"

HERE followeth a story for the Drawer, whereof the hero is a four-year-old Iowan.

"Little Owie" was saying his prayers one night during his father's absence, and his mother suggested, at the close, this additional petition: "God bless dear papa, and bring him safe home." "God bless dear papa," the youngster repeated, "and, mamma, why can't papa come home in the stage?" The requisite instructions were given, but were, probably, not fully understood, for, the next night, he added, of his own accord, "God bless dear papa, bring him safe home, and leave the stages behind!"

Two little girls had gone to sleep, as usual, in the same bed. Sarah had pushed and kicked in her sleep till Mary was almost driven out. She called, "Sarah, lie along, you've crowded me clear on to the edge of the bed." Sarah was half asleep, and fretted out, "Can't you stick and hang till morning?"

"Oh yes! It's all very well to say 'Excuse me,' but when a man's covered with ice cream and jelly, and things that won't brush off, and has a partner engaged for the German, it's confounded hard to grin, and say, 'It's no consequence.'"

THE BRIDAL TOILET is quite simple, the chief trimming being composed of a berthe and loops of pearl beads and flowers. The wreath is of orange-flowers, with white moss-rose buds. These are also arranged in clusters on the shoulders and scarf, which is of white taffeta. The dress is also of taffeta.

The principal feature of the UNDRESS COSTUME is the jacket—an article the popularity of which seems to increase instead of diminishing. This is composed of mauve-colored merino, with a passanterie of velvet. The lace frill is a marked characteristic of the one which we present.

the deserts of Africa, an expedition to the North Pole, or an attempt to reach the moon by a new route, can be regarded as an achievement worthy of particular note, unless it be attended by circumstances of unusual personal interest. To be a lively and entertaining tourist is the highest eminence to which a moderately ambitious man can aspire. Even that is beyond the aim of my present narrative. After twenty years' experience of travel by land and sea, I now frankly admit that the governing motive of my wanderings is to get out of one country and through another with the least possible delay. The incidents and impressions gathered up in the course of such a harum-scarum career are, at best, nothing more than the husks and burs that stick to the coat of a merry vagabond who lies down in a haystack by the road-side to pass the night, and goes whistling on his way in the morning for lack of thought. As such, these rough notes of Norwegian adventure are offered to the reader.

Last year we had the pleasure of a ramble together among the silver mines of Washoe. I don't know how it may be with others, but, for my part, I got enough of that. An agency that deals exclusively in paper, and corresponds on long credits, is not a lucrative investment of time and labor. Failing to dispose of my Washoe stocks in Frankfort-on-the-Maine, I proceeded, in a very depressed state of mind, on a pedestrian tour through Germany, in the hope of being able to walk away from the disappointment. But here again was a new trouble. There is not a state in Germany large enough to hold a man of active disposition. It is utterly impossible for a Californian to "spread out" in such a complicated and thickly-settled country, where every way that he wishes to go is a "VERBOTENER WEG." A few weeks' experience of police regulations, forbidden ways, ceremonies, and restrictions filled my mind with horrible sensations of law and order. I felt like one who was going about on his parole, but liable at any moment to commit some crime against his will. My joints began to creak, and a thick rust was gathering all over me, when, in sheer desperation, I broke away, and made a dash down through France, Spain, and Portugal. A whirl through Algeria restored the circulation of my blood; and during the present summer I refreshed myself by a glance at the steppes of Russia from the Kremlin of Moscow, and disposed of Esthonia and Finland in a couple of weeks. A dreary pilgrimage of eight days through Sweden brought me to Gottenburg, where, for the first time since my arrival in Europe, I really began to enjoy life. Not that Gottenburg is a very lively or fascinating place, for it abounds in abominations and smells of fish, and is inhabited by a race of men whose chief aim in life appears to be directed toward pickled herring, mackerel, and cod-fish. There was much in it, however, to remind me of that home-land on the Pacific for which my troubled heart was pining. A grand fair was going on. All the peasants from the surrounding country were gathered in, and I met very few of them, at the close of evening, who were not reeling drunk. Besides they chewed tobacco—an additional sign of civilization to which I had long been unaccustomed.

At Gottenburg, in the absence of something better to do, I made up my mind to visit Norway. The steamer from Copenhagen touches on her way to Christiania. She has an unpleasant habit of waking people up in the middle of the night; and I was told that if I wanted to make sure of getting on board I must sit up and watch for her. This is abominable in a mercantile community; but what can be expected of a people whose noblest aspirations are wrapped up in layers of dried cod-fish? By contract with the Kellner at my hotel the difficulty was finally arranged. For the sum of two marks, Swedish currency, he agreed to notify me of the approach of the Copenhagen steamer. I thought he was doing all this solely on my account, but afterward discovered that he had made contracts at a quarter the price with about a dozen others.

It was very late in the night, or very early in the morning, when I was roused up, and duly put on board the steamer. Of the remainder of that night the least said the better. A cabinful of sea-sick passengers is not a pleasant subject of contemplation. When the light of day found its way into our dreary abode of misery I went on deck. The weather was thick, and nothing was to be seen in any direction but a rough, chopping sea and flakes of drifting fog. A few doleful-looking tourists were searching for the land through their opera-glasses. They appeared to be sorry they ever undertook such a stormy and perilous voyage, and evidently had misgivings that they might never again see their native country. Some of them peeped over the bulwarks from time to time, with a faint hope, perhaps, of seeing something new in that direction; but from the singular noises they made, and the convulsive motions of their bodies, I had reason to suspect they were heaving some very heavy sighs at their forlorn fate. The waiters were continually running about with cups of coffee, which served to fortify the stomachs of these hardy adventurers against sea-sickness. I may here mention as a curious fact, that in all my travels I have rarely met a sea-going gentleman who could be induced to acknowledge that he suffered the least inconvenience from the motion of the vessel. A headache, a fit of indigestion, the remains of a recent attack of gout, a long-standing rheumatism, a bilious colic to which he had been subject for years, a sudden and unaccountable shock of vertigo, a disorganized condition of the liver—something, in short, entirely foreign to the known and recognized laws of motion disturbed his equilibrium; but rarely an out-and-out case of sea-sickness. That is a weakness of human nature fortunately confined to the ladies. Indeed, I don't know what the gentler sex would do if it were not for the kindness of Providence in exempting the ruder portion of humanity from this unpleasant accompaniment of sea-life, only it unfortunately happens that the gentlemen are usually afflicted with some other dire and disabling visitation about the same time.

Toward noon the fog broke away, and we sighted the rocky headlands of the Christiania Fjord. In a few hours more we were steaming our way into this magnificent sheet of water at a dashing rate, and the decks were crowded with a gay and happy company. No more the pangs of despised love, indigestion, gout, and bilious colic disturbed the gentlemen of this lively party; no more the fair ladies of Hamburg and Copenhagen hid themselves away in their state-rooms, and called in vain to their natural protectors for assistance. The sea was smooth; the sun shot forth through the whirling rain-clouds his brightest August beams. All along the shores of the Fjord, the rocky points, jutting abruptly from the water, rose like embattled towers, crowned with a variegated covering of moss, grim and hoary with the wild winds and scathing winters of the north. Beautiful little valleys, ravines, and slopes of woodland of such rich and glittering green opened out to us on either side, as we swept past the headlands, that the vision was dazzled with the profusion and variety of the charms bestowed upon this wilderness of romantic scenery. A group of fishermen's huts, behind a bold and jagged point of rocks—a rude lugger or fishing-smack, manned by a hardy crew of Norskmen, rough and weather-beaten as the ocean monsters of their stormy coast, gliding out of some nook among the rocky inlets—here the cozy little cottage of some well-to-do sea-captain, half fisher, half farmer, with a gang of white-headed little urchins running out over the cliffs to take a peep at the passing steamer, the frugal matron standing in the door, resplendent in her red woolen petticoat and fanciful head-dress, knitting a pair of stockings, or some such token of love, for her absent lord—there, a pretty little village, with a church, a wharf, and a few store-houses, shrinking back behind the protecting wing of some huge and rugged citadel of rocks, the white cottages glistening pleasantly in the rays of the evening sun, and the smoke curling up peacefully over the surrounding foliage, and floating off till it vanished in the rich glow of the sky—all so calm, so dreamy in colors and outline that the imagination is absolutely bewildered with the varied feast of beauties; such are the characteristic features of this noble sheet of water.

The Christiania Fjord is one of the largest in Norway. Commencing at Frederikstad on the one side and Sandesund on the other, it extends into the interior a distance of seventy or eighty miles, making one of the finest natural harbors in the world. The water is deep, and the shores are almost rock-bound. In many places the navigation is somewhat intricate, owing to the numerous rocky islands and rugged headlands; but the Norwegian pilots are thoroughly experienced in their business, and know every foot of the way as familiarly as they know their own snug little cabins, perched up among the rocks.

THE ISLANDS.

Touching at the picturesque little town of Horten on the left, we discharged some passengers and took in others; after which we proceeded without further incident to the town of Drobak on the right. Here the Fjord is narrow, presenting something the appearance of a river. A group of fortifications on the cliffs protects this passage. The view on leaving Drobak is inexpressibly beautiful. The Fjord widens gradually till it assumes the form of an immense lake, the shores of which rise abruptly from the water, covered with forests of pine. Moss-covered rocks, green wooded islands, and innumerable fishing craft, give variety and animation to the scene. Range upon range of wild and rugged mountains extend back through the dim distance on either side till their vague and fanciful outlines are mingled with the clouds. Nothing can exceed the richness and beauty of the atmospheric tints. A golden glow, mingled with deep shades of purple, illuminates the sky. In the distance the snowy peaks of the vast interior ranges of mountains glisten in the evening sun. The deep green of the foliage which decks the islands and promontories of the Fjord casts its reflected hues upon the surface of the sleeping waters. In the valleys, which from time to time open out as we sweep along on our way, rich yellow fields of grain make a brilliant and striking contrast to the sombre tints of the pine forests in the rear.

It was long after sunset, but still light enough to enjoy all the beauties of the Fjord, when we saw before us the numerous and picturesque villas that adorn the neighborhood of Christiania.

Passing the fine old castle of Aggershuus on the left, we rounded a point and then came in full view of the town and harbor.

Surely there is nothing like this in the whole world, I thought, as I gazed for the first time upon this charming scene. The strange old-fashioned buildings, the castle, the palace on the hill-top, the shipping at the wharves, the gardens on every slope, the varied outlines of the neighboring cliffs and hills, covered with groves and green slopes of rich sward; every nook glimmering with beautiful villas; the whole reflected in the glowing waters that sweep through the maze of islands and headlands in every direction; can there be any thing more beautiful in all the world?

The steamer was soon hauled alongside the wharf, where a crowd of citizens was gathered to see us land. Here again was a scene characteristic of Norway. No hurry, no confusion, no shouting and clamoring for passengers; but all quiet, primitive, and good-humored. How different from a landing at New York or San Francisco! Three or four sturdy hack-drivers stood smoking their pipes, watching the proceedings with an air of philosophical indifference truly refreshing. Fathers, mothers, sisters, brothers, and cousins of various parties on board, waved their handkerchiefs and nodded affectionately to their friends and relatives, but kept their enthusiasm within limits till the plank was put out, when they came on board and kissed and hugged every body of their acquaintance in the most affectionate manner. The officers of the customs, good easy souls! also came on board, books in hand, and made a kind of examination of the baggage. It was neither severe nor formal, and I felt an absolute friendship for the chief officer on account of the jolly manner in which he looked at me, and asked me if I had any thing contraband in my little knapsack. I offered to open it, but with a wave of his hand he chalked a pass upon it and I walked ashore. For the first time in my life I here felt the inconvenience of not being persecuted by porters and hack-drivers. The few who were on hand seemed to be particular friends or relatives of parties on board, and were already engaged. I walked up the queer, grass-grown old streets, looking around in the dim twilight for a hotel; and after stumbling into half a dozen odd-looking shops and store-houses, contrived to make my way to the Hotel Victoria, said to be the best in Christiania.

As it is no part of my purpose to write a book on Christiania, I shall only say that for the next three days I rambled about enjoying all the objects of interest in this quaint northern city—the churches, the museum, the castle, the palace, the ups and downs of the streets, the market-places, wharves, and gardens, and the magic beauties of the neighborhood. There is a plainness and simplicity about the people of Christiania, a good-humor of expression, a kindliness of manner and natural politeness that impressed me very favorably. The society is said to be genial and cultivated. I have no doubt of the fact, though my stay was too short to afford an opportunity of making many acquaintances.

At the Hotel Victoria I met Ole Bull, who was on a tour through his native land. He sat near me at the table d'hôte, and I had an opportunity of noticing the changes which time has made in his appearance. The last time I had seen him was in Columbus, Ohio, in 1844. He was then in the very prime of life, slender and graceful, yet broad of shoulder and powerful of limb; with light straight hair, clear blue eyes, and a healthy northern complexion. He is now quite altered, and I am not sure that I would have recognized him had he not been pointed out to me. In form he is much stouter, though not so erect as he was in former years. His hair is sprinkled with gray. He retains the same noble cast of features, and deep, dreamy, and genial expression of eye as of old, but his complexion is sallow, and his face is marked by lines of care. There is something sad and touching in his manner. I do not know what his misfortunes in America may have to do with his present dejected expression, but he seems to me to be a man who has met with great disappointments in life. Although I sat beside him at the table, and might have claimed acquaintance as one of his most ardent American admirers, I was deterred from speaking to him by something peculiar in his manner—not coldness, for that is not in his nature—but an apparent withdrawal from the outer world into himself. A feeling that it might be intrusive to address him kept me silent. I afterward sent him a few lines, expressing a desire to renew my early acquaintance with him; but he left town while I was absent on an excursion to the Frogner-assen, and, much to my regret, I missed seeing him.

COAST OF NORWAY.

APPROACH TO CHRISTIANIA.

The population of Christiania is something over 40,000, and of late years it has become quite a place of resort for tourists on the way to the interior of Norway. The houses built since the fire of 1858, which destroyed a considerable portion of the town, are large and substantial, built of stone and covered with cement. The streets for the most part are broad and roughly paved. Very little of characteristic style is observable in the costume of the citizens. Plainness of dress, simple and primitive manners, and good-nature, are the leading traits of the Norwegians. Christiania is the modern capital of Norway, and was founded by Christian IV. of Denmark, near the site of the ancient capital of Osloe, which was founded in 1058 by King Harold Haardraade. Some of the old buildings still remain in a state of good preservation; but the chief interest of the city consists in its castle, university, library, and museum of northern antiquities. A traveler from the busy cities of America is struck with the quiet aspect of the streets, and the almost death-like silence that reigns in them after dark. In many places the sidewalks are overgrown with grass, and the houses are green with moss. Stagnation broods in the very atmosphere. Christiania is in all respects the antipodes of San Francisco. A Californian could scarcely endure an existence in such a place for six weeks. He would go stark mad from sheer inanity. Beautiful as the scenery is, and pleasantly as the time passed during my brief sojourn, it was not without a feeling of relief that I took my departure in the cars for Eidsvold.

The railway from Christiania to Eidsvold is the only one yet in operation in Norway. It was a pretty heavy undertaking, considering the rough character of the country and the limited resources of the people; but it was finally completed, and is now considered a great feature in Norwegian civilization. Some idea may be formed of the backwardness of facilities for internal communication throughout this country, when I mention the fact that beyond the distance of forty miles to Eidsvold and the Lake of Miösen, the traveler is dependent upon such vehicles as he takes with him, unless he chooses to incur the risk of procuring a conveyance at Hammar or Lillehammer. The whole country is a series of rugged mountains, narrow valleys, desolate Fjelds, rivers, and Fjords. There are no regular communications between one point and another on any of the public highways; and the interior districts are supplied with such commodities as they require from the sea-board solely by means of heavy wagons, sledges, boats, and such other primitive modes of transportation as the nature of the country and the season may render most available.

Like every thing else in Norway, the cars on the Eidsvold railway have rather more of a rustic than a metropolitan appearance. They are extremely simple in construction and rural in decoration; and as for the road, it may be very good compared with a trail over the Sierra Nevada Mountains, but it is absolutely frightful to travel over it by steam. Three hours is the allowance of time for forty miles. If I remember correctly, we stretched it out to four, on account of a necessary stoppage on the way, caused by the tumbling down of some rocks from an overhanging cliff. The jolting is enough to dislocate one's vertebræ; and I had a vague feeling all the time during the trip that the locomotive would jump off the track, and dash her brains out against some of the terrible boulders of granite that stood frowning at us on either side as we worried our way along from station to station.

It was nearly dark when we came to a saw-mill by the roadside. The scenery is pretty all the way from Christiania, but not very striking till the train passes the narrow gorge in which the saw-mill is situated, where there is a tunnel of a few hundred feet that penetrates a bluff on the left. Emerging from this we are close upon the charming little village of Eidsvold, one of the loveliest spots in this land of beauty. A few minutes more brought us to the station-house, where the railway ends. Here we found ourselves at a good hotel, picturesquely situated on the bank of the Wormen, a river flowing from the Miösen Lake.

At eleven o'clock on a fine Sunday forenoon I took my departure from Eidsvold on board one of the little lake steamers. These vessels are well managed, and not inconveniently arranged, but they are so very small that on particular occasions, when there is an unusual pressure of travelers, it is difficult to find room for a seat. Owing to the facilities afforded by the railway from Christiania, an excursion to Lillehammer is the most popular way of passing a Sunday during the summer months; and this being the height of the season, the crowd was unusually great. It also happened that two hundred soldiers, who had served out their time, were returning to their homes in the interior; so that there was no lack of company on board. If the soldiers were somewhat lively and frolicsome, it was nothing more than natural under the circumstances. A good many were intoxicated—at the idea, perhaps, of getting home once more; and their songs and merry shouts of laughter kept every body in a good humor. I am unable to account for a curious fact, which I may as well mention in this connection. Whenever the authorities of any country through which I chance to travel have occasion to send their troops from one point to another, they invariably send them upon the same boat or in the same railway train upon which I have the fortune to take passage. There must be something military in my appearance, or some natural propensity for bloodshed in my nature, that causes this affinity to exist between us, for it has happened altogether too often to be accidental. The King of Sicily, some years ago, sent a party of troops to keep me company to Palermo. Subsequently the King of Greece favored me with a large military convoy to one of the Greek islands. After that I had an independent supervision of various bodies of Turkish soldiers on board of different vessels within the Turkish dominions. Recently Napoleon III. sent down by the same train of cars, from Paris to Marseilles, about four hundred of his troops for Algiers. Being detained at Marseilles by some unforeseen circumstance, I had the pleasure of seeing these men shipped off on the first steamer. I took passage in the next. By some extraordinary fatality, for which there is no accounting, there were upward of five hundred additional troops shipped on this vessel. It was a consolation to know that a storm was brewing, and that they would soon be all sea-sick. Before we got out of the Gulf of Lyons I could have slain every man of them with a pocket-knife. It was therefore with a spirit of resignation that I saw the Norwegian soldiers come on board at Eidsvold. Fate had ordained that we should travel together, and it was no use to complain. Besides, I liked their looks. As stalwart, blue-eyed, jovial, and hearty-looking a set of fellows they were as ever I saw in any country—men of far higher intelligence and physical capacity than the average of soldiers in Continental Europe. That these were the right sort of men to fight for their country there could be no doubt. I have rarely seen finer troops any where than those of Norway.

The Miösen Lake is sixty-three miles in length, extending from Minde to Lillehammer, and varies in width from five to ten miles. The broadest part is opposite to Hamar, nearly at the centre, and not far from the Island of Helgeö. The shores embrace some of the finest farming lands in Norway; and after passing Minde the sloping hill-sides are dotted with pretty little farm-houses, and beautifully variegated with fields and orchards. In many places, so numerous are the cottages of the thrifty farmers hung in this favored region, that they resemble a continuous village, extending for many miles along the hill-sides. There is not much in the natural aspect of the country to attract the lover of bold mountain scenery. The beauties of the shores of Miösen are of a gentle and pastoral character, and become monotonous after a few hours. Near Hamar, on the right, there are the ruins of an old cathedral, burned and plundered by the Swedes in 1567.

Apart from the ordinary interest of the Miösen Lake, arising from the quiet pastoral character of its shores, it possessed a peculiar charm to me owing to the fact that, in 1755, when the great earthquake occurred at Lisbon, its waters rose twenty feet, and suddenly retreated. Only a few months previously I had visited the city of Lisbon, and stood upon the very spot where, in six minutes, over sixty thousand souls had been buried beneath the ruins. I was now, so to speak, following up an earthquake.

It was late at night when we arrived at the pretty little town of Lillehammer, at the head of the lake. Leaving the steamer here, I found myself, for the first time, beyond the limits of the English language. A Norwegian with whom I had become acquainted on board the boat was kind enough to walk up town with me and show me the way to the post station, where I had some difficulty in procuring accommodations, owing to the number of recent arrivals.

The town of Lillehammer contains twelve or fifteen hundred inhabitants, whose principal industry consists in the lumber business. Immense rafts are towed down the lake every day by the returning steamers, and carried by rail from Eidsvold to Christiania. The logs are drifted down the Logen River from the interior, and cut up at Lillehammer and Eidsvold. Such as are designed for spars are dressed and shipped at the latter place. There are many other points on the lake from which supplies of timber are also transferred to Christiania; so that between farming, fishing, and lumbering the inhabitants of this region make out a very comfortable subsistence, and generally own the lands upon which they reside. Many of them are wealthy—for this part of the world.

Lillehammer is prettily situated on an eminence, and consists of log and frame houses, presenting much the appearance of a Western lake village in the United States. The view of the Miösen and its verdant shores is very fine from the top of the hill. It was ten o'clock at night when I arrived, although the sky was still lighted up with a purple glow from the departed sun. Something of the wonderful scenic beauties of the country were still visible. A party of French tourists, who had come to Norway to make a three days' visit, set off at this late hour to see the torrent which breaks from the side of the mountain, about half a mile beyond the town. I was solicited to join them; but my passion for sight-seeing was rather obscured by the passion of hunger and thirst. At such times I am practical enough to prefer a good supper to the best waterfall in the world. Waterfalls can be postponed. Hunger must be promptly satisfied. Thirst makes one dry. A distant view of falling water is a poor substitute for a glass of good ale. There is no fear that any ordinary cataract will run itself out before morning.

This was my first experience of a post station, and very pleasant I found it. The inns of Norway are plain, cheap, and comfortable; not very elegant in appearance, but as good in all respects as a plain traveler could desire. I had a capital supper at Lillehammer, consisting of beef-steak, eggs, bread, butter, and coffee—enough to satisfy any reasonable man. The rooms are clean, the beds and bedding neat and comfortable; and the charge for supper, lodging, and breakfast not exceeding an average of about fifty cents. At some of the interior stations I was charged only about twenty-five cents, and in no instance was I imposed upon. The innkeepers are so generally obliging and good-natured that there is very little difficulty in getting along with them. A few words always sufficed to make my wants understood, and the greatest kindness and alacrity were invariably shown in supplying them. But I anticipate my journey.

After a pleasant night's rest I arose bright and early; and here being for the first time thrown completely upon my own resources in the way of language, was obliged to have recourse to my vocabulary to get at the means of asking for breakfast and a horse and cariole. Fancy a lean and hungry man standing before a substantial landlord, trying to spell out a breakfast from his book, in some such way as this:

"Jeg vil Spise [I will eat]!"

"Ya, min Herr!" the landlord politely answers.

"Jeg vil Frokost [I will breakfast]!"

"Ya, min Herr;" and the landlord runs off into a perfect labyrinth of birds, fish, eggs, beef-steak, hot-cakes, and other luxuries, which the inexperienced traveler is vainly attempting to follow up in his book. In despair, he at length calls out:

"Ja! Ja!—that's all right! any thing you say, my fine old gentleman!"

At which the landlord scratches his head, for he doesn't understand precisely what you have selected. Now you take your book and explain, slowly and systematically.

"Kaffee!"

"Ja."

"Ægg!"

"Ja."

"Fisk!"

"Ja."

"Smör og Brod!"

Here the landlord is staggered, and scratches his head again. Smör he gets a glimmering of, but the bread stuns him. You try it in a dozen different ways—broad, breyd, breed, brode, braid. At length a light flashes upon his mind. You want bread! Simple as the word is, and though he pronounces it precisely according to one of your own methods, as you suppose, it is difficult to get the peculiar intonation that renders it intelligible.

"Ja!" And thus you lay the foundation of your breakfast; after which, having progressed so far in the language, there is no great difficulty in asking for a "Heste og Cariole" [a horse and cariole].

A little practice in this way soon enables the traveler to acquire a sufficient knowledge of the language for the ordinary purposes of communication along the road. With a smattering of the German it comes very readily to one who speaks English, being something of a mixture between these two languages. I was really astonished to find how well I could understand it, and make myself understood, in the course of a few days; though candor obliges me to say that if there is any one thing in the world for which nature never intended me it is a linguist.

I was in hopes of finding at Lillehammer a party of tourists bound over the Dovre Fjeld to Trondhjem, of whom I had heard in Christiania. In this I was disappointed. They had started a few days previously. An omnibus was advertised to run as far as Elstad, some thirty-five miles up the valley of Gudbrandsdalen, which would be so much gained on my route. It seemed, however, that it only ran whenever a sufficient number of passengers offered—so I was obliged to give up that prospect.

Nothing can be more characteristic of Norwegian seclusion from the world than the rude means of inland communication between the principal cities. Here was a public highway between two of the most important sea-ports in the country—Christiania and Trondhjem—without as much as a stage to carry passengers. Every traveler has to depend upon his own vehicle, or upon such rude and casual modes of conveyance as he can find at the stations by the wayside. I asked the reason of this backward state of things, and was informed that the amount of travel is insufficient to support any regular stage line. The season for tourists lasts only about three months, and during the remainder of the year very few strangers have occasion to pass over the roads. In winter—which, of course, lasts very long in this latitude—the whole country is covered with snow, and sledges are altogether used, both for purposes of traveling and the transportation of merchandise from the seaboard. The products of the country—such as logs, spars, and boards—are prepared during these months for rafting down the rivers during the spring floods. Once, as I was told, an interesting Englishman had started a regular stage-line from Christiania to Trondhjem, in consequence of the repeated complaints of the traveling public, who objected to the delays to which they were subject; but he was soon obliged to discontinue it for want of patronage. When travelers had a convenient way of getting over they grumbled at being hurried through, and preferred taking the usual conveyances of the country, which afforded them an opportunity of enjoying the scenery and stopping wherever they pleased. People did not come all the way to Norway, they said, to fly through it without seeing any thing of its wonders and beauties. There was some philosophy in this, as well as a touch of human nature. It reminded me of the Frenchman in Paris who lived to be eighty years of age without ever leaving the city; when the King, for the sake of experiment, positively forbid him from doing so during the remainder of his life. The poor fellow was immediately seized with an inordinate desire to see something of the outside world, and petitioned so hard for the privilege of leaving the city, that the King, unable to resist his importunities, granted him the privilege; after which the man was perfectly satisfied, and remained in Paris to the day of his death.

By reference to a copy of the laws on the subject of post-travel, which I had procured in Christiania from a Mr. Bennet, I discovered that the system is singularly complicated and hazardous, as well as a little curious in some of its details. The stations are situated along the road about every eight or ten miles (counted in Norwegian by so many hours). Nothing that we would call a village is to be seen in any part of the interior, unless the few straggling farm-houses occasionally huddled together with a church in the centre may be considered in that light. The stations usually stand alone, in some isolated spot on the wayside; and consist of a little log or frame tavern, a long shambling stable, innumerable odds and ends of cribs, store-houses, and outbuildings, forming a kind of court or stable-yard; a rickety medley of old carts and carioles lying about basking in the sun; a number of old white-headed men smoking their pipes, and leathery-faced women on household duties intent, with a score or so of little cotton-headed children running about over the manure pile in the neighborhood of the barn, to keep the pigs company; here and there a strapping lout of a boy swinging on a gate and whistling for his own amusement; while cows, sheep, goats, chickens, and other domestic animals and birds, browse, nibble, and peck all over the yard in such lazy and rural manner as would delight an artist. This is the ordinary Norwegian station.

There is always a good room for the traveler, and plenty of excellent homely fare to eat. At some few places along the route the station-houses aspire to the style and dignity of hotels, but they are not always the best or most comfortable. Then there are "fast" and "slow" stations—so called in the book of laws. At the fast stations the traveler can procure a horse and cariole without delay—fifteen minutes being the legal limit. At the slow stations he must wait till the neighborhood, for a distance of three or four miles perhaps, is searched for a horse—sometimes for both horse and cariole. If he chooses to incur the expense he can send forward a Forbad, or notice in advance, requiring horses to be ready at each station at a specified time; but if he is not there according to notice he must pay so much per hour for the delay. A day-book is kept at each of these post-houses, in which the traveler must enter his name, stating the time of his arrival and departure, where he came from, his destination, how many horses he requires, etc. In this formidable book he may also specify any complaint he has to make against the station-holder, boy, horse, cariole, or any body, animal, or thing, that maltreats him, cheats him, or in any way misuses him on the journey; but he must take care to have the inn-keeper or some such disinterested person as a witness in his behalf, so that when the matter comes before the Amtmand, or grand tribunal of justice, it may be fairly considered and disposed of according to law. When the inn-keeper, station-holder, posting-master, alderman, or other proper functionary on the premises, fails to present this book and require the traveler to sign his name in it, he (the ardent violator of laws) is fined; but the traveler need not flatter himself that the rule does not work both ways, for he also is fined if he refuses or intentionally neglects to write his name in the said book. The number of horses to be kept at fast stations is fixed by law, and no traveler is to be detained more than a quarter of an hour, unless in certain cases, when he may be detained half an hour. At a slow station he must not be detained over three hours—such is the utmost stretch of the law. Think of that, ye Gothamites, who complain if you are detained any where on the face of the earth three minutes—only detained three hours every eight or ten miles! But for delay occasioned by any insuperable impediment, says the Norwegian law-book—such as a storm at sea, or too great a distance between the inns—no liability is incurred on either side. A Philadelphia lawyer could drive six-and-thirty coaches-and-four, all abreast, through such a law as that, and then leave room enough for a Stockton wagon and mule-team on each side. Who is to judge of the weather or the distance between the inns? When the traveler holds the reins he is responsible for the horse, but when the post-boy does the holding he, the said boy, is the responsible party. Should any post-horse be ill-treated or overdriven, when the traveler holds the reins, so that, in the language of the law, “the station-holder, inn-keeper, or two men at the next station can perceive this to be the case, the traveler shall pay for the injury according to the estimation of these men, and he shall not be allowed to be sent on until the payment is made.” The traveler pays all tolls and ferry charges. “When the road is very hilly, or is in out-of-the-way districts where there are but few horses in proportion to the travel, and the distance between the stations is unusually long, or under other circumstances where the burden on the people obligated to find horses is evidently very oppressive, etc.,” “it may be ordered by the King, after a declaration to that effect has been procured by the authorities, that payment for posting may be reckoned according to a greater distance, in proportion to the circumstances, as far as double the actual distance.”

In addition to all these formidable regulations—against which it seems to me it would be impossible for any ordinary man to contend—the tariff fixes the price of posting for fast and slow stations in towns, and fast and slow stations in the country; the only difficulty being to find where the towns are after you get into them, or to know at what stage of the journey you leave them. The Amtmand, by letter to all the authorities, likewise requires the tariff to be hung conspicuously in all the inns; which tariff, says the law, “is altered according to the rise and fall of provisions.”

When I came to study out all this, and consider the duties and obligations imposed on me as a traveler going a journey of three or four hundred miles; that I was to be subject to contingencies and liabilities depending upon the elements both by land and sea; that serious responsibilities fell upon me if I held the reins of the post-horse, and probably heavy risks of life and limb if the post-boy held them; that the inn-keeper, station-holder, alderman, or two men chosen miscellaneously from the ranks of society, were to judge of damages that might be inflicted upon the horse; that I must register my name in a day-book, and enter formal complaints against the authorities on the way about every ten miles; that the tariff might rise and fall five hundred times during the journey, for aught I knew, according to the rise and fall of provisions or the pleasure of the Amtmand; that conspiracies might be entered into against me to make me pay for all the lame, halt, blind, and spavined horses in the country, and my liberty restrained in some desolate region of the mountains; that I could not speak a dozen words of the language, and had no other means of personal defense against imposition than a small pen-knife and the natural ferocity of my countenance—when all these considerations occurred to me, I confess they made me hesitate a little before launching out from Lillehammer.

However, the landlord of the post, a jolly and good-natured old gentleman, relieved my apprehensions by providing such a breakfast of coffee, eggs, beef-steak, fish, and bread, that my sunken spirits were soon thoroughly aroused, and I felt equal to any emergency. When I looked out on the bright hill-sides, and saw the sun glistening on the dewy sod, and heard the post-boys in the yard whistling merrily to the horses, I was prepared to face the great Amtmand itself. In a little while the horse and cariole designed for my use were brought up before the door, and the landlord informed me that all was "fertig."

Now, was there ever such a vehicle for a full-grown man to travel in? A little thing, with a body like the end of a canoe, perched up on two long shafts, with a pair of wheels in the rear; no springs, and only a few straps of leather for a harness; a board behind for the skydskaarl, or post-boy, to sit upon; and a horse not bigger than a large mountain goat to drag me over the road! It was positively absurd. After enjoying the spectacle for a moment, and making a hurried sketch of it, wondering what manner of man had first contrived such a vehicle, I bounced in, and stretched my legs out on each side, bracing my feet against a pair of iron catches, made expressly for that purpose. Fortunately I am a capital driver. If nature ever intended me for any one profession above all others, it must have been for a stage-driver. I have driven buggies, wagons, and carts in California hundreds of miles, and never yet killed any body. Like the Irishman, I can drive within two inches of a precipice without going over. Usually, however, I let the horse take his own way, which, after all, is the grand secret of skillful driving.

My baggage consisted of a knapsack, containing a few shirts and stockings, a sketch-book and some pencils, and such other trifling nick-nacks as a tourist usually requires in this country. I carried no more outside clothing than what common decency required: a rough hunting coat, a pair of stout cloth pantaloons, and an old pair of boots—which is as much as any traveler needs on a Norwegian tour; though it is highly recommended by an English writer that every traveler should provide himself with two suits of clothes, a Mackintosh, a portable desk, an India-rubber pillow, a few blankets, an opera-glass, a mosquito-net, a thermometer, some dried beef, and a dozen boxes of sardines, besides a stick of white bread and two bottles of English pickles.

With a crack of the whip that must have astonished the landlord and caused him some misgivings for the fate of his horse and cariole,

I took my departure from Lillehammer. About half a mile beyond the town we (the skydskaarl, myself, horse, and cariole) passed the falls—a roaring torrent of water tumbling down from the mountain side on the right. Several extensive saw-mills are located at this point. The piles of lumber outside, and the familiar sounds of the saws and wheels, reminded me of home. The scene was pretty and picturesque, but rather disfigured by the progress of Norwegian civilization. Passing numerous thriving farms in the full season of harvest, the road winding pleasantly along the hill-side to the right, the foaming waters of the Logen deep down in the valley to the left, we at length reached the entrance of the Gudbrandsdalen—that beautiful and fertile valley, which stretches all the way up the course of the Logen to the Dovre Fjeld, a distance of a hundred and sixty-eight miles from Lillehammer. It would be an endless task to undertake a description of the beauties of this valley. From station to station it is a continued panorama of dashing waterfalls, towering mountains, green slopes, pine forests overtopping the cliffs, rich and thriving farms, with innumerable log cottages perched up among the cliffs, and wild and rugged defiles through which the road passes, sometimes overhung by shrubbery for miles at a stretch. Flying along the smoothly-graded highway at a rapid rate; independent of all the world except your horse and boy; the bright sunshine glimmering through the trees; the music of the wild waters falling pleasantly on your ear; each turn of the road opening out something rich, new, and strange; the fresh mountain air invigorating every fibre of your frame; renewed youth and health beginning to glow upon your cheeks; digestion performing its functions without a pang or a hint of remonstrance; kind, genial, open-hearted people wherever you stop—is it not an episode in life worth enjoying? The valley of the Logen must surely be a paradise (in summer) for invalids.

At each station the traveler is furnished with a stunted little boy called the skydskaarl, usually clothed in the cast-off rags of his great-grandfather; his head ornamented by a flaming red night-cap, and his feet either bare or the next thing to it; his hair standing out in every direction like a mop dyed in whitewash and yellow ochre, and his face and hands freckled and sunburned, and not very clean; while his manners are any thing but cultivated. This remarkable boy sits on a board behind the cariole, and drives it back to the station from which it starts. He is regarded somewhat in the light of a high public functionary by his contemporary ragamuffins, having been promoted from the fields or the barn-yard to the honorable position of skydskaarl. His countenance is marked by the lines of premature care and responsibility, but varies in expression according to circumstances. The sum of four cents at the end of an hour's journey gives it an extremely amiable and intelligent cast. Some boys are constitutionally knowing, and have a quick, sharp look; others again are dull and stolid, as naturally happens wherever there is a variety of boys born of different parents. For the most part, they are exceedingly bright and lively little fellows. Mounted on their seat of honor at the back of the cariole, they greatly enliven the way by whistling and singing, and asking questions in their native tongue, which it is sometimes very difficult to answer when one is not familiar with the language.

I had at Moshuus a communicative little boy, who talked to me incessantly all the way to Holmen without ever discovering, so far as I could perceive, that I did not understand a single word he said. Another, after repeated efforts to draw me out, fell into a fit of moody silence, and from that into a profound slumber, which was only broken off toward the end of our journey by an accident. The cariole struck against a stone and tilted him out on the road. He was a good deal surprised, but said nothing.

Another little fellow, not more than six or seven years of age—a pretty fair-haired child—was sent with me over a very wild and broken stage of the journey. He was newly dressed in a suit of gray frieze with brass buttons, and was evidently a shining light at home. On the road a dog ran out from the bushes and barked at us.

The poor little skydskaarl was frantic with terror, and cried so lustily that I had to take him into the cariole, and put him under my legs to keep him from going into fits. He bellowed all the way to the next station, where I endeavored to make the innkeeper understand that it was cruel to send so small a boy on such a hazardous journey. The man laughed, and said, "Ja! he is too little!" which was all I could get out of him. I felt unhappy about this poor child all day.

On another occasion I had a bright, lively little fellow about twelve years of age, who was so pleased to find that I was an American that he stopped every body on the road to tell them this important piece of news; so that it took me about three hours to go a distance of seven or eight miles. There was a light of intelligence in the boy's face that enabled me to comprehend him almost by instinct, and the quickness with which he caught at my half-formed words, and gathered my meaning when I told him of the wonders of California, were really surprising. This boy was a natural genius. He will leave his mountain home some day or other and make a leading citizen of the United States. Already he was eager to dash out upon the world and see some of its novelties and wonders.

At Laurgaard I was favored with a small urchin who must have been modeled upon one of Hogarth's pictures. He was a fixed laugh all over. His mouth, nose, ears, eyes, hair, and chin were all turned up in a broad grin. Even the elbows of his coat and the knees of his trousers were wide open with ill-concealed laughter. He laughed when he saw me, and laughed more than ever when he heard me "tale Norsk." There was something uncommonly amusing to this little shaver in the cut of a man's jib who could not speak good Norwegian. All the way up the hill he whistled, sang lively snatches of song, joked with the horse, and when the horse nickered laughed a young horse-laugh to keep him company. It did me good to see the rascal so cheery. I gave him an extra shilling at Braendhangen for his lively spirit, at which he grinned all over wider than ever, put the small change in his pocket, and with his red night-cap in one hand made a dodge of his head at me, as if snapping at a fly, and then held out his spare hand to give me a shake. Of course I shook hands with him.

Shaking hands with small boys, however, is nothing uncommon in Norway. Every boy on the entire route shook hands with me. Whenever I settled the fare the skydskaarl invariably pulled off his cap, or if he had none, gave a pull at the most prominent bunch of hair, and holding forth a flipper, more or less like a lump of raw beef, required me, by all the laws of politeness, to give it a shake. The simplicity with which they did this, and the awkward kindness of their manner, as they wished me a pleasant trip, always formed an agreeable episode in the day's travel. I have shaken a greater variety of boys' hands in Norway—of every size, kind, and quality, fat, lean, clean and dirty, dry and wet—than ever I shook all over the world before. Notwithstanding the amount of water in the country, I must have carried away from Trondhjem about a quarter of a pound of the native soil. Between the contortions of body and limb acquired by a brief residence in Paris, the battering out of several hats against my knee in the process of bowing throughout the cities of Germany, and the shaking of various boys' hands on my trip through Norway, I consider that my politeness now qualifies me for any society.

It must not be understood, however, that I was always favored with the society of little boys. At one of the stations, which, for obvious reasons, it would be indiscreet to name, there was no boy visible except the ragamuffin who had accompanied me. He, of course, was obliged to return with the horse and cariole.

Three white-headed old men were sitting on a log near the stable basking in the sun, and gossiping pleasantly about by-gone times or the affairs of state—I could not understand which. Each of these venerable worthies wore a red night-cap, which in this country answers likewise for a day-cap, and smoked a massive wooden pipe. It was a very pleasant picture of rural content. As I approached they nodded a smiling "God Aften!" and rose to unharness the horse. An elderly lady, of very neat appearance and pleasing expression, came to the door and bade me a kindly welcome. Then the three old men all began to talk to me together, and when they said what they had to say about the fine weather, and the road, and the quality of the horse, and whatever else came into their antiquated heads, they led the horse off to the stable and proceeded to get me a fresh one. While they were doing that the elderly lady went back into the house and called aloud for some person within. Presently a fine buxom young girl, about seventeen years of age, made her appearance at the door. I flattered myself she wore rather a pleased expression when she saw me; but that might have been the customary cast of her fea-ures, or vanity on my part. At all events there was a glowing bloom in her cheeks, and a penetrating brilliancy in her large blue eyes, wonderfully fascinating to one who had not recently looked upon any thing very attractive in the line of female loveliness. She was certainly a model of rustic beauty—I had rarely seen her equal in any country. Nothing could be more lithe and graceful than her form, which was advantageously set off by a tight bodice and a very scanty petticoat. A pair of red woolen stockings conspicuously displayed the fine contour of her—ankles I suppose is the conventional expression, though I mean a great deal more than that. As she sprang down the steps with a light and elastic bound and took hold of the horse, which by this time the three old men were fumbling at to harness in the cariole, I unconsciously thought of Diana Vernon. She had all the daring grace and delicacy of the Scotch heroine—only in a rustic way. Seizing the horse by the bridle, she backed him up in a jiffy between the shafts of the cariole, and pushing the old gray-heads aside with a merry laugh, proceeded to arrange the harness. Having paid the boy who had come over from the last station, and put my name and destination in the day-book, according to law, I refreshed myself by a glass of ale, and then came out to see if all was ready. The girl nodded to me smilingly to get in and be off.

I looked around for the boy who was to accompany me. Nobody in the shape of a boy was to be seen. The three old men had returned to their log by the stable, and now sat smoking their pipes and gossiping as usual; and the good-natured old landlady stood smiling and nodding in the door-way. Who was to take charge of the cariole? that was the question. Was I to go alone? Suppose I should miss the road and get lost in some awful wilderness? However, these questions were too much for my limited vocabulary of Norsk on the spur of the moment. So I mounted the cariole, resolved to abide whatever fate Providence might have in store for me. The girl put the reins in my hand and off I started, wondering why these good people left me to travel alone. I thought that they would naturally feel some solicitude about their property. Scarcely was I under way, when, with a bound like a deer, the girl was up on the cariole behind, hanging on to the back of the seat with both hands. Perfectly aghast with astonishment, I pulled the reins and stopped. "What!" I exclaimed, in the best Norsk I could muster—"is the Jomfru going with me?" "Ja!" answered the laughing damsel, in a merry, ringing voice—"Ja! Ja! Jeg vil vise de Veien!—I will show you the way!"

Here was a predicament! A handsome young girl going to take charge of me through a perfectly wild and unknown country! I turned to the old lady at the door with something of a remonstrating expression, no doubt, for I felt confused and alarmed. How the deuce was I, a solitary and inexperienced traveler from California, to defend myself against such eyes, such blooming cheeks, such honeyed lips and pearly teeth as these—to say nothing of a form all grace and agility, a voice that was the very essence of melody, and the fascinating smiles and blandishments of this wild young creature! It was enough to puzzle and confound any man of ordinary susceptibility, much less one who had a natural terror of the female sex. But I suppose it was all right. The old lady nodded approvingly; and the three old men smoked their pipes, and, touching their red night-caps, bid me—Farrel! meget god reise!—a pleasant trip! So without more ado I cracked the whip, and off we started. It was not my fault—that was certain. My conscience was clear of any bad intentions.

We were soon out of sight of the station, and then came a steep hill. While the pony was pulling and tugging with all his might, the girl bounced off, landing like a wood-nymph about six feet in the rear of the cariole; when, with strides that perfectly astonished me, she began to march up the hill, singing a lively Norwegian ditty as she sprang over the ruts and ridges of the road. I halted in amazement. This would never do. Respect for the gentler sex would not permit me to ride up the hill while so lovely a creature was taking it on foot. Governed by those high principles of gallantry, augmented and cultivated by long residence in California, I jumped out of the cariole, and with persuasive eloquence begged the fair damsel to get in and drive up the hill on my account; that I greatly preferred walking; the exercise was congenial—I liked it. At this she looked astonished, if not suspicious. I fancied she was not used to that species of homage. At all events she stoutly declined getting in; and since it was impossible for me to ride under the circumstances, I walked by her side to the top of the hill. A coolness was evidently growing up between us, for she never spoke a word all the way; and I was too busy trying to keep the horse in the middle of the road and save my breath to make any further attempts at conversation.

Having at length reached the summit, the girl directed me to take my place, which I did at once with great alacrity. With another active bound she was up behind, holding on as before with both hands to the back of the seat. Then she whistled to the horse in a style he seemed to understand perfectly well; for away he dashed down the hill at a rate of speed that I was certain would very soon result in utter destruction to the whole party. It was awful to think of being pitched out and rolling down the precipice, in the arms perhaps of this dashing young damsel, who being accustomed to the road would doubtless exert herself to save me.

"Nu! Reise! Reise!—travel!" cried this extraordinary girl; and away we went—over rocks, into ruts, against roots and bushes; bouncing, springing, splashing, and dashing through mud-holes; down hill and still down; whirling past terrific pits, jagged pinnacles of rock, and yawning gulfs of darkness; through gloomy patches of pine, out again into open spaces, and along the brinks of fearful precipices; over rickety wooden bridges, and through foaming torrents that dashed out over the road—the wild girl clinging fast behind, the little pony flying along madly in front, the cariole creaking and rattling as if going to pieces—myself hanging on to the reins in a perfect agony of doubt whether each moment would not be our last. I declare, on the faith of a traveler, it beat all the dangers

I had hitherto encountered summed up together. Trees whirled by, waterfalls flashed upon my astonished eyes, streaks of sunshine fretted the gloom with a net-work of light that dazzled and confounded me. I could see nothing clearly. There was a horrible jumble in my mind of black rocks and blue eyes, pine forests and flaming red stockings, flying clouds and flying petticoats, the roar of torrents and the ringing voice of the maiden as she cried, "Flue! Gaae! Reise!—Fly! Go it! Travel!" Only one thought was uppermost—the fear of being dashed to pieces. Great Heavens, what a fate! If I could only stop this infernal little pony, we might yet be saved! But I dared not attempt it. The slightest pull at the reins would throw him upon his haunches, and cariole and all would go spinning over him into some horrible abyss. All this time the wild damsel behind was getting more and more excited. Now she whistled, now she shouted, "Skynde pa!—Faster! faster!" till, fairly carried away by enthusiasm, she begged me to give her the whip, which I did, with a faint attempt at prayer. Again she whistled, and shouted "Skynde pa!—Faster! faster!" and then she cracked the most startling and incomprehensible Norwegian melodies with the whip, absolutely stunning my ears, while she shouted "Gaae! Flue! Reise!—Go it! Fly! Travel!" Faster and still faster we flew down the frightful hill. The pony caught the infection of enthusiasm, and now broke into a frantic run. "Faster! faster!" shrieked the wild girl in a paroxysm of delight.

By this time I was positively beside myself with terror. No longer able to distinguish the flying trees, waterfalls, and precipices, I closed my eyes, and gasped for breath. Soon the fearful bouncing of the cariole aroused me to something like consciousness. We had struck a rock, and were now spinning along the edge of a mighty abyss on one wheel, the other performing a sort of balancé in the air. I looked ahead, but there was neither shape nor meaning in the country. It was all a wild chaos of destructive elements—trees, precipices, red stockings, and whirling petticoats—toward which we were madly flying.

But there is an end to all troubles upon earth. With thanks to a kind Providence, I at length caught sight of a long stretch of level road. Although there were several short turns to be made before reaching it, there was still hope that it might be gained without any more serious disaster than the breaking of a leg or an arm. Upon such a casualty as that I should have compromised at once. If this extraordinary creature behind would only stop whistling and cracking the whip, and driving the little pony crazy by her inspiring cries, I might yet succeed in steering safely into the level road; but the nearer we approached the bottom of the hill the wilder she became—now actually dancing on the little board with delight, now leaning over to get a cut at the pony's tail with the whip, while she whistled more fiercely than ever, and cried out, from time to time, "Flue! Gaae! Reise!" Already the poor little animal was reeking with sweat, and it was a miracle he did not drop dead on the road.

However, by great good fortune, aided by my skill in driving, we made the turns, and in a few minutes more were safely jogging along the level road. Almost breathless, and quite bewildered, I instinctively turned round to see what manner of wild being this girl behind was. If you believe me, she was leaning over my shoulder, shaking her sides laughing at me—her sparkling blue eyes now all ablaze with excitement; her cheeks glowing like peonies; her lips wide apart, displaying the most exquisite set of teeth I ever beheld; while her long golden tresses, bursting from the red handkerchief which served as a sort of crowning glory to her head, floated in wavy ringlets over her shoulders. Hermosa! it was enough to thaw an anchorite! She was certainly very pretty—there was no doubt of that; full of life, overflowing with health and vitality, and delighted at the confusion and astonishment of the strange gentleman she had taken in charge.

Can any body tell me what it is that produces such a singular sensation when one looks over his shoulder and discovers the face of a pretty and innocent young girl within a few inches of his own, her beautiful eyes sparkling like a pair of stars, and shooting magic scintillations through and through him, body and soul, while her breath falls like a zephyr upon his cheek? Tell me, ye who deal in metaphysics, what is it? There is certainly a kind of charm in it, against which no mortal man is proof. Though naturally prejudiced against the female sex, and firmly convinced that we could get along in the world much better without them, I was not altogether insensible to beauty in an artistical point of view; otherwise I should never have been able to grace the pages of HARPER with the above likeness of this Norwegian sylph. After all, it must be admitted that they have a way about them which makes us feel overpowered and irresponsible in their presence. Doubtless this fair damsel was unconscious of the damage she was inflicting upon a wayworn and defenseless traveler. Her very innocence was itself her chiefest charm. Either she was the most innocent or the most designing of her sex. She thought nothing of holding on to my shoulder, and talked as glibly and pleasantly, with her beaming face close to my ear, as if I had been her brother or her cousin, or possibly her uncle, though I did not exactly like to regard it in that point of view. What she was saying I could not conjecture, save by her roguish expression and her merry peals of laughter.

"Jeg kan ikke tale Norsk!—I can't speak Norwegian"—was all I could say; at which she laughed more joyously than ever, and rattled off a number of excellent jokes, no doubt at my helpless condition. Indeed, I strongly suspected, from a familiar word here and there, that she was making love to me out of mere sport—though she was guarded enough not to make any intelligible demonstration to that effect. At last I got out my vocabulary, and as we jogged quietly along the road, by catching a word now and then, and making her repeat what she said very slowly, got so far as to construct something of a conversation.

"What is your name, skøn Jumfru?" I asked.

"Maria," was the answer.

"A pretty name; and Maria is a very pretty girl."

She tossed her head a little scornfully, as much as to say Maria was not to be fooled by flattery.

"What is your name?" said Maria, after a pause.

"Mine? Oh, I have forgotten mine."

"Are you an Englishman?"

"No."

"A Frenchman?"

"No."

"A Dutchman?"

"No—I am an American."

"I like Americans—I don't like Englishmen," said the girl.

"Have you a lover?"

"Yes."

"Are you going to be married to him?"

"Yes, in about six months."

"I wish you joy."

"Thank you!"

At this moment a carriage drawn by two horses hove in sight. It was an English traveling party—an old gentleman and two ladies, evidently his wife and daughter. As they drew near they seemed to be a little perplexed at the singular equipage before them—a small horse, nearly dead and lathered all over with foam, a cariole bespattered with mud; a dashing fine girl behind, with flaunting hair, a short petticoat, and a flaming pair of red stockings; myself in the body of the cariole, covered from head to foot with mire, my beard flying out in every direction, and my hair still standing on end from the effects of recent fright—a very singular spectacle to meet in the middle of a public highway, even in Norway. The road was very narrow at the point of meeting. It became necessary for one of the vehicles to pull up the side of the hill a little in order to allow room for the other to pass. Being the lighter party as well as under obligations of gallantry, I at once gave way. While endeavoring to make a passage the old gentleman gruffly observed to the public generally,

"What an excessively bad road!"

"Very!" said I.

"Beastly!" growled the Englishman.

"Abominable!" said I.

"Oh, you are an Englishman?" said the elderly lady.

"No, Madam—an American," I answered, with great suavity.

"Oh, an American!" said the young lady, taking out her note-book; "dear me, how very interesting!"

"From California," I added, with a smile of pride.

"How very interesting!" exclaimed the young lady.

"A great country," said I.

"Gray," observed the elderly lady, in an under tone, looking very hard at the girl, who was still standing on the little board at the back of the cariole, and who coolly and saucily surveyed the traveling party—"Gray, is that a Norwegian girl?"

"Yes, Madam; she is my postillion, only she rides behind, according to the Norwegian custom."

"Dear me!" cried the young lady; "how very interesting!"

"And dangerous, too," I observed.

The elderly lady looked puzzled. She was thinking of dangers to which I had no reference.

"Dangerous?" exclaimed the young lady.

"Yes; she came near breaking my neck down that hill;" and here I gave the party a brief synopsis of the adventure.

"Devilish odd!" growled the old Englishman, impatiently. "Good-day, Sir. Come, get up!"

The elderly lady said nothing, but looked suspicious.

"Dear me!" exclaimed the young lady as they drove off; "how very—" This was the last I heard, but I suppose she considered it interesting. The whole affair, no doubt, stands fully recorded in her note-book.

The way being now clear, we proceeded on our journey. In a little while the station-house was in sight, and after a few minutes' drive I was obliged to part from my interesting companion. At first I hesitated about proffering the usual fee of four shillings; but upon reflection it occurred to me that I had no right to consider her any thing more than a post-boy. It was worth something extra to travel with one so lively and entertaining, so I handed her double the usual allowance; at which she made a very polite courtesy, and greatly relieved my embarrassment by giving me a hearty shake of the hand and wishing me a pleasant journey. This was the last I saw of my Norwegian Diana. She is a young damsel of great beauty and vivacity, not to say a little wild. I trust she is now happily married to the object of her affections.

THE VENUS OF MILO.

SOCIAL ÆSTHETICS.

STANFORD GREY sat in his library talking with Daniel Tomes. Fast friends for years, these men were yet notably unlike. Grey, though a student, as every thing about him showed, had the air of a man of the world and the manner of society. His very tone of voice, though as natural as the cry of a new-born child (and babies, especially girl babies, soon learn to cry affectedly), told of culture. His face expressed reserve, and was so remarkably free from any look of self-assertion that you might have thought it weak until you found the mild gray eye looking steadily back into yours, and saw, as the mustache curled away from the mouth, how firmly the lips were set together; and then, if you had learned the art to know men, you would see that this man had a strong will, though no excess of energy, and was brimful of courage, though he lacked pugnacity. A temperament this which made its possessor very tolerant of others' opinions, but very tenacious of his own. His dress, though simple and inexpensive, was selected with an eye to harmony of color and becomingness; though this was not noticeable until attention was directed to it. The library in which he sat showed equally that the sense of the beautiful pervaded his life. For although it was plainly his working-room, and a little Russia sewing-case and a cocoa-nut humming-top on a table in one corner gave evidence that it was invaded with impunity by at least one woman and one child, the prints upon the walls, the casts of antique statues standing wherever a nook could be made for them, the combination of rich, low-toned colors throughout the apartment, and the very placing of the books which nearly covered the walls, and which were not shelved haphazard, but arranged so that their various hues relieved and set off each the other, all bore evidence to the exacting and never slumbering taste of the occupant.

In Daniel Tomes the observant eye detected at once a singularly well-balanced organization. A head not noticeably large, poised upon a strong, well-rounded neck, springing from broad shoulders, a deep chest, muscular limbs, and a stature little short of six feet, showed a man of vigor and endurance, one sure of long life, if he escaped accident and pestilential poison. His black hair curled closely over his well-rounded head. His lips were full and red; the upper bowed. The lower part of his oval face had a blue tinge, given by his heavy, closely shaven beard; for he wore not even whiskers. His nose neatly approached the Grecian model—a form of the feature remarkably frequent in Americans of pure English blood. It was difficult to see his eyes, because they were covered with spectacles; but they were dark, and had that slight prominence which phrenologists have reason for associating with copious gift of language. The spectacles were worn only to aid short sight; for both he and Grey lacked three or four years of forty; and yet, although Tomes was but a year the older, a certain gravity and staidness of bearing caused Grey always to feel young by the side of his friend, and to look to him for counsel as to an elder brother who had had ten years more experience of life. And yet Grey had one very important experience which Tomes had not; for the former had been married some years, while the latter was a bachelor. Tomes was also plainly either indifferent to or incapable of the sense of beauty, which so penetrated the whole being of Grey. His manner was a strange mixture of shyness and self-confidence; his movements were made with twice as much muscular exertion as was necessary; his voice, though full and rich and strong, was so ill-modulated, except under the influence of that strong excitement which makes almost every man eloquent, that what he said often lost much of its significance and weight; and his dress, although it cost twice as much as Grey's, looked as if it were made up of parts of various suits—which indeed it was; for to him a coat was but a coat, whatever its form, and a waistcoat but a waistcoat, whatever its color, and he wore his wardrobe promiscuously. With all this, he not only seemed, but was a man of mark among his acquaintances. His air was bold, and, when he was roused out of the brown studies into which he was apt to fall, determined, almost aggressive. He was just and benevolent, but not very considerate of others' feelings. He looked as if he might have counseled Cromwell and fought beside him.

Tomes had been making an argumentative onslaught upon his host, who was recovering himself with "Very true, Tomes, but—" when the other broke out—

"'But, but; there's no 'but' about it. There is no more connection between moral excellence and material beauty than there is between the appetizing inside and the forbidding outside of an oyster. They have nothing to do with each other; no relations of any kind whatever. A cock-pheasant is a handsome bird, and is good to eat; a canvas-back duck is not handsome, but is better; a terrapin is hideous, but is best of all. It is just so with men. Their merit has nothing whatever to do with their appearance; and the least attractive are often the most worthy."

GREY. "Who disputes such truth as that? Not I, certainly. Pray let your man of straw rest without more demolishing."

TOMES. "You may not dispute it by word, but you do by deed. There is not an act that you perform, or an article with which you provide yourself, which is not a silent assertion of the cardinal point of your faith, that the good and the beautiful are coexistent if not the same. Why—Let me see your watch.—There, that's a thing for a man of sense like you to carry, when the only reasonable object you can have in carrying it is the service it can render you; for you carry it concealed, and neither you nor any one else sees it but for the moment when you consult it. A thin, wafer-like gimerack, that it must cost you a good part of your income to keep in any sort of order. Why not carry something like this?—There, that belonged to my father before me; and it was the best one that money could buy in England. It looks like what it is: substantial, solid, serviceable."

GREY. "Illustration unhappily chosen, O sagest Mentor! For my Jurgensen, with a little care, will run within half a second a day of the true time, the whole year round; while your Tobias—I can see it's a Tobias at this distance—can't be kept within much less than a quarter of a minute by all the attention you and the watch-maker can give it. And besides, O Daniel! you have digged a pit and fallen into it. For even you are pleased with the beauty of your watch, and praise it."

TOMES. "When? How? I do no such thing."

GREY. "Did you not just now say that your watch looked like what it is—substantial, solid, serviceable? In other words, you attributed to it the beauty of fitness. That beauty gratified you. You were in error as to the excellence of which you regarded it as the exponent; but that mistake does not affect the genuineness of the gratification which was founded upon it, or, I think, its reasonableness. It showed me that even you (pardon me!) are capable of instruction in the art of making life beautiful; and that you being so capable, all men also are, to a greater or less degree, with very few exceptions. Again pardon me. But I know that you will take no offense."

TOMES. "You are right in that. I can not believe that you could have the intention to offend me; and therefore I should not be offended at any thing that you would say, unless you plainly showed that intention. And, besides, to be offended I must first know with what you mean to charge me. What is this art of making life beautiful at my capacity for learning which you sneer?—well, since you look so deprecatingly, at which you jeer? There's no offense, you know."

GREY. "Let me read again the passage whence our brief discussion started. You acknowledge that Arthur Helps is one of the soundest and healthiest thinkers of the day, though you say he is not remarkably original; and this is what he says in his paper on the 'Art of Living': 'I think it may also be observed that, independently of these errors committed with regard to scientific matters, such as change of air, maintenance of warmth, and the supply of light, there is also a singular inaptitude of means to ends, which prevails generally throughout the human aids and appliances for living—I mean dress, houses, equipages, and household furniture. The causes of this unsuitableness of means to ends lie very deep in human nature, and in the present form of human society. I attribute them chiefly to the imitative nature of the great bulk of mankind, and to the division of labor; which latter practice being carried to a great extent in every civilized state, renders a man expert in his own business, but timid even in judging of what he has not to make but only to use. The result is, I believe, that more than one-half of what we do to procure good is needless or mischievous: in fact, that more than half of the labor of the world is wasted: in savage life, by not knowing what is necessary; in civilized life, by the pursuit of what is needless.' Helps follows his subject out only in its moral aspects, and considers the want of truth, the vanity, shyness, imitation, foolish concern about trifles, want of faithfulness to society, and Puritanical notions, which he rightly regards as hindrances to social culture and improvement. Now, what I call making life beautiful, is the bringing of intellectual refinement and cultivated taste to bear not only upon mere works of literature and art, but upon these very material everyday matters of dress, houses, equipages, and household furniture; so that the world which we make for ourselves may be, if possible, as beautiful as the natural world in which God has placed us."

TOMES. "Perhaps there is no positive harm in that. And yet there may be, by its causing neglect of that which is of more importance. For of what real use is that intellectual refinement upon which you set so high a value? How much better is discipline than culture! Of how much greater worth to himself and to the world than your gentleman of cultivated tastes is the man who, by physical and mental training, the use of his muscles, the exercise of his faculties, the restraint of his appetites, has acquired vigor, endurance, self-reliance, self-control! Let a man be pure, honorable, and industrious, and what remains for him to do, and of time in which to do it, is of very small importance."

GREY. "You talk as if you were the son of a Stoic father by a Puritan mother, and had inherited the moral and mental traits of both your parents."

TOMES. "Many worse things have been said of me, and few better; but to describe me is not to meet my arguments."

GREY. "Well, then, Zeno Barebones, don't you see, that, after man has provided for his first necessities—food, shelter, and clothing—he must needs set about making the life comfortable that he has made possible; that he will seek first comfort and then pleasure; and that the pleasures which he will seek, next after those which are purely sensual, will be the embellishment of his external life—his person, his clothes, his habitation, his tools, and weapons? And do you not also see that the craving which he thus supplies is just as natural, that is, just as much the inevitable result of his organization, as those to which necessity gave precedence? There is not a savage in any country who does not begin to strive to live handsomely just as soon as he has contrived to live at all; that is, if he is any thing more than a mere animal; and his efforts in this direction are a sure gauge of the degree of his intelligence and even his moral tone."

TOMES. "Your savage is more unfortunately chosen by you than my watch was by me. What do you think of your red man, who makes no provision for the morrow, but supplies his animal needs for the moment as he can, and living in squalor, filth, and discomfort, yet daubs himself with grease and paint, and adorns his head with feathers, his neck with bears' claws, and his girdle with scalps? What of your black barbarian, whose life is a succession of unspeakable abominations, and who embellishes it by blackening his teeth, tattooing his skin, and thrusting a fish-bone or a ring through the gristle of his nose? Either of them will barter his last morsel for a glass bead or a brass button. What can be more manifest than that all this business of the embellishment of life is a mere manifestation of personal vanity—inborn lust of the eye and pride of life, shown by the savage according to his savageness, and by the civilized man according to his civilization?"

GREY. "Certainly the love of the beautiful is common to all men. The savage does manifest this love according to his savageness. When a man rises in the scale of civilization his whole nature rises. You can't go up a ladder piece-meal. The red man's smoky wigwam, the negro's filthy mud hut, the degradation which both inflict upon women, are no surer evidence of barbarity than the parti-colored face of the one or the perforated nostril of the other."

TOMES. "No surer evidence of barbarity! Grey, what do you mean? Would you place an offense against good taste on a level with oppression of the weaker half of mankind, selfish and cruel addition to the burdens which nature has laid upon it?"

GREY. "I certainly said no surer evidence; and I stand to it. But the certainty of the evidence has nothing to do with the nature of the act. This you know; and so I sha'n't take offense at your exclamations or interrogations, or even refer you to Mrs. Grey as to my comparative estimate of offenses against taste and against the sacredness of her sex.—But to return to our topic. Call this desire to enjoy beauty, and to be a part of that beauty which contributes to the enjoyment of others, the lust of the eye or what you please, you will find it coextensive with the race; and that its reasonable gratification tends to harmonize and to mollify mankind, to sweeten life, and even to invigorate it by giving it the healthy stimulus of variety; that it helps to lift men above debasing pleasures, and to foster the finer social feelings by promoting the higher social enjoyments."

TOMES. "Yes; that sounds very fine. It harmonizes mankind, or womankind, by making them jealous of each other's success in what you call society. It makes women sneer at their dear friends' bonnets, and turn up their noses at their carpets and furniture; or what's worse, daub them—I mean the friends, not the furniture—with slimy, loathsome flattery. It mollifies them by making them envious and covetous. It sweetens life by creating heart-burnings about trifles. It gives a stimulus of variety by making all human creatures, especially women creatures, strive to dress exactly alike; to wit, in the fashion. It promotes high social enjoyments by making people give 'at homes,' at which they crowd their houses with a mob of acquaintances they don't care a button for, and who come only to show their dresses and get their supper, and who succeed only in getting their dresses torn off their backs, and in spilling their suppers in each other's laps."

GREY. "That's the society into which you go, Tomes. I have nothing to do with such vulgar people. But, seriously: granted the truth of your caricatured description, what has the manifestation of vanity, envy, hatred, and vulgarity to do with that which is the mere occasion, as any thing else, even religion, might be the occasion of their exhibition? There is not the least connection in the world between a cultivated taste and the petty and contemptible vices which you have just catalogued with so much gusto."

TOMES. "I'm not so sure of that. At any rate, they are very often found in company together."

GREY. "True; but not oftener than honesty and meanness, kindness and clownishness, sincerity and hardness of heart, hospitality and debauchery, chastity and uncharitableness; and with no more connection with each other than these virtues and these vices have."

Tomes hesitated a moment for a reply; and whether he could have made one which would have satisfied even himself will never be known. For while his host was speaking steps were heard in the hall, and before Tomes had thought what to say, the library door opened slowly, and a clear, soft voice said, "May we come in?" "Certainly," answered Grey, "here's your ancient enemy, Mr. Tomes; now my antagonist and prospective vanquisher." And Mrs. Grey entered, but not alone. She was followed by a fair, brown-haired beauty, Miss Laura Larches, whom Grey greeted with that mingling of deference, admiration, and courtesy with which your man of society tacitly recognizes the claims of an acknowledged belle. Tomes was presented to her, and bowed like a well-sweep. The ladies were attended by Mr. Carleton Key, an exceedingly exquisite person, and manifestly of "very soft society," whom Tomes set down at sight as an egregious ass. All took chairs but Mrs. Grey, who, indulging in her own house and among friends, a woman's liking of a low seat, sank down with a little feminine sigh of satisfaction upon a hassock, where her head and shoulders crowned a vast hemisphere of silk and crinoline.

After customary salutations and inquiries, Grey turned to his wife: "How did the reception go off, Nelly? A brilliant affair, I suppose, as all Mrs. Moulton's affairs are?"

MRS. GREY. "Of course it was. A woman as clever as Mrs. Moulton is don't grow gray and keep beautiful during twenty-five years' devotion to society, with all material means and appliances of success, without having her pick of the whole town, and the tact to put her acquaintances to good use. She asked for you."

GREY. "That of course, too; and was quite desolate—that's the phrase, isn't it?—while you were in hearing, because I wasn't there; and when your back was turned was radiant with delight because some one else—Miss Larches or Mr. Key—was there."

MRS. GREY. "You're an incorrigible creature, Stanford. I'm sure she likes you, and me, too. Must a woman be heartless because she's the fashion? And then you're never tired of admiring her dress, and her black eyes and gray curls."

MISS LARCHES. "I'm sure every body must love dear Mrs. Moulton. She is so elegant, has such charming manners, and is always so kind to every body."

TOMES. "What, Miss Larches, to those who don't deserve kindness?"

MISS LARCHES. "Why yes, Mr. Tomes, because—because—"

MR. KEY. "Because, Mr. Tomes, you know, as Hamlet says, 'Use every man according to his desert, and who should escape whipping?'"

Mrs. Grey's brown eyes flashed merry malice at the astonishment with which Tomes received this retort from such a quarter—uttered, too, as it was, with a calm evenness of tone which was almost languid.

GREY. "As to Mrs. Moulton she's no more heartless, I suppose, than any other woman, who is as heartless as she. But the best proof of her honesty that I know of, and of her good taste—next to her professed liking for me—is that she was the first woman, in our society at least, to let her curls grow gray in full sight of the world; though it is so becoming that I more than suspect that I must credit her taste much and her honesty nothing. As to you, Nelly, you are married, and so are no longer a magnet to attract young men to her rooms; you are poor, and can't entertain; and so I don't believe she really cares a hair-pin whether she ever sees you again, except in so far as you make one of a passably well-dressed and tolerable well-bred crowd of people that she likes to have around her."

MRS. GREY. "Such is the gallantry of husbands! Laura, take warning. Over the door of the house that a woman enters as a married mistress is written, though she don't see it when she goes in, 'Who enters here leaves all hope—of compliments—behind.'"

MR. KEY. "Quite a woman's idea of the Inferno, I should say."

TOMES. "Why should a woman be complimented? Why should any one be complimented? Complimenting is fit amusement for little girls, who take pleasure in making believe. When any one compliments me it makes me angry."

MRS. GREY. "That's the reason you are always so good-humored, Mr. Tomes, isn't it?—except when you're here."

Tomes was used to this from his friend's wife, who, he knew, respected him, and for whom he had a real regard; and so he took it gruffly but kindly. But Grey returned to the charge and broke out, "Nelly, I take back what I said just now. I said you were one of a crowd of passably well-dressed people. It isn't so. You are abominably ill dressed; and so—I beg Miss Larches's pardon—are all women nowadays. See as you sit there with your gown all puffed out around you—you look like one of those Dutch toys that are human creature o' top and ball below, and as if Mr. Key would but give you a gentle touch you would bob back and forth for half an hour. There's not a fold or a line about you that has any of the grace of drapery; and not only so, but not a tint about you, except that orange ribbon, can be rightly called a color. To be passably well dressed you would have to begin by taking off your hoop."

MRS. GREY. "Take off my hoop? Would you have me look like a fright? as slinky as if I had been drawn through a keyhole?"

MISS LARCHES. "Take off her hoop!"

MR. KEY. "Be seen without her hoop? Why, what a guy a woman would look without her hoop? I suppose they do take them off at certain times; but then they are not visible to the naked eye."

TOMES. "Yes, Grey, why take off her hoop? I don't care, you know, to have hoops worn. But worn or not worn, what matter? A woman, I suppose, is not like a barrel, liable to fall into ruins if her hoops are taken off."

GREY. "Yes, I suppose that a woman would really rather be seen with a hole in the heel of her stocking now than without a hoop. Yet ten years ago no woman wore a hoop; and did they then look like frights and guys? How was it with you, Nelly? About that time we were married; and perhaps you were a fright, but people generally didn't think so, whatever my private opinion—of which you knew nothing—might have been."

MISS LARCHES. "But it wasn't the fashion then to wear hoops, Mr. Grey; and to be out of the fashion is to be a fright and a guy. The fashion is always pretty."

GREY. "Is it, Miss Larches? I think that it is true that those who wear the fashions are generally pretty. But as to the fashions themselves, see here. This portfolio contains a collection of prints which shows the fashion of ladies' dresses in Italy, France, and England, for eight hundred years back. I think that not one in a hundred of them is beautiful, and not more than one in twenty enduring; but I expect you to admire them all."

MISS LARCHES. "Fashions! Why, Mr. Grey, these are caricatures."

MR. KEY. "Certainly some of these ladies look as if they were fearfully and wonderfully made."

GREY. "But they represent veritable costumes, I can assure you. Those of the last seventy-five years are fashion-plates; the earlier ones portraits."

TOMES. "Portraits, indeed; and yet most of these people had done nothing worthy of the distinction which a portrait implied in their day, except that they did the world the honor of being born to a title and estate."

MRS. GREY. "I am not surprised at your wondering looks, Laura. Not to go far back, look at this ball-dress of 1810—a night-gown—no, it's too scant for a night-gown—a chemise of pink silk."

MR. KEY. "Evidence that women's effort to outstrip each other in dress did not begin in the present generation. Those were probably days of hasty marriages."

MRS. GREY. "Why, Mr. Key?"

MR. KEY. "No need of a man's waiting to see more of a woman than he saw on the first acquaintance."

TOMES. "Surely modest women were never seen in such a gown as that."

GREY. "Yes, our modest and somewhat precise grandmothers. These were the gowns of which Talleyrand said that they began too late and ended too soon. But my dear old Aunt Sarah—you remember her, Nelly?—not a prude to be sure—too truly modest for that; but certainly one of the most decorous as well as the best of women, told me that when she was a girl of seventeen she once, by a sudden little spring, somewhat more vigorous than she meant to make, split her petticoat half-way to the knee. Was she less modest at shy seventeen than when, in the ample robes as well as with the acquired experience of fifty years later, she told me the story? What is modest in dress depends entirely, up to a certain point, on what is customary. Unconsciousness is modesty's triple shelter against shame. Immodesty may hide as well as expose. Look at this figure covered close from the chin to the instep and the wrist, and at this in a gown (if gown it can be called) so loose at the bust that the pink chemise would blush crimson at it. The first is the dissolute Marguerite of Lorraine; the last, La belle Hamilton, no less chaste than beautiful, so that she escaped in the Court of Charles II. the breath of scandal, even from the tongues of envious and eclipsed beauties."

MRS. GREY. "Women have become more modest since then."

MR. KEY. "Or less charitable."

MRS. GREY. "Mr. Key would have us believe that the gallantry of his sex has kept pace with the charity of ours."

MR. KEY. "Exactly. Men are not gallant now—only good-natured. Haven't the time and nervous energy to spare for gallantry. But one is tempted to be out of the fashion at Mrs. Grey's; and so to err a little on the other side for the sake of saving one's reputation from the reproach of old fogysm."

MRS. GREY. "I surrender."

MISS LARCHES. "But, Nelly, do look at these hideous peaked and horned head-dresses! How frightful! how inconvenient! how uncomfortable!"

GREY. "Frightful, inconvenient, and uncomfortable. Is that all? They were the fashion, and that was enough. And besides, how could they be frightful, Miss Larches, for the fashion is always pretty?"

MARGUERITE OF LORRAINE:—1590.

LA BELLE HAMILTON:—1670.

TOMES. "A question which I can put to you with a great deal more propriety than you to Miss Larches. For this is but a manifestation of that craving for the beautiful the satisfaction of which you so strongly insist on."

MISS LARCHES. "Thank you, Mr. Tomes."

GREY. "You forget, Tomes, that I also hold that the instinct must be cultivated; and, above all, that it should be freed from the trammels of servile imitation—that is, of mere fashion. But, ladies, don't confine your criticism to these fourteenth century head-dresses. Look through the costumes of the three succeeding centuries and see how elaborately and hideously the head was deformed, apparently for the sole purpose of having a head look like any thing but a head, and hair like any thing but hair."

MR. KEY. "Perhaps the ladies did it for a difference; as French dames of position and character used to wear a patch of rouge directly under the eyes, because color, real or artificial, could be found naturally distributed on the cheeks of the vulgar and the virtue-less."

GREY. "You have hit upon the very reason. No woman, for instance, could wear her hair dressed in the style of this costume of 1750, unless she was rich enough to do nothing and to command the services of two waiting-maids. Her head-dress is a structure erected with skill and pains, and to be preserved with care. Her hair is drawn violently back from her forehead and piled up on a cushion nine inches high. Its texture is defiled with grease, and its color concealed with flour. She has four formal curls, hanging, like rolls of parchment, from the top of this cushion to below her ear. And o' top of all this are feathers and artificial flowers, and behind, a mass of be-greased, be-powdered hair hanging in a club; the result of the whole being hideous monstrosity, which showed that she could afford to give up two hours a day to this disfigurement of her pretty head."

TOMES. "But she attained her end, which was to please herself and others; and so what matter whether in her way or in yours?"

GREY. "Doubtless: for, as you see, she was beautiful; and, as fashion did not quite require her to flatten her nose and paint her cheeks pea-green, she could not destroy the effect of that which she left in its natural condition. As to her incongruous and monstrous additions to her person, the people she met were used to them; and so she was yet beautiful in spite of them, but not by reason of them. There have been countless similar cases since: there are some now."

MR. KEY. "Miss Larches blushes at that look; but whether with pleasure at the compliment to herself or indignation at the disparagement of her toilet deponent saith not."

GREY. "The first, I trust."

MRS. GREY. "The last, I know. There never was a woman yet who didn't resent a slight to her costume more heartily than she prized a tribute to her beauty. But what could the women have said to each other about their dresses, between 1575 and 1600, when this was the fashion? Stomachers like wedges, stiff with embroidery and heavy with jewels, and with points that reach half-way from the waist to the ground. Ruffs a quarter of a yard deep and as stiff as buckram. See this portrait of Queen Elizabeth in full dress! What with stomacher, and pointed waist, and farthingale, and spreading ruff, and skirt, covered with ouches and jewels and puckers, she looks like a microscopic view of a hideous flying insect with expanded wings, not at all like a woman."

QUEEN ELIZABETH.

GREY. "And her critic's costume rivals hers in the very peculiarity by which she is most deformed, by which her figure is made most unlike that of a woman—the straight outline of the waist and the rising curve below it, meeting in such a sharp, unnatural angle. If you would see how these lines misrepresent those of nature, look at the Venus of Milo yonder; she is naked to the hips."

MR. KEY. "But the civilized world of modern days has tacitly agreed that woman's figure below the shoulders should be imagined rather than defined. Does Mr. Grey propose to substitute the charming reality of undisguised nature?"

GREY. "We may veil or even conceal nature, as our taste or our notions of propriety dictate; but we can not misrepresent or distort her except at the cost of both beauty and propriety. Look at these full-length portraits of Catherine de Medicis and the Princess Marguerite, daughter of Francis I., of France."

MISS LARCHES. "What dowdies!"

MRS. GREY. "No, not both. Marguerite's dress is pretty in spite of those puffed epaulets upon her shoulders."

MR. KEY. "Strange perversity which sees the dress before the woman! I notice first that the Princess is a beauty, and the Queen a fright."

GREY. "The ladies are right, from their point of view. Those sleeves rising in Catherine's robe above the shoulders are very unsightly, and, in case of the Queen, only complete the expression of the costume, which is a grim and graceless stiffness. The reason of this is that the outline which these sleeves present is directly at variance with that of nature. The peculiar sexual characteristic of this part of woman's figure is the gentle downward curve by which the lines of the shoulder pass into those of the arm. Our knowledge of this enters, consciously or unconsciously, into our judgment of this costume, and we condemn it at once because it is elaborately monstrous. Mr. Key's pretty princess cuts a less hideous figure, because in her case the slope of the shoulder is preserved until the very junction of the arm with the bust; and partly because her bust and waist are defined by her gown with a tolerably near approach to nature, instead of being concealed, as is the case with her royal sister-in-law, by stiff, straight lines, which slant downward on all sides to the ground, making the remorseless instigator of the Massacre of St. Bartholomew look like an enormous extinguisher with a woman's head set on it."

TOMES. "I like the color of Marguerite's dress."

GREY. "Well done, Tomes! You are right.

One great cause of the superiority of her costume is that it presents a contrast of rich color in unbroken masses, while the Queen wears black velvet patched with white satin and elaborately disfigured—ornamented, she would call it—with embroidery, ermine, lace, and jewels."

MISS LARCHES. "It is very ugly."

MRS. GREY. "Hideous."

GREY. "You are very prompt and decided in the condemnation of a costume to which your eyes are unaccustomed; but look at that which you wear, and which I confess that it would be very difficult for you to avoid wearing. Here are two fashion-plates of last month.* Look at that shawled lady. If you did not know that her shoulders are covered with a shawl, and that what surmounts the shawl is a bonnet, you would not suspect the figure to be human. The outlines are just those of a pyramid, slightly rounded at the apex, and nearly as broad across the base as it is high. What is there of woman in such a figure? See, too, this evening full dress."

MR. KEY. "Full enough—at the bottom; but not much dress at the top."

GREY. "Mr. Key will please not interrupt by impertinent observations. This figure brings to mind the enchantments in the stories of the Dark Ages, in which knights were exposed to the allurements of fiends, who are women to the breast, and monsters below. From the head as far as half-way down the waist this figure is natural.

MR. KEY. "Under the circumstances, couldn't be otherwise. Au naturel I should call it, except for a little spice of flowers and lace. Looks like a portrait of Madame la Comtesse l'Epine, whose neck begins one inch and a quarter below her shoulder-blades."

MRS. GREY. "You are exact in your scandal, Mr. Key. How do you know?"

MR. KEY. "Measured. Stood ten minutes behind her at Mrs. Moulton's last crush. Calculation very exact. Shoulder-blades sufficiently prominent. Charley Bang, who's in the Coast Survey, said it was a splendid chance for measurement by triangulation."

GREY. "Well, from a point which may be seen, but need not be named, this figure begins to lose all semblance to a woman's shape. It runs inward in a straight line where nature shows a gentle curve (look again at the Venus), and then suddenly its outlines break into a sharp angle, and form a monstrous non-descript figure, which is not only unlike nature, but has no relations whatever with nature. The merest child sees that no such outline can be produced by drapery upon a woman's form, and that there must be an elaborate framework underneath that dome of silk, and that the woman merely supplies the motive power by which it is made to perambulate. A woman in this rig hangs in her skirts like a clapper in a bell; and I never meet one without being tempted to take her up by the neck and ring her."

MR. KEY. "Some women's dresses are worthy of death; but wringing their necks not the pleasantest mode of inflicting the punishment."

MRS. GREY. "No, Mr. Key; men punish women by ringing of another kind."

GREY. "You mean by what Mr. Bull calls 'the halter of Imen.' But this costume is also faulty in two other important points. It is without pure, decided color of any tint, presenting, on the contrary, an agglomeration of patches and blotches of various mongrel hues—"

MRS. GREY. "Hear the man! That exquisite brocade!"

GREY. "—and whatever beauty it might otherwise have had, of either form or color, would be frittered away by the multitudinous and multiform trimmings with which it is bedizened, and it has no girdle."

MRS. GREY. "O sweet Simplicity! There is no goddess but Simplicity, and Stanford Grey is her prophet. What would your Serenity have the poor woman wear? A white muslin gown with a blue sash, and a rose in her hair? That style went out with stage-coaches and gentlemen drunk under the table."

GREY. "And well it might. For if dress be worthy of any attention at all, it demands colors and forms which require taste to be shown in their arrangement and adaptation. Your woman in white and your man in black are secure from an exhibition of bad taste as your silent folk are sure not to exhibit folly or ignorance. They should have blind folk to look at them, as the others deaf folk to hear them."

MISS LARCHES. "Good Mr. Censor, what then shall we do? You have done nothing but find fault and forbid. Is there not in all this collection a single toilet that is positively beautiful, to be text for a sermon on what is right as well as what is wrong?"

GREY. "Certainly. I'll find you the text immediately, and preach the sermon if you desire it. Here, indeed, are two costumes very unlike, and yet both beautiful. The first the fashions of 1812 and thereabout; the second the dress of this peasant girl of Normandy. Look first at the lady of fashion of 1812 in her evening dress, and remark the adaptation of that beautiful gown to all purposes for which a gown is intended."

MISS LARCHES. "Why do you say 'gown,' Mr. Grey, and Mr. Tomes, too? Nobody else does."

GREY. "Tomes does it for old fashion's sake. I because it describes the garment exactly, which no other English word does. 'Dress' is very vague; it is as applicable to a man as to a woman, to a savage as to a civilized man, and it takes in all that is worn from head to foot. 'Robe' is a French mantua-making affectation: in English it means what kings and judges wear. But 'gown' is just the word, and it has been used for centuries as I use it.—Well, this gown of 1812, how completely it clothes the entire figure, and with what a decorous grace, what ease and comfort to the wearer! The entire person is concealed, except the tip of one foot, the hands, the head and throat, and just enough of the bust to reveal the existence of its feminine charms without exposing them; yet how manifestly there is a well-formed, untortured woman enveloped in those tissues! The waist is girdle-marked just at the proper place; neither just beneath the breasts, as was a few years before and after, nor just above the hips, as it has been for many years past, and as it was three hundred years ago. Compare the figure with those on these fashion-plates of the present day. How the lines of one figure tell of health, and grace, and bounteous fullness of life! and how poor, and mean, and man-made the others seem! Those limbs look free as air, and are so; but there is not a woman of the slightest pretensions to fashion nowadays who, when dressed, can clap her hands above her head any more than if she were Queen Elizabeth. Isn't that true?"

MRS. GREY. "No such woman when she is dressed wants to clap her hands above her head.—Take care, Stanford, you'll topple that Venus down upon me!"

Mrs. Grey springs up and raises her arms to catch the statue. The figure is held firmly by Grey's hand; but there is a sound as of rending and snapping, and Mrs. Grey sits suddenly down, blushing crimson, and looking smile-sheathed daggers at her husband.

GREY. "No woman when she is dressed wants to clap her hands above her head. Now you are only half-dressed—"

MRS. GREY. "Stanford!"

GREY. "Don't you call that a demi-toilet? Only half-dressed, I say, and yet you are powerless to protect yourself against one of the commonest accidents of life, except at the risk of tearing your clothes off your back, and hardly even at that; for the mantua-maker's shackles may prove too strong for you.—But to return to this costume of 1812. Its chief beauty is a trait in which it differs from the costume of the present day, and of most of those of times past, is, that it has, or seems to have, no form of its own. It is mere clothing for the person who wears it, around whose figure it falls in graceful and easy lines; and as these must change with every motion of the wearer for others, also beautiful, the eye is constantly relieved with varying pleasure. Ample, too, as the gown is, it follows the contour of the figure in front sufficiently to taper gracefully to the feet, touching the floor lightly. A side view would show it trailing very lightly."

TOMES. "Consistent critic! You said these costumes were equally beautiful; and yet, while the gown of the 1812 lady touches the floor, and clings in little wrinkles round her feet, the peasant girl's frock is wider at the bottom than any where else."

GREY. "Daniel, you have come to judgment, and shall presently be answered. Meantime notice another trait of the beauty of the costumes of 1811, 1812, and 1813. They are in one, or two, or, at most, three colors; the gowns, the outer garments, and the bonnets or head-dresses, being severally of one unbroken tint; and the trimming that they have is very moderate in quantity, though rich in quality."

MISS LARCHES. "Why, so it is. I should not have noticed that; and yet our dresses are trimmed so much."

MR. KEY. "Chief use of dresses now to display trimming; chief use of women to display dresses. Therefore—"

MRS. GREY. "Yes, I must admit that nowadays a matron could not use the warning which Shakspeare makes Constance address to Prince Louis—

"—the Devil tempts thee here

In likeness of a new, untrimmed bride."

GREY. "Miss Larches's objection is in order. She did not notice the lack of trimming in these costumes because it is not needed to complete the dress or give it character. In a well-designed costume the absence of trimming is never felt, only its presence attracts attention."

TOMES. "But my objection. The Normandy petticoat."

GREY. "Yes, now for my pretty peasant girl. She is not in full holiday costume, perhaps; but she is dressed, as the ladies call it; for though her feet are stockingless, and she carries her shoes in her hand, she is on her way doubtless to some rustic merry-making. Her waist is indicated, but uncompressed. Her shoulders are covered, and she can move her arms at will. In fact, she is entirely at ease in her costume, and unconscious of it, except perhaps for a shy suspicion that it becomes her, or she it."

TOMES. "But how about the expansion and the brevity of that skirt, which cries excelsior to the pink night-gown?"

GREY. "Oh, implacable-upon-the-subject-of-short-petticoats Rhadamanthus, don't you see that your poor victim's arms as well as her legs are bare? And why, if it be the custom, should not one limb be shown as well as the other? That girl's grandmothers and great-great-grandmothers wore skirts of just that length from their childhood to their old age; so why should not she? And the frock is but little shorter than that which good Aunt Sarah split; and do you need assurance of her perfect modesty? As to the expansion of these skirts in comparison with those of 1812, it is inevitable, because they hang but little below the calf of the leg. In both costumes the form of the drapery is determined by the natural lines of the figure, and this is what good taste and common sense demand. In both these costumes the means of locomotion are visible or indicated. But look at a woman nowadays. From the waist down she is a puzzle of silk and conic sections; a marvelous locomotive machine that moves in a mysterious way."

MR. KEY. "Its wonders to perform."

GREY. "And what a simple and harmonious effect of color is this costume! The frock of a rich, low-toned red, positive and pure; the apron, blue; the enviable little kerchief yellow, well suited to her brunette complexion; and that quaint head-dress of a tender green."

MRS. GREY. "But, Stanford, you man, you—"

GREY. "I admit the truth of the accusation."

MRS. GREY. "—don't you see that it is the women that charm you, not their dresses? These women are, in your horrid man's-phrases, fine creatures; they are rounded, lithe, shapely, and—what I've heard you say Homer calls Briseis."

GREY. "White armed, deep bosomed?"

MRS. GREY. "Such women are beautiful in any costume. But how shall puny, ill-made women wear such costumes without exhibiting all those personal defects which our present fashions conceal? You are cruel in your exactions."

MR. KEY. "Cruel, but unfortunately true, that to be beautiful in any costume a woman must be—beautiful."

GREY. "A profound truth of which most women appear to be entirely ignorant. Color may enhance the beauty of complexion; but to devise a costume which shall make ugly women beautiful is past the ingenuity of all the modistes in Paris. What did all the ugly women do between 1811 and 1813? and what those of Normandy for centuries past? Did they look any uglier for their beautiful costume? Ugliness may be covered; but even then it can not always be concealed. And the fashions of the day which you laud as so charitable—as covering such a multitude of sins—do they so kindly veil personal defects? Miss Larches, what is the fashion for evening parties?"

MISS LARCHES. "Why, low neck and short sleeves, of course."

GREY. "And you wouldn't think of going otherwise?"

MISS LARCHES. "Quite impossible! Would you go in a brown frock-coat?"

GREY. "Certainly not."

TOMES. "Why not, Grey? Only because it is not the fashion; and not to be in the fashion is to be a fright and a guy."

THE LADIES. "Good, Mr. Tomes! Served him right! We have him there."

GREY. "Not at all. My brown frock-coat is my working-dress; but an evening party is a festive occasion, for which a festive costume should be worn. If you attack me for wearing such a hideous thing as a dress-coat in conformity to fashion, I admit that I have no defense. But, Mr. Key, you see more of society than Tomes and I together, twice over; what do you find to be the result of this exposure of arms and busts and shoulders, which fashion inexorably declares shall be full-dress?"

MR. KEY. "Emotions of alternate pity and delight. Former in excess."

GREY. "It can't be otherwise until all women are beautiful. A set fashion, to which all feel bound to conform, rigidly preserves the contrasts of unequal Nature. Were it otherwise, every person might adopt a style suited to his or her peculiarities of person, and in this way mitigate and humor defects, but nothing more; for deformity (which is a matter of degree) can by no device be made beauty."

MRS. GREY. "But, Stanford, there are times when—"

GREY. "There are no times when taste and tact can not drape woman's figure so that it will possess some of the attraction peculiar to her sex. But supposing it were not so, how absurd it is to hide the very humanity of all women, at all times, for the sake of concealing in some women the sign of their perfected womanhood at certain times!"

MR. KEY. "Consequences are certainly sometimes astonishing. Mrs. Flounsir was one of a little party on my yacht only two weeks ago, and yesterday—"

MRS. FLOUNSIER.

MRS. GREY. "She sent you word she couldn't go to-morrow. Well, Laura and I will take her place; although I fear you did not take good care of her."

MR. KEY. "Her fault that I wasn't more solicitous. Kept me in utter ignorance, don't you see?"

MISS LARCHES. "But, Mr. Grey, why not put all these very fine notions of yours about toilet, costume, dress, into an essay—with a beginning, a middle, and an end—that might be a sort of rule of life to us poor women who will go about hankering after heterodox bonnets and disloyal dresses? Do vouchsafe us some masculine rules to dress by."

GREY. "I've done it already. Indeed I have printed something of the kind before; and it was my proposal to read it, in its new form, to Cato the Censor here, which brought on the discussion between us which your entrance interrupted, and so pleasantly diverted into the desultory chat we have just indulged in."

TOMES. "We have just indulged in! Hear the fellow! He is like Madame de Staël, who, after talking to a newly-introduced man through a whole evening on a stretch, said that she had rarely met a more agreeable or intelligent person. Her host had omitted to tell her that her new acquaintance was dumb."

GREY. "And Tomes is like Sydney Smith, who met Macaulay one morning at one of Rogers's breakfast parties, when the historian was in one of his most brilliant and communicative veins. The wit hardly got a chance to put in a word; so when, as the party were passing from the breakfast-table to the drawing-room, some one said to him, 'What a magnificent colloquist Macaulay is!' he replied, 'Soliloquist, Sir; soliloquist!' The anecdote is not in print, I believe."

MRS. GREY. "How unfortunate that we should have had Sydney Smith's mortification, without the instruction that compensated it."

GREY. "Or the wit that avenged it."

MISS LARCHES. "A truce! a truce! and let us have the essay."

TOMES. "Yes, Grey, the essay. Mrs. Grey will endure it for our sakes; and I will listen in hopes of finding a seam in your armor."

GREY. "I consent, of course."

Grey opened a drawer in his library-table, and taking out a manuscript of a few sheets, read the following:

"ON THE LAWS OF DRESS.

"To dress is to put in order, to make fit for use; and to dress the body is to give it proper covering. To propriety in dress, comfort and decency are first essential; next, fitness to person and condition; last, beauty of form, color, and material. To seek the last first, is to risk the loss of all; for what is neither comfortable, decent, nor suitable, can not be completely beautiful. Comfort and decency require only sufficient covering; and what is sufficient, climate and custom must determine.

"The two principal requisites of dress being easily attainable, the others are almost simultaneously sought; and dress at the outset becomes, among all people, one of those mixed arts which seek the union of the useful and the beautiful, and which thus hold a middle place between mechanic art and fine art. Of these arts dress is the lowest and the least important: the lowest, because the attainment of perfection in it requires only the lowest order of intellectual endowment and culture; the least important, as having neither intellectual nor emotional significance, and so being without æsthetic purpose; but, as an art, having in view only the temporary sensuous gratification of the eye. Dress, too, is the first decorative art which men attempt to practice; because, as they emerge from the savage state, the acquirement of skill with the distaff, the spindle, the loom, and in dyeing, is the first stage of their advancement. The costumes of half-civilized people—as the shawl of India, the Mexican poncho, the Peruvian reboso, the silken fabrics of China, of Persia, and of Turkey—are unsurpassed for beauty of design, richness of fabric, comfort, and convenience. Taste in dress seems also to be so much a mere matter of instinct, that the diffusion of wealth and the comparative cheapness of textile fabrics has caused it to be no longer a criterion of culture, social position, or even appreciation of the beautiful, except as to costume itself.

“Dress has relations to society and to the individual. It indicates the temper of the time and the character of a people. Wanton looseness of habit and of manners reached their extreme together in the time of Charles the Second; the hollow artificiality of society which crumbled into dust at the French Revolution had its counterpart in the costume which vanished with it; and in the fashions of our own day those of women, contrived less to be beautiful than for the exhibition of reckless expenditure; those of men, cheap and sober-hued, there is expressed the lavish and laborious spirit of the times—the right hand gathering only for the left to scatter. Dress has an appreciable effect upon the mental condition of individuals. The man is best suited to his dress, and the dress to the man, when he is not conscious of it. The consciousness of sordid or unpleasantly-peculiar garments depresses even the wise; the consciousness of rich and gaudy raiment will elate the foolish. Excellence in dress is chiefly relative; for its absolute beauty is quite lost if it is not suited to the person and the position of the wearer, and does not sufficiently correspond to the fashion of his time and country to escape remark for eccentricity. So the elements of its completeness are unknown and variable.

“Comfort and decency in dress need not be insisted on; for maxims were not made for idiots. But clothes should not only be comfortable and decent, but seem so. For as to all others but the wearer, what is the difference between shivering and seeming to shiver, sweltering and seeming to swelter?

“Convenience is a kind of comfort; but it relates more to doing than to being. It is the third essential quality to proper dress. Men should not hunt in Spanish cloaks, and do not, nor should women walk the streets in trailing gowns. No beauty of fashion or material in dress can compensate for manifest inconvenience. Gowns opening before produce a pleasanter impression than those which open behind; for we do not see the lady's maid or husband, and there is an intuitive though unconscious knowledge that the former are convenient, the latter inconvenient. So every proper dress should allow, and seem to allow, the easy performance of all movements natural to the wearer; otherwise it violates the first law of the mixed arts—fitness. Thus children should not be tormented with the toilet, but wear clothes simple in fashion, loose, and inexpensive. It is their right to roll upon the grass and to play in the dirt. Whatever their condition in life, to give them, except upon rare festive occasions, any thing more than clean skins twice a day, and clothes which it will trouble no one to see torn or soiled, is to be vulgarly pretentious, to waste money for the mere sake of showing an ability to waste it.

“Next to convenience is fitness to years and condition in life. Boys and girls who dress like men and women are not less ridiculous, and are far more excusable than old men and women who dress like young ones. In both cases, but especially in the latter, certain failure only exposes folly. All devices to make age look like youth only succeed in depriving age of its peculiar and becoming traits, and leaving it a bloated or a haggard sham. Fixed conditions in life do not exist among us, and are disappearing every where with the advance of Christian civilization. Yet various conditions must to a greater or less degree exist here as elsewhere. Not necessarily higher or lower, but different. Entire fitness and conformity of the seen to the unseen requires that this fitness should have outward expression. The philanthropist may note with pleasure in the abandonment of distinctive costume a sign of social progress, and rejoice that it can not be arrested; but its effect upon the beauty, the keeping, and the harmonious variety and contrast of external life is to be deplored.

“In all arts, whether fine art or mixed art, form is the most important element of absolute beauty. So it is in dress. Unbroken, flowing lines are essential to the beauty of dress, which in every part should correspond to the forms of nature, or be in harmony with them. The general outlines of the figure should be indicated at the least, and no others should be substituted for them. Sharply intersecting lines are inharmonious; and fixed angles are monstrous, except where Nature has placed them at the junction of the limbs with the trunk. A garment which flows from the shoulders downward is incomplete without a girdle. A recent fashion of ladies' dress, the upper line of the gown cutting with pitiless straightness across the undulating forms of the shoulders and bust, the berthe concealing the union of the arms with the body, and adding with its straight lower edge another discordant line to the costume, its long ungirdled waist piercing with a sharp point a puffed and gathered swell below, is an instance of utter disregard of Nature, and deliberate violation of harmony, and the consequent attainment of discord and absurdity in every particular.

“The girdle is in female dress the most important and the most charming accessory of costume—that which most defines the peculiar beauties of woman's form, and to which the tenderest associations cling. Its knot has ever had a sweet significance which makes it sacred. What token could a lover receive which he would prize so highly as the girdle whose office he has so often envied? 'That,' cries Waller—

'That which her slender waist confin'd
Shall now my joyful temples bind.

* * * * *
Give me but what this ribbon bound,
Take all the rest the sun goes round.'

Taste tells us that with this cestus the least attractive woman puts on some of Venus's beauty; sentiment forbids her to discard so true a type of her tender power that its mere lengthening makes every man her servant.

"In distinguishing the sexes by form of costume, long and loose gowns are properly assigned to women, for the concealment of certain peculiarities of the female figure, which might be called defects were it not that they adapt it to its proper functions without diminishing its attractiveness. Its centre of gravity is low; its breadth at the hip great; its base narrow; so that its natural movements, unless the action of the hip and knee joints are concealed, are ungraceful. This may be seen in the antics of ballet-dancers, in whom the movements of the arms, bust, and head are graceful and significant, but those of the legs equally without grace or meaning.

"Color is the point of next importance. Colors have harmonies and discords, like sounds, which must be carefully observed in composing costume. Perception of these can not be taught more than perception of harmony in music; but, like that, if possessed at all, it may be developed and perfected. No fine effects of color are to be attained without broad masses of pure and pleasing tints. These, however, may be set off and relieved by trimming of broken and combined colors, as sauces and condiments give zest to viands. But dresses striped, plaided, or checkered are not in accordance with the dictates of pure taste. Parti-colored costumes might well be left to fools; but fools no longer wear a distinctive costume. The three primary and the three secondary colors—red, yellow, and blue, orange, green, and purple—positive in tint but low in tone, afford the best hues for costume, and are inexhaustible in their beautiful combinations. To these may be added white and black, not properly colors, but effective in combination, and the various tints of brown found in nature. But curiously sought-out tints, without distinctive hue, have little beauty which they do not borrow from the fabric to which they are imparted.

"The effect of the absolute beauty of costume which results from form and color may be entirely frittered away by excess of trimming. This, whatever its costliness, is a mere petty accessory to dress; and the use of it, except to define terminal outlines, as a border at a hem, or to soften their impingement upon the flesh, as soft lace at the throat and wrists, is a confession of weakness in the main points of the costume, or indicates a depraved and trivial taste. When they pretend to beauty in themselves, that beauty, like all other, must be attained by a clearly marked design. Delicacy or richness of fabric will not compensate for the like of this. Not that lace or any other ornamental fabric should imitate exactly the forms of natural objects, but that the conventional forms should be beautiful in themselves and clearly traced in the pattern, as, for instance, in the figures on an India shawl. Akin to trimmings are jewels and all humbler appendages to dress; and if, as common sense would dictate, every part of dress should have a function and perform it, and seem to do so, and should not seem to do that which it does not do, these should be worn only when they serve a useful purpose—as a brooch, a button, a chain, a signet, or a guard-ring; or when they have significance—as a wedding-ring, an epaulet, or an order. But brooch and button must fasten, chain secure, signet bear device, or sink into a pretentious, vulgar sham. So there should be keeping between these articles and their offices. Gold should not be used to secure silver, velvet to shelter linsey-woolsey.

"The human head is the most beautiful and expressive object in nature. At certain times it needs a covering: but in its natural state the less it is decorated the more beautiful it is, and any decoration, whether added to it or made with the hair itself, which distorts its form or is in discord with its outlines, is an abomination.

"Perfumes are no part of dress, but have been made accessory to it from the remotest antiquity. But only a sparing use of the most delicate will free the user from the charge of deliberately contriving to attract attention to the person by addressing the lowest and most sensuous of the senses. Next to no perfume at all, the faint fragrance of roses laid away in drawers, which some women bear about them like sweet memories of faded joys, the scent of lavender, such as Walton tells us filled the chambers of country inns where honest anglers stopped, or of the Cologne water which can not purify Cologne, is to be preferred.

"Dress should be cheerful and enlivening in its general expression; but for adults not inconsistent with earnestness and dignity of character. There is a radical and absurd incongruity between the real condition and the outward seeming of a man or woman who knows and enters into the duties, the joys, and the sorrows of life, and who is clad in a trivial, grotesque, or extravagant costume.

"These, then, are the requisites to dress: comfort, decency, convenience, fitness, beauty of form and color, simplicity, genuineness, harmony with Nature and with itself."

When Grey had finished his essay there was dead silence for a while. The ladies looked puzzled, Mr. Key imperturbable; but presently Tomes broke out:

"I'm sorry for it, Grey, but I can't help saying, that though your essay is a clever bit of writing for you, it's small business for a man to be criticising people's clothes and laying down rules by which folk may make themselves look pretty."

GREY. "And yet the greatest of modern philosophers, whom you so reverence—Bacon—wrote essays on Beauty, on Deformity, on Gardens, Buildings, on Ceremonies, and even on Masques; and the statesman whom you most admire—Burke—wrote a volume upon the Beautiful; and Cousin, one of the leading metaphysicians of our day, has devoted himself to like lucubrations, and not having the fear of Daniel Tomes before his eyes, has dared to maintain that the beautiful and the good are but different manifestations of the same excellence."

TOMES. "Well enough that for a Frenchman and a metaphysician. But Bacon, in his very essay on Beauty, says that 'Virtue is like a rich stone, best plain set;' and that it is not generally found 'that very beautiful persons are otherwise of great virtue.'"

GREY. "You forget that he also says, 'And surely Virtue is best in a body that is comely.'"

MRS. GREY. "The essay was all very fine, and doubtless very true, as well as sententious and profound. But hark you, Mr. Wiseman, to something not dreamed of in your philosophy! We women dress, not to be simple, genuine, harmonious, and all that sort of thing, or even, though you think we do, to please you men, but to brave each other's criticism. And so when the time comes to get our Fall things, Laura and I will wear what is the fashion, in spite of you and your rudiments and elements."

GREY. "I am yet sane, and so have no notion that any woman in her senses is going to deviate from the prevailing mode of dress toward such remote points as grace, simplicity, and nature."

MR. KEY. "Martyrdom without glory. Don't believe that one of the female saints was out of the fashion. A woman will submit to be torn in pieces by wild beasts; but what is that to wearing an unfashionable bonnet? Surprised, Mr. Grey, though; you said nothing about the beautiful costumes which early martyrs must have worn: graceful costumes of Greece and Rome."

GREY. "Nothing more beautiful could be devised. But those costumes are quite out of the question in temperate and cold climates, and among people whose women walk much abroad. Those costumes were suited to men who lived under serene skies, and women who kept constantly indoors. The fashions of France and England from 1795 to 1805 were the result of a headlong recoil toward classic simplicity. The fashion of 1812 owes its grace chiefly to a discreet adaptation of Greek style of drapery to the climate and habits of civilized Europe. But here are five volumes full of beautiful costumes for men and women: Frank Howard's 'Spirit of Shakspeare's Plays.' Few of the compositions have much other merit, but they are all rich in that. See this figure: could comfort, convenience, grace, propriety, and conformity to nature be more completely united?"

LADY PERCY AND NORTHUMBERLAND.

TOMES. "But one part of the essay surprised me much, even from you. For the mere sake of picturesque variety you would brand callings and conditions with a distinctive costume, and so perpetuate the degradation of labor, the segregation of professions, and set up again one of the barriers between man and man. You should have sought your audience on the banks of the Ganges, not on those of the Hudson. This uniformity of costume is the great outward and visible sign of present political equality, and of social equality which is to come."

GREY. "Your democratic zeal makes you forget that the essay recognizes the significance of this uniformity in dress, and deploras it only on the score of the beauty and fitness of external life. Between human progress and variety of costume who could hesitate? But I have thought that uniformity of costume might be not a logical consequence of political equality and diffused intelligence, but the fruit of vanity and petty pride, and at variance with the very democracy from which it seems to spring. For the man who takes pains not to show any mark of his calling contemns it openly; and so does not this endeavor of every man to dress like every other man degrade labor and demoralize the laborer? Our very maid-servants—who trotted over their native bogs shoeless, stockingless, bonnetless, and who work day and night for a few dollars a month—spend all of the wages that the poor creatures don't give to their priests or their families, in hoops, flounced silk dresses, and high-colored bonnets for Sunday wearing."

MRS. GREY. "Do you grudge the poor girls their holiday and their holiday dress?"

GREY. "Far from it. Let us all make life as bright as may be with holidays and holiday dresses. But what has that to do with our all dressing alike? When I meet a French nursery-maid with her white-capped, bonnetless head, a respect for her mingles with my admiration of her head-dress. But when I see other women in the same condition of life flaunting past her in bonnets which are cheap and vulgar imitations of those their mistresses wear, I respect as little as I admire. Why should all men on certain occasions get into dress-coats and stove-pipe hats?—habits so hideous in themselves that he must unmistakably be a man bred to wearing them, if not a fine-looking and distinguished man, who can don them without detriment to his personal appearance."

MR. KEY. "Very reason why every free and enlightened American citizen will sacrifice comfort and his last dollar to exercise his right to wear them. Can't help, either, deciding in his favor. For your idea of a proper costume, Mr. Grey, seems to be a blue, red, or yellow bolster-case drawn down over the head, with a hole in the middle of the closed end for the head, two at the corners for the arms, and a cord about the waist."

GREY. "I don't scout your pattern so much as you expected. Worse costumes in every respect have been often worn. See this beautiful figure of Heloise: the immortal priestess of self-sacrificing love shows a costume which conforms almost exactly to your description."

against you as to the importance of richness in dress. What say you to Shakespeare's 'Costly thy habit as thy purse can buy?'

GREY. "That it is not Shakespeare's advice, but that of a wily, worldly-minded old courtier to his son, at a time when to get on at court and among people of condition a man had need to be richly dressed. That need has passed away. We do not know what Shakespeare thought upon the subject, or what he would have made a Polonius say, had he lived nowadays. But we know that Horace's simplex munditiis—neat simplicity, Nelly—was the expression of his personal admiration."

MRS. GREY. "Yes, the poets are always raving about neat simplicity, or something else that's not the fashion. I suppose they sustain you in your condemnation of perfumes too."

TOMES. "There I'm with Grey, and the poets too, I think."

MRS. GREY. "What say you, Mr. Key?"

MR. KEY. "Always distrust a woman steeped in perfumes upon the very point as to which she seeks to impress me favorably."

TOMES. "At least, Grey [turning to him]. Plautus says, 'Mulier recte olet ubi nihil olet;' which you may translate for the ladies, if you choose."

GREY [As if to himself and Tomes].

"Still to be powder'd, still perfum'd,
Lady, it is to be presum'd,
Though art's hid causes are not found,
All is not sweet, all is not sound."

MRS. GREY. "What's that you're having all to yourselves there?"

GREY. "Only a few lines from one of Rare Ben's daintiest songs."

MRS. GREY. "What do poets know about dress, even when they are poetesses? Look at your friend, the authoress of the 'Willow Wreath,' which she wrote for no other earthly reason that I can see than that her name happened to be Ophelia. What a spook that woman is!"

MR. KEY. "Glad to know at last what that word means. Spook—something lean, long-necked, and ugly, dressed in all the colors of the rainbow at once, and some that are not in the rainbow besides; with a wreath on its head, and cork-screw curls hanging down its back. Something to be approached by men, if at all, with distant and awful respect, and by women with secret exultation."

MISS LARCHES. "In a word, Mr. Key, a spook is a fright; and every ill-dressed woman is a fright."

Here a neat, fresh-looking maid-servant entered, and said, "Please, Ma'am, dinner is served;" and after the expression of a little astonishment at the length of the conference, Mr. Key and Tomes, in answer to an invitation to stop, pleaded engagements, and left Miss Larches to discuss them with her host and hostess over the dinner-table, where plans were laid for future discussions of other departments of Social Æsthetics.

SURRY COUNTY, NORTH CAROLINA.

TRAVELERS note the almost perfect uniformity of the American people in dress, manners, and speech. Within 300 miles of London or Paris there are more variations than can be found from Portland to San Francisco. There are, however, among us some secluded regions, the inhabitants of which present marked peculiarities. Among these is Surry County, up among the Blue Mountains, in the north-western corner of North Carolina. It is a sterile region, with long, cold winters. It was peopled mainly by emigrants from "Old Fudginny," by those who did not profess to belong to "the first families" of the State, and who brought with them and retained all the peculiarities of their homes. An esteemed Alabama clergyman, "who was raised thar," and who under his boyish sobriquet of "Skitt" veils the name of one of the first families of Virginia, has published a clever book, setting forth some of the peculiarities of this primitive people.* It is one of the half dozen clever books of American character and humor, deserving to rank with Judge Longstreet's "Georgia Scenes."

The people are almost wholly agricultural; there are two-thirds as many farms as houses, and less than one slave to a family. In education it probably ranks lowest of any county in the United States. By the census of 1850 it appears that almost one-third of the adult males, and more than half of the females were unable to read and write. They are in blissful ignorance of the latest fashions, making their own garments, material and all. When "Skitt" revisited them, after many years' absence, in 1857, he found "sacks" and "joseys" in full vogue.

Almost the only opportunity which the young men had of seeing any thing of the world beyond was when, in the autumn, a party would harness up their teams and carry their spare produce to the nearest town, some days' journey off. They would camp out at night, and as lucifer-matches had not yet reached them, they were obliged to trust for fire to a brand borrowed from the nearest house. Such a party once encamped near a fine dwelling, and dispatched one of their number to borrow a brand. He was courteously received by the good lady, who made him sit down in a parlor furnished, to his view, most gorgeously, with a carpet and half a dozen "Windsor chairs." When he returned he described his adventure to his companions:

"I tell you, boys, with my dirty britches I sot right smack in one o' the finest Weasler chairs you uver seen in all yer borned days, and my big, mud-bustin, pis-ant-killin' shoes on thar fine carpet looked like two great big Injun coonoos. I'll be poxed ef I knowed how to hold my hands nur feet."

Although uneducated, in the usual acceptance of the term—preferring a rifle and shot-pouch, and, we are sorry to say, an article which they appropriately name "knock-me-stiff" to reading—they are a very clever folk, as their friend "Skitt" shows, and especially on the alert against, as they phrased it, "having the rig put on 'em." Dick Snow was one of the best of them; a fine, manly fellow, with a countenance which bespoke honesty, frankness, decision, and fun. He was "well off," and although he could not read, had a wife who ranked as A. No. 1, and was visited by all the "quality" of the region. Among these were the two pretty daughters of Mesheck Franklin, "the Congressman." One night, when retiring, they bade him "good-night." He did not understand this; but concluded that it was some "rig," which he determined to repay. So he rose early in the morning and stationed himself at the foot of the stairs; and as the ladies appeared, rushed out, exclaiming:

"Good-mornin' at ye, ladies! I's fast anuff for you this time. Now I'll quit ye, as we's even. You got me last night; I's got ye this mornin'."

Odd characters abound in such a community. Foremost among those commemorated by "Skitt" is "Uncle Davy Lane," a tall, heavy, lazy-looking old fellow, whose specialty was telling hunting stories. He was never seen without his "Bucksmasher"—a rough-looking rifle of his own make, for he was a sort of gunsmith; and when once seated would pour out a continuous stream of adventures, most of which had happened to himself, though a few of them he had "hearn." He had certainly never heard of Baron Munchausen, though many of his stories are vastly like those of that veracious narrator; as, for instance, the following about "Pigeon Shooting," which we give in his own words, slightly abridged:

"I mounted old Nip, and mo-seyed off fur the pigeon-roost. I 'ruv thar 'bout two hours by the sun, and frum that blessed hour till chock dark the heavens was dark with 'um comin' inter the roost. It is unconceivable to tell the number on 'um, which it were so great. Bein' a man that has a character fur truth, I won't say how many there was. Thar was a mighty heap uv saplins fur 'um to roost in, which they would allers light on the biggest trees fust, then pitch down on the little uns ter roost. Now jist at dark I thort I'd commence smashin' 'um; so I hitched old Nip to the limb uv a tree with a monstrous strong bridle—a good hitchin' place, I thort. I commenced blazin' away at the pigeons like thunder and lightnin'; which they'd light on big trees thick as bees, bend the trees to the yeth like they'd been lead.

"By hokey! I shot so fast, and so long, and so often, I het old Tower so hot that I shot six inches off uv the muzzle uv the old slut. I seen it were no use to shoot the old critter clean away, which I mout have some use fur agin; so I jist quit burnin' powder and flingin' shot arter I'd killed 'bout a thousand on 'um, fur sure. Arter I'd picked up as many on 'um as my wallets would hold, I looked fur old Nip right smack whar I'd hitched him, but he were, like King Saul's asses, nowhar to be found. I looked a consid'able spell next to the yeth, but, bless you, honey! I mout as well a sarched fur a needle in a haystack. At last I looked up inter a tree 'bout forty foot high, and thar he war swingin' to a limb, danglin' 'bout 'tween the heavens and the yeth like a rabbit on a snare-pole."

"How come him up thar, Uncle Davy?"

"Why, I hitched him to the limb uv a big tree bent to the yeth with pigeons, you num-skull, and when they riz the tree went up, and old Nip with it, fur sure."

"But how did you get him down?" said a listener.

"That's nuther here nor thar; I got him down, and that's 'nuff fur sich pukes as you ter know."

Uncle Davy's exploits with deer were numerous and wonderful. Among them was a Munchausenism about an old buck which he had shot with a peach-stone in default of a bullet; and a few years after he saw the animal again with a fine peach-tree loaded with fruit growing from his shoulders. But we must satisfy ourselves with the following:

"I tuck the sunny side uv the Sugar Loaf. I kep' my eyes skinned all the way up, but nuver seen any thing tell I got nairly to the top, when up jumped one uv the poxtakedest biggest old bucks you uver seen. He dashed round the mounting faster nur a shootin' star ur lightnin'. But, howsomever, I blazed away at him, but he were goin' so fast round the Loaf, and the bullet goin' strait forrud, I missed him. Ev'ry day fur a week I went to that spot, allers jumped him up in ten steps uv the same place, would fire away, but allers missed him, as jist norated.

"I felt that my credit as a marksman, and uv old Buck-smasher was gittin' mighty under repair. I didn't like to be outgeneraled in any sich a way by any sich a critter. I could smash bucks anywhar and any time, but that sassy rascal I couldn't tech a har on him. He were a perfect dar-devil. One whole night I didn't sleep a wink—didn't bolt my eyes—fixin' up my plan. Next mornin' I went right smack inter my blacksmith shop, tuck my hammer, and bent old Buck-smasher jist to suit the mounting, so that when the pesky old buck started round the mounting the bullet mout take the twist with him.

"I loadened up, and moseyed off to try the 'speriment. I 'ruv at the spot, and up he jumped, hoisted his tail like a kite, kicked up his heels in a banterin' manner, fur he'd outdone me so often he'd got raal sassy. I lammed away at him, and away he went round the mounting, and the bullet arter him—so good a man, and so good a boy. I stood chock still. Presently round they come like a streak uv sunshine, both buck and bullit, bullit singin' out, 'Whar is it? whar is it?' 'Go it, my fellers,' says I, and away they went round the Loaf like a Blue Ridge storm. Afore you could crack yer finger they was around agin, bucklety-whet. Jist as they got agin me, bullit throwed him."

THE PIGEON-ROOST.

But Uncle Davy came out strongest in his snake stories. Once, when out blackberrying, he felt something at his bare legs. For half an hour he paid no attention to it, supposing it was the briars. Looking down at last, he found that it was "the biggest rattlesnake that uver was seen or hearn tell on—would a filled a washin' tub to the brim. There he were peggin' away at my feet and legs like he were the hongriest critter on yeth." The upshot was that "I moseyed home at an orful rate: it's no use to say how fast I did run, fur nobody would b'leeve it." Reaching home, he swallowed seven pails of milk and two gallons of whisky, and was never the worse.—We must let him tell at length his wonderful adventure with the "Horn-Snake:"

"I was not thinkin' about sarpunts, when, by Zucks! I cum right plum upon one uv the curiousnest snakes I uver seen in all my borned days. There it lay on the side uv a steep presserpis, at full length, ten foot long, its tail strait out, right up the pres-serpis, head big as a sasser, right toards me, eyes red as forked lightnin', lickin' out his forked tongue, and I could no more move than the Ball Rock on Fisher's Peak. But when I seen the stinger in his tail, six inches long and sharp as a needle, stickin' out like a cock's spur, I thought I'd a drapped in my tracks. I jumped forty foot down the mounting, and dashed behind a big white oak five foot in diameter. The snake he cotched the eend uv his tail in his mouth, he did, and come rollin' down the mounting arter me jist like a hoop, and jist as I landed behind the tree he struck t'other side with his stinger, and stuve it up, clean to his tail, smack in the tree. He were fast.

"Of all the hiss'n' and blowin' that uver you hearn sense you seen daylight, it tuck the lead. Ef there'd a bin forty-nine forges all a-blowin' at once, it couldn't a beat it. He rared and charged, lapped round the tree, spread his mouf and grinned at me orful, puked and spit quarts an' quarts of green pisen at me, an' made the ar stink with his nasty breath. I seen thar were no time to lose; I cotched up old Bucksmasher from whar I'd dashed him down, and tried to shoot the tarnil thing; but he kep' sich a movin' about and sich a splutteration that I couldn't git a bead at his head, for I know'd it warn't wuth while to shoot him any whar else. So I kep' my distance tell he wore hisself out, then I put a ball right between his eyes, and he gin up the ghost.

"Soon as he were dead I happened to look up inter the tree, and what do you think? Why, Sir, it were dead as a herrin'; all the leaves was wilted like a fire had gone through its branches.

"I left the old feller with his stinger in the tree, thinkin' it were the best place fur him, and moseyed home, 'tarmined not to go out agin soon. Now folks may talk as they please 'bout there bein' no sich things as horn-snakes, but what I've seen I've seen, and what I've jist norated is true as the third uv Mathy. I mout add that I passed that tree three weeks arterward, and the leaves and the whole tree was dead as a door-nail."

We have already noted the fondness of the people for "knock-em-stiff." Thereby hangs a good story told by "Skitt." The great occasions of the region were the militia musters held at "Shipp's Muster Ground," between "Big and Little Fisher's Rivers" which give the name to the book. These musters were held in May and November, and all the militia were put through the tactics before the "old Revolutionaries" who survived. These old "'Lutionaries," "Nigger Josh Easley," who sold "gingy cakes," and "Hamp Hudson," who kept a "still-house" running all the year, were the chief attractions of these musters. Hamp had a dog named "Famus," known through all the country. It happened, on a time not long before one of these musters, that Famus fell into one of his master's mash-tubs and was drowned. The rumor ran through all the country that Hamp had distilled the mash in which the dog "was drowned, and was gwine to carry it to the May muster to sell." The report created a powerful sensation, and when muster-day came there was a general determination not to drink a "drap uv Hamp's nasty old Famus lickier." Among the foremost of those who were "down" on Hamp and his liquor was Uncle Jimmy Smith, a lisping old veteran who had been at the storming of Stony Point. "I tell you, boyith," he said, "you can do ath you pleath; but old Jimmy Smith—old Stony Point—ain't a-gwine to tech it." Nigger Josh sold his cakes, and was jubilant; but not a man approached Hamp's stand, and his casks remained untapped. It was a dolorous muster-day. Human nature could endure it no longer, and Uncle Jimmy Smith was the first to break the spell. His speech ran thus:

"Well, boyith, I don't know tho well about thith matter. Maybe we've accused thith feller, Hamp, wrongfully. He hath allers been a clever feller, and ith a pity ef he ith innercent uv thith charge. The fact ith, boyith, it's mighty dull, dry times; nuthin's a-gwine on right. Boyith, you are free men. I fout for your freedom. I thay, boyith, you can do ath you pleath, but ath fur me, old Stony Pint Jimmy Smith, Famus or no Famus, I must take a little."

Jimmy took a little; all took a little; and most took more than a little. The consequences were skinned noses, gouged eyes, and bruised heads. And so ended a famous day in the annals of Shipp's Muster Grounds.

In his gallery of notabilities "Skitt" gives place to John Senter, a cross-grained, crabbed old fellow, who, with Hollin his wife, and a large family, occupied a little cabin near the head of Fisher's River. Personally he seems to have been remarkable chiefly as the inventor of a sort of wooden-soled shoes, which he wore for quite thirty years, when he did not go barefoot. The bottoms were made of dog-wood, an inch and a half thick, studded with iron nails; the vamps of hog-skin, kept soft by 'possum grease; the quarters were of cow-hide. Then there were leggings of buckskin tacked to the quarters, that came up the leg, to keep out the snow in winter, and to ward off snakes in summer, when he went out hunting. Every thing, from bottoms to nails, was of his own manufacture, for he "wouldn't buy nothin' out'n the stores." When, after an absence of many years, "Skitt" paid a visit to his old home, he was desirous of procuring one of these shoes as a memorial. After infinite diplomacy he succeeded; and the shoe, labeled "A Fisher's River Dancing Pump," is now the principal curiosity in the library of "The East Alabama Baptist Female College, Tuskegee, Alabama."

We give place to John Senter chiefly for the sake of describing a wedding which took place in his cabin. He had a son Sol, a poor dwarfish fellow, who had been afflicted with a white swelling, which had left him with a stiffened right leg. He had fixed his affections upon

THE WEDDING.

Sally Spencer, whose left leg had been broken, leaving her equally lame. The story of the wedding shall be told, in an abridged form, by Bob Snipes, another character of the region:

"I was a workin' fur 'Squire Freeman one flinderin hot day, and who should I see but Sol Senter come hop-a-kickin' over the plowed yeth, throwin' his lame leg around like a reap-hook. Says he:

"'Squire, I's come to swap work with you. Times is so hard, and I want's to work a day or two fur you to go as fur as dad's to marry me. I won't ax you to go as fur as Sally's house, which you know is three miles above dad's; but jist go to dad's, and I'll go and fetch Sally down thar. It shall never be said that Sol Senter got 'Squire Freeman to marry him fur nothin,' and it mout be swappin' work mout do jist as well."

The good-natured 'Squire consented; and Sol wrought like a hero, paying in advance his marriage fee. The day for the wedding was appointed, and the 'Squire and Bob made their way to John Senter's cabin.

"We went in," said Bob, "and thar sot John on a short-legged stool in the chimblly corner, lookin' fur all the world like a man that had got out'n his bed wrong eend foremost that mornin'. He was sulky and ashy, I tell you. He hardly axed us to set down. The 'Squire kep' axin' John questions, to try to git him to spill some words, but his jaws were locked, as it were. Hollin and his darter was a-fixin' away, sorter like they was glad, but uvry now and then John kep' flingin' out some uv his slang at 'um 'fur fixin' so much fur them crippled creeturs, that had 'bout as much business a-marryin' as two 'possums.' Last he riz right smack up, and, says he, 'I wouldn't be a-fixin' so much fur a couple uv ground-hogs.' He then moseyed off to a bed, and drew out from under it a whoppin' big gourd, with a great big corn-cob stopper in it. He sot it on the table, got a pewter cup, pulled out the stopper, and 'chug' it went as it come out. I soon larned from the smell on it that it was apple-brandy, and white-faced at that. Jist as John had got in a good-humor from bussin' Mrs. Whiteface, and had begun to spill his words right fast, we looked up the hill toward the Blue Ridge, and we sees Sol and Sally, dressed in thar best, a-comin' down the hill afoot, side and side, and the old lady a-traipin' along arter 'um, Sol throwin' his game leg round one way, from right to left, and Sal a-throwin' hern around t'other way, from left ter right. They kep' good time. Sal's mammy looked mighty loonsome bringin' up the rear. They came in, sat down, and John—ding him!—'peared to be as glad to see 'um as any on us. Soon as they had blowed a little, and had wiped the train-ile out'n thar eyes, the 'Squire he tied the Gougin knot and we all wished 'um much joy, John 'mong the rest. The corn-cob stopper was pulled out'n the gourd, 'chug,' agin and agin, and we kep' bussin' the pewter cup, and we chatted away like blackbirds, 'ceptin' the 'Squire, with 'bout as much sense.

"Dinner cumed next. The pot hadn't bin idle all the time; it kep' bilin' away, pottle, wottle, pottle, wottle. Hollin she sot the table alongside uv the bed, to sarve in the place uv chairs on one side, and a long bench on t'other side, and a short bench on each eend. It was one of these here cross-leg tables—none uv yer quality cuts. John Senter was none uv yer quality men; he opposed and hated all quality idees; nor would he 'low a quality dinner. He wouldn't 'low but one dish, ef the 'Squire was thar. He wouldn't have a pie, nur a puddin', nur nuthin' o' the sort. Hollin she tuck up the dinner, and ding my skin ef it warn't a sureanuff dinner. Thar was a great big pewter dish full uv stewed chicken and rye dumplin's, with chunks uv bacon mixed up, anuff to sorter season it.

The rye dumplin's, some on 'um, was as big as corn-dodgers, and some on 'um which the seasonin' hadn't toch, was tough as whiteleather, and you mout a knocked a bull down with 'um. When dinner was over, the 'Squire and me thought fur decency's sake we wouldn't leave right off, so we sot a little while; but we soon seen that John—ding him!—was a gittin' monstros onpatient. He kep' frivitin' about. Mrs. Whiteface had died away in him, and, ding him! he was too stingy to buss her any more, and the evil sperrit come on him agin. Last he walled up his eyes, and bawled out, 'You Zack! You go and gear up that bull' (John allers plowed a bull; he wouldn't hev a horse), 'and you go to plowin', and I'll go to hoein'.' Arter this speech the 'Squire and me left."

The people of this region must have strong religious tendencies, for we find by the census that the county contains thirty churches—all except three of the Baptist and Methodist denominations. Doubtless among the clergymen there were not wanting many of those brave, self-sacrificing pioneers of the "saddle-bags" to whom the civilization and culture of our frontier districts owe more than to any other men. But to delineate these does not come within the scope of "Skitt's" book. He gives us, however, a few sketches of clerical oddities, which he may do with a good grace, he being himself a minister of the Baptist order. Among these was Parson Bellow, a tall, raw-boned, long-faced, pug-nosed, wide-mouthed person, whose canonicals consisted of a linsey hunting-shirt, with a leathern band around the waist, and buckskin pants. Once on a time a revival was in progress in his church, and one Johnson Snow—a noted character thereabout, who "wanted to know suthin' uv every thing that's gwine on," made his way into one of the parson's night-meetings. Johnson had imbibed pretty freely, and in spite of Bellow's loud voice, and stamps and thumps upon floor and table, fell fast asleep. The "power" came on, and the noise awoke Johnson, who had forgotten where he was, and imagined himself in a "gin'ral row." He leaped up, exclaiming, "Ha! ha! what you about here? What you smackin' yer fists in my face fur? Ha! ha! ef you ar' 'umun, you'd better skin yer eyes and look sharp. I don't 'low man nur 'umun to pop thar fists in my face. Hello! git out'n the track here! I can lick the whole posser-commertatus of yer. Come on, yer cowards!" The congregation began to leave, which made Johnson more furious than ever. Looking around, he saw that the parson was the only man that remained. Marching up to him, he yelled out:

"Ha! ha! Beller, you're the ringleader uv all this devilment. You're the biggest rascal in this crowd. I can lick you, Sir, any day, any minnit." Rubbing first one fist, then the other, in the parson's face, he continued: "Smell uv yer master! Smell uv yer mistiss! Smell uv yer master! Smell uv yer mistiss! Ha! ha! no fight in you? You're a purty feller, to raise a row with a peaceubble man, and then won't fight it out! Mosey! Trollop! Git out'n here, you dinged old sloomy Yahoo!"

Uncle Billy Lewis deserves to be mentioned among the preachers—though his clerical functions continued only a short time—on account of one of his sermons reported by "Skitt." He was born near the "Huckleberry Ponds" toward Fayetteville; but an unlucky event forced him to leave his home and take up his residence among the Blue Mountains. The accident was this: One dark night he was out "fire-hunting" for deer, and seeing a number of bright eyes reflected from his torch, he fired upon them. Unfortunately the animals proved to be his neighbor's horses. Billy no sooner saw his mistake than he dropped his rifle and ran. The result he shall tell himself:

"I run on, come to mud-pond, and in I went, sock! sock! sock! last up I go to my armpits, and could go no further. Men come up and say, 'Here he went, boys! here he went!' 'I lay in the mud, still as a turkle, till they lost me. When they left me I tried to git out—had a hard time of it. Thar stood a jacker-mer-lantern grinnin' at me. I rake mud, fust with one hand, then with t'other—rake, rake. Last out I cum, muddy as a hog. I went home, told the fambly, left that night, fambly folered, and all the poor men got for my shootin' thar hosses was my rifle and torch-pan. That was a mem'ble night—never forgit—never fire-hunt since."

Uncle Billy, who was a Baptist in good and regular standing, made up his mind that he had a "call" to preach. His brethren thought otherwise; but some of the young fellows encouraged him to hold forth. He followed their advice, and drew crowds for a while. Among his encouragers was one Jim Blevins, who used to "put up" the simple old man in subjects and matter. One evening before meeting Jim told Uncle Billy of a terrible sight which he had just seen, and urged him to make it the subject of warning to the people. The preacher complied; and here follows a report of the sermon, omitting the "doctrinal part."

"Sinner, you'd better 'pent! Danger abroad! Look out, I tell ye. Skin yer eyes good. Open yer ears wide. Listen, that you may hear. Your blood mout be 'quered o' me. O my soul!—Jim Blevins went on Fisher's Peak this mornin', and what did he see? He seen a flyin' snake—drefful critter—twelve foot long, stinger 'bout a feet long, eyes red like balls o' fire, lookin' fust this way, then t'other, to see what he could see, and a-squallin' wusser nur a painter—O sinner, 'pent!—'pent, I tell you, else yer a gone sucker. For sartin and for sure, ef he pops his stinger inter you, yer gone world 'thout eend.

"But, sinner, flyin' snakes is mighty bad; bad as they is, howsomever, 'tain't nothin' to what Jim Blevins seen arter that. Jim, soon as the flyin' snake went out'n sight, he run over back o' Fisher's Peak, and—O my soul!—what did he see? A yahoo, sinner—a yahoo! Jim hid, and it past along close by, and it was high as a house, horns ten foot long, mouf big as a hogshead—'pent, sinner, 'pent! It run by Jim, hollerin' 'yahoo! yahoo! louder nur cannon at the battle o' Guilford Court House, whar Wallis was fout by Greene. Jim says the way he kills folks—sinner, 'pent!—he gits you on his horns, he tossee up—he tossee up, jist like trouncin' a bull-frog, till life clean gone—'pent, sinner, 'pent!—then he'll take you in his mouf, and he'll lick you down like a hongry bar does a piece o' honey-comb, as Jim Blevins says. Sinner, I've warned you; I'm clare o' yer blood. Ef that flyin' snake or that yahoo gits you, you can't blame me fur it. No, don't blame the old man nur Jim Blevins."

The above discourse came to the ears of Uncle Billy's church, and they "called in his gift." With one more clerical story which "Skitt" tells of his own denomination, the Baptists, we take leave of Surry County. A man by the name of Walker felt himself moved to preach, and looked out earnestly for some "call" from on high. One day he retired to a thick grove to "wrestle" with the subject. While there, a donkey who happened to be near by set up a most outrageous braying. To Walker's excited imagination these dulcet sounds were an angel's voice, and were transformed into articulate words, conveying the long-sought "call." He went forthwith to his church, and demanded a license, when the following dialogue took place between him and his pastor; the result being that the validity of the call was recognized, and Brother Walker was duly appointed to the ministry:

"PASTOR. Do you believe, Brother Walker, that you were called of God to preach, 'as was Aaron?"

"WALKER. Most sartinly I does.

"PASTOR. Give the Church, that is, the bruther-ing, the proof.

"WALKER. I was mightily diffikilted and troubled on the subjeck, and I was detarmined to go inter the woods and wrestle it out.

"PASTOR. That's it, Brother Walker.

"WALKER. And while there wastlin', Jacob-like, I hearn one ov the curiousest voices I uver hearn in all my borned days.

"PASTOR. You are on the right track, Brother Walker. Go on with your noration.

"WALKER. I couldn't tell for the life ov me whether the voice was up in the air ur down in the sky, it sounded so curious.

"PASTOR. Poor creetur! how he was diffikilted. Go on to norate, Brother Walker. How did it appear to sound unto you?

"WALKER. Why, this a-way: 'Waw-waw-ker—waw-waw-ker! Go preach, go preach, go preach, go preach-ee, go preach-ah, go preach-uh, go preach-ah-ee-uh-ah-ee.'

"PASTOR. Bruther-ing and sisters, that's the right sort of a call. Enough said, Brother Walker. That's none ov yer college calls, nor money calls. No doctor ov divinity uver got sich a call as that. Brother Walker must have license, fur sartin and fur sure."

WRECKED AND RESCUED.

IT was a dark night of December, 1790, and the clock in the study of Rev. Isaac Hepworth, the clergyman of a New England sea-coast town, had already struck the hour of twelve, when that divine finished and laid within his desk the sermon on which he had been too busily engaged to note the lapse of time.

Late as was the hour, the Rev. Isaac did not immediately retire to sleep, choosing rather to rest his weary brain and relax his constrained muscles beside the cheerful fire. So, throwing on another log, he wheeled round his study chair, settled himself comfortably therein, and placed his slippered feet upon the fender.

"A-h! This is comfort!" murmured the Rev. Isaac Hepworth, neatly folding the skirts of his dressing-gown across his knees.

Some fifteen minutes of intense quiet passed, and the clergyman, succumbing to the united temptations of fire, chair, and weariness, was dropping into a luxurious doze when he was suddenly and thoroughly aroused by a low tap upon his study window.

Springing to his feet a little nervously, Mr. Hepworth drew aside the curtain and peered out. A man's face, dimly visible in the darkness, was pressed close to the glass, and met the clergyman's astonished gaze with a reassuring nod.

"Oh, Jarvis, is it you? Wait, and I'll let you in."

Jarvis nodded again, and, falling back into the gloom, went round to the door, which Mr. Hepworth had opened very quietly, that he might not disturb his sleeping household.

"Well, Jarvis, what's the matter?" asked he, anxiously, when the two were shut into the snug little study.

"Why, something very queer's the matter,

Sir, and I'm right glad I found you up, for, according to my reckoning, the fewer that's let into it the better; and as soon as I see the lights in these winders, I said to myself, 'There, there won't be no need for Miss Hodson's knowing nothing about it.'

"About what, Jarvis?" asked Mr. Hepworth, mildly, as his sexton paused to enjoy the satisfaction of a vulgar man who possesses a secret which he intends and yet grudges to impart.

"Well, Sir, it wan't more than half an hour ago, and I was snug in bed sleeping as sound as any babe, when my wife she nudges me, and says she,

"'John,' says she, 'there's some one a knocking at our door.'

"'Pho! go to sleep, woman, and don't be disturbing me with your silly dreams,' says I; for I didn't like to be woke up, Sir; and I was just a going off agin, when sure enough I heard a kind of softly knock on my front door, sounding just as if some one wanted to wake us up, and yet hated to make a noise.

"Well, I jumped up and h'isted the window.

"'Who's there?' says I.

"'A friend,' says a man's voice, though I couldn't see no one 'cause of the dark.

"'Hain't you got no name?' asks I, kind of sharp, for it's a main cold night, Sir, and I wan't overly comfortable.

"'That's of no consequence. I want to speak with you, if you're the sexton of Mr. Hepworth's church, and you shall be paid handsomely for the trouble of dressing and coming down,' says the voice.

"Well, Sir, I considered that it wan't no ways Christianly not to hear what a feller-creter had to say, ef he wanted to say it bad enough to come out sech a night; and so says I,

"'Hold on, and I'll come down soon's I've put on my trowsers.'

"So I shet the winder, and though my wife she wan't no ways willing, and took on consid'able for fear 'twas a plan to rob and murder, or else a ghost, I bade her hold her tongue, and down I went, and jest stopping in the entry to say over a prayer and a verse, I ondid the door and held up my candle to the face of the man that stood outside.

"He was young and no ways frightful to look upon, and he says right off,

"'That's right, my friend,' and he put this 'ere piece of money in my hand [showing a golden guinea]; and says he,

"'Now, I want you to come right along to the church, and open the door for me and my companion to go in, and then you must summon the clergyman to perform a marriage ceremony.'

"'Why, Sir,' says I, 'ef so be's you want to be married, why can't you go to the tavern and wait till morning; or ef suckumstances is sech as you can't wait, go to the minister's own house and be married in his study. Folks here don't never go to the meeting-house sech times, and more'n all, it's as cold and colder there than 'tis outer doors.'

"Upon that, Sir, the man he got kind of impatient, and says he,

"'Friend, it ain't advice I want of you but sarvice.' And with that he put inter my hand this other piece of money."

And the sexton complacently displayed a second guinea.

"Well, Sir, upon that I considered, as I didn't know any thing onlawful in a man's being married in a meeting-house at twelve o'clock at night, ef so be as he was a mind to, and the minister was a mind to marry him, so says I,

"'Well, Mister, you wait outside till I get my lantern, and I'll show you the way to the meeting-house and let you in, and then I'll go and tell the minister about it, and ef so be as he's a mind to come, why he will; and ef he ain't a mind to, why he won't.'

"'Has he a wife?' says the man next.

"'No, he hain't,' says I.

"'Have you a wife, then, goodman?' says he.

"'Yes, I have,' says I. 'And a good wife, too. It's she that was the widder Jones, and darter to old Samwel Rubbles of this town.'

"I was a going on, when the man he broke right in.

"'Can you persuade her to rise and accompany us to the church?' says he.

"'Lord, Sirs,' says I, right out (for which I hope I'll be forgiven), 'what upon earth ken you want o' her?'

"'My companion, the young lady that is to be my wife, should have the support of a woman's presence at such a time; and besides that, it is necessary to have two witnesses to the marriage,' says the man.

"'Wa'al, I don't know jest what to say,' says I, kind o' considering, and, Sir, that man he slips this other piece o' money inter my hand." And from his dexter pocket the venal sexton extracted a third guinea, and added it, with a humorous air of innocent astonishment, to the two already in his right hand.

"And then you went and called your wife?" suggested Mr. Hepworth, dryly.

"Why, yes, Sir. I considered that it was hard for a young woman to go and be married in a meeting-house at twelve o'clock at night and no women folks about; and I conceited that Marthy like enough would take a notion to go, and be kind of riley ef I didn't give her the chance; and more'n all, I heerd her jest then call my name mighty softly over the balusters. So says I, 'Wa'al, I'll go sec,' says I; and I shet to the door and went up stairs, and there was Marthy dressing herself faster'n ever I see her before, and all fer hurrying me off to get you."

"And were the strangers all this time out in the biting cold?" asked Mr. Hepworth, reprovingly.

"Why, yes, Sir. I thought 'twas safest so, for we never know what shape Satan may come in to destroy us, and I felt more kind o' easy to keep 'em outside. Marthy, when she got dressed, she went down and asked 'em in, but it wan't no wish of mine, nor she didn't stop to ask my leave. Women folks is dreadful kind o' headstrong sometimes, Sir, though I 'spose you hain't never had no call to find it out," said the sexton, sighing.

"And these strangers, where are they now?" asked the clergyman, who, already cloaked and hatted, stood with the door in his hand waiting for his companion to precede him.

"In the meeting-house," said Mr. Jarvis, taking the hint, and passing out. "They wouldn't come in noways; but when I went out, the man he told us both to get inter a kerridge he had out in the road, and there was the young woman all curled away in one corner a crying; and the driver he druv right straight to the meeting-house as ef he'd been there afore. So I onlocked the door and lit a candle, and left 'em all there while I came to tell you, Sir."

"You would have done better, friend, in putting the end of your story nearer to the beginning," said the clergyman, a little indignantly. "We might have relieved the discomfort and anxiety of these poor people half an hour ago if you had been less diffuse in your narrative."

To this reproof John Jarvis listened in respectful though puzzled silence—a silence lasting until the two approached a bare, bleak, uncomely edifice—the universal type of the New England meeting-house of seventy years ago. A feeble light shone through the uncovered windows, and, pushing open the door, Mr. Hepworth stepped inside, not without a shiver at the deadly cold far more insupportable than the keen but living air without.

The bridal party (strange misnomer) were seated in a pew near the upper end of the church, and rising, as the quick step of the clergyman sounded hollowly up the uncarpeted aisle, they stood ready to receive him.

Foremost was a man of about thirty years of age, tall, handsome, and of gentlemanly bearing. Behind him followed the sturdy helpmate of John Jarvis, tenderly supporting a girlish figure with veiled face, whose stifled sobs attested her agitation.

"Mr. Hepworth, I believe," said the stranger, in a voice harmonizing well with his appearance.

"That is my name," said the clergyman, mildly. "Can I render you any service consistent with my duty, Sir?"

"The greatest. I wish to be married at once to this young lady. We are to sail for Europe on the morning tide. A boat now waits to convey us on board, and our passage is taken as man and wife. Our right to that position rests now with you."

"But you will surely tell me, Sir, the cause of this very unusual manner of proceeding? Are the young lady's parents aware of the step she has taken?"

"They are not, Sir," returned the stranger, firmly. "Her only parent, a father, is, on the contrary, bitterly opposed to my claims, and would force his daughter into another marriage as 'abhorrent to her feelings as to humanity.

She is of age to decide for herself, but has not the courage to openly maintain her rights in presence of her father. She has chosen me, and no power on earth shall prevent her from becoming my wife. If you refuse to perform the ceremony, we must embark unwedded, to the scandal of all who may hereafter hear the tale, and trust to have our marriage solemnized upon the other side the water."

"That were, indeed, a scandal!" ejaculated the clergyman, with horror.

"And yet to that extremity shall we be driven unless you will at once make us man and wife," said the stranger, coolly, as he drew out his watch and held it in the dim light of the candles. "It is now hard upon half past one. At two we are to take boat."

Mr. Hepworth turned to the bride.

"Daughter," said he, softly. "Have you considered what you do?"

"Yes, Sir. I hope I shall be forgiven," sobbed the girl.

"And is it your resolve, should I decline to solemnize so strange a marriage, to follow this man across the sea unwedded, at the imminent peril of your fair fame here, and eternal happiness hereafter?" asked the minister, solemnly.

The sobs became convulsive in their strength, but presently the timid voice again whispered,

"Yes, Sir. But you will not refuse—oh, will you?"

Mr. Hepworth walked nervously up and down the open space before the pulpit, and then returning to the group said, impressively,

"I will not refuse my ministration here; for if your avowals are an earnest of your intentions, I shall, by refusal, tempt you to a deeper sin than disobedience: but I warn you both, and especially you," turning to the bridegroom, "who, as the stronger and more responsible party, should bear the greater blame, that God's blessing rests not on those who seek it while openly violating His commands; and of these obedience to parents ranks next to obedience to Himself."

"Enough, Sir. We are not to be dissuaded from our purpose," replied the bridegroom, haughtily: adding more persuasively after a momentary pause: "And even by your own precept we are justified; for in choosing each other, and in resisting those who would separate us, we feel to be obeying the voice of God, even in opposition to that of a parent."

Mr. Hepworth to this argument opposed only a gesture of deprecation, and immediately took his place in front of the pulpit. As silently the others ranged themselves before him.

"Will you uncover your face, daughter?" asked the clergyman, kindly, as the bride showed no inclination to raise the veil behind which she had hitherto sheltered. Now, however, she immediately removed it, and the eyes of all her companions centred upon her face—those of the clergyman with benevolent scrutiny, of the Jarvises with broad curiosity, of her bridegroom with tender and sympathizing love.

It was a lovely face—pale now and disfigured by weeping, but undeniably beautiful, and, as Mr. Hepworth said to himself, not wanting in a latent strength such as the trials in the new path on which she now was entering might speedily render needful.

"Your name, my dear?" asked he, after a moment's attentive observation.

"Hope Murray," said the girl, faintly, a soft color stealing into her cheek beneath the gaze of all those eyes.

"And yours, Sir?"

"Miles Tresethen," said the stranger, meeting with unblenching gaze the look of severest scrutiny with which Mr. Hepworth turned from that fair childish face to that of the man who, as he had inly decided, had tempted her to her present rebellious disobedience. And yet Mr. Hepworth's growing anger paused, and even retrograded, as he met those clear, fearless eyes, noted the noble if proud bearing of the handsome head—came, though unconsciously, under the powerful influence of that presence.

"Judge not that ye be not judged," flashed through the clergyman's mind, and with a little sigh, he said, quietly,

"Take each other by the right hand." And in a few moments thereafter he gravely kissed the bride, saying, "May you be as happy, my dear, as an old man's wish can make you; and may your fault be forgiven you as freely as I would forgive, did it rest with me to do so!"

For an instant the girl clung about his neck as if he had been indeed her father, and then turned to her husband.

"We could not help it," said she, simply. "We loved each other so, and we were so unhappy."

"Good-by, Sir," said Tresethen, extending his hand, and grasping warmly that of the clergyman. "Accept my thanks—our thanks, for the sacrifice you have made to-night of prejudice to necessity. Never doubt that, on sober second thought, conscience will acquit you of all wrong."

"Can you speak as boldly for yourself?" asked Mr. Hepworth, dryly.

The bridegroom paused. The bride uplifted to his her tear-stained face.

"Before God I believe that I have done right," said Tresethen, solemnly; and the clergyman added nothing more except, "God bless you!" as he parted at the church-door with the newly-married couple.

"And here's another piece of money he give me as we came down the aisle behind you and the young woman," said John Jarvis, while the minister and he stood upon the steep steps of the meeting-house, listening to the quick rattle of the wheels whirling down the stony road toward the water; "and he said I was to come right along, and take the kerridge and hosses when they left 'em (that's his servant a-driving, Sir), and fetch 'em to you, and put 'em at your disposal, he said, Sir."

"At my disposal, Jarvis!"

"Yes, Sir. Give 'em to you, you know, Sir."

"But I do not wish for them, Jarvis. I can not take them—indeed I will not. Go at once to the landing, and tell Mr. Tresethen that it is out of the question for me to accept his present, and ask what other disposal shall be made of the property."

Sexton Jarvis sped away, while his dame turned silently homeward, as did Mr. Hepworth, his brain whirling with the excitement of the two last hours.

As he reached the house he paused, and waited some moments without, although the rich red firelight streamed invitingly from the study window, and the night was bitterly cold.

But the rattle of distant wheels had reached his ear, and he stood patiently waiting until John Jarvis carefully checked the handsome horses close beside their reluctant owner.

"He won't take no for an answer," said the sexton, importantly. "And when I says, says I, 'Tan't no use. The minister says he can't nor he sha'n't take 'em;' he says, says he, 'Tell him they are his. He may use them himself, or sell them and give their price to the poor, but I have no more control over them.'"

"And is he gone?" asked Mr. Hepworth, anxiously.

"Yes, Sir. There was a boat waiting at the wharf (though the ship she belongs to must have run in sence dark. There wan't none in the harbor at dayli't down), and they was aboard when I come—that is, the man and his wife. The one that druv stood holding the horses till I came, and then he chucked the reins inter my hand and jumped inter the boat. The sailors pushed off, and in a minute more I couldn't hev told that there'd ever ben any sech doin's ef it hadn't ben for the hosses and kerridge. What's to be done with 'em, Sir?"

"Why, we must put them in my little stable for to-night," said Mr. Hepworth, reluctantly. "And if there is really no owner for them but myself, I shall follow the suggestion of this strange young man, and sell them for the benefit of the poor of this parish. God knows they need relief."

Two days elapsed, and again Mr. Hepworth sat alone beside his study fire, this time in the daylight, thinking of the strange event so lately transpired, and anxiously pondering his own share therein, when a loud knock at the front door attracted his attention, and presently a stranger was ushered into the study.

This was a tall, stout man of middle life, with scowling brows, sanguine complexion, and a choleric expression, whether habitual or temporary Mr. Hepworth found it impossible to determine.

"You're Mr. Hepworth?" began the stranger, as soon as the door had closed behind him.

"Yes, Sir. Will you sit down?" said the clergyman, mildly.

"No, I won't. I want to know if you married my girl to that d—d scoundrel of an Englishman, who's carried her off."

"Sir, I shall answer no questions until you remember the decent respect you owe to my cloth, if you choose to lay aside higher obligations," said the clergyman, severely.

"Well, well, beg your pardon, Sir, and all that; but it's enough to make a man swear. You have not told me yet whether you married them."

"I married Miles Tresethen and Hope Murray two nights ago, in the parish meeting-house of this town," said the minister, quietly.

"And by— Well, I an't going to swear, but what right had you to do so?"

"I did so because both parties assured me that Miss Murray was of age, that she chose to marry Mr. Tresethen in preference to any one else, and that they should certainly embark within half an hour in a vessel then awaiting them, married or unmarried. Should you have preferred so equivocal a position as that for your daughter, Mr. Murray?"

"What was the name of that vessel?" asked the angry man, waiving reply to the clergyman's question with an impatient gesture.

"I do not know, Sir."

"Perdition take them! I'll have 'em yet. I'll sail to-night—I know a ship. I'll be in England as soon as they, and I'll have her back if I kill that villain first. Disobedient jade—worthless trollop—"

"Mr. Murray, I must request you to leave my study and my house," exclaimed the mild Hepworth, with unwonted energy, as the pale, sweet face of Hope Murray rose to his memory from amidst this sea of angry words and epithets.

"But I tell you, Sir, that my life was bound up in that girl, and now she's gone. I should die if I couldn't swear!" exclaimed the father, with vehement simplicity. "I had such plans for her—I had such a match in view. She'd have been the first lady in the States in time. And now to go off with that miserable fellow—an Englishman too!"

"What are your objections to Mr. Tresethen, may I ask? I judged him very favorably in our brief interview," said Mr. Hepworth, pitying the genuine sorrow visible through all the offensive manner of the man.

"Why, Sir, his father was a Tory and a refugee. He came here a young man and made a fortune, then, when our troubles broke out, and I and others left all our own concerns and took up arms to fight for our freedom and our liberty, this miserable Englishman quietly transferred his ill-gotten gains to his own country, and skulked off after them. Then, with the devil's own luck (your pardon once more, Sir), he inherited a fine estate and lived in luxury, while our brave fellows, Sir, were eating their own shoes at Valley Forge, and tracking the snow with their bloody feet as they marched on without 'em. Then, when the war's all over, and matters settled down again, back comes this fellow, this Miles, who had been left in England for his education while his father was living here, to inquire after some landed property that the old fellow couldn't carry with him when he ran away, and was afraid to sell. My girl met him, Sir, fell head over heels in love with him, and forgot her duty, her home, and her old father to run after him to the ends of the earth. But he sha'n't have her—he sha'n't keep her. I told 'em both, when they came asking my consent and all that, I never would consent—never, to my dying day, nor I won't."

"But if Mr. Miles Tresethen was educated in England, and never lived in this country at all, surely he need not share the odium of his father's desertion," suggested Mr. Hepworth.

"Well, perhaps not, but at any rate he's an Englishman, and we've had enough of Englishmen. I hate 'em, from the king upon his throne down to the meanest soldier in his army. We've all given our strength, and our hearts, and some of us our lives to getting rid of 'em, and clearing 'em out of the country, and now do you think I'm going to give my only child to one of 'em? Not I, Sir. I'll have her back. I'll get her divorced. I'll undo the knot you was so foolish as to tie, Sir. I'll have justice, and I'll have my girl."

And his anger having regained its full heat, temporarily checked by the calm presence of the clergyman, Mr. Murray was rushing indignantly from the room when he was checked by his host, who recounting briefly the incidents connected with the carriage and horses, requested that he would take them and dispose of them as he would.

But at this request the ire of the injured father reached its height; and with vehement protestations that horses, carriage, Englishman, and all should go to a very unpleasant place before he meddled with them, he slammed out of the house, leaving Mr. Hepworth to recover at his leisure from the horrified consternation into which he had been thrown.

Out on the wild Atlantic a hunted ship flew before the howling storm that rushed madly after. All day and all night and all another day the trembling quarry had sped on, and now at sunset of the second day the storm seemed gathering fresh strength, as if resolved at once to end the conflict by one overpowering effort.

It was the Roebuck, the ship on which James Murray had hastily embarked in pursuit of his daughter and her English husband; and as he now at nightfall came on deck and looked anxiously about, marking the fiercer gloom of sea and sky, the disordered ship and sullen crew, he remembered again the warning he had received just before sailing against trusting himself at sea with such a captain and such a crew; and, after the fashion of angry men, he cursed anew the cause of his present peril.

"If it hadn't been for that d—d Englishman," said he, "I should not have been here. And where is Hope—poor child!—and if she is lost, who will be her murderer? Who but that villain that tempted her away? I'll have his heart's blood yet—trust me but I will!"

"Well, Mr. Murray, what did you see on deck?" asked a husky voice, as that gentleman painfully descended the companion-ladder into the cabin.

"I saw every thing except the Captain," returned Murray, gruffly, casting a scowling glance at the bottle and tumbler sliding about upon the table.

"Ha, ha! that's meant for me, eh? Well, I'm just going up, though I don't know what in thunder to do when I get there, except what's been done already. Won't ye have a glass, Mr. Murray?"

"No, Sir!" returned the passenger, sternly. "If we are all to be swept into eternity before morning, as I expect, I for one will go like a man, and not like a brute."

"H-m! Surly devil! Go on deck to get rid of you, if nothing else," muttered the Captain, as he climbed the steep steps with more than usual difficulty.

Mr. Murray, after watching his clumsy movements with an expression of angry disgust until he had disappeared on deck, entered his own state-room, changed his dress, put his papers and money into an oilskin belt girt about his body, tied on his excellent life-preserver, and wrapping a heavy cloak about him, ascended in his turn to the deck.

The hour that had elapsed since his previous visit had wrought no material change. Perhaps through the intense blackness of the night the monotonous sweep of the wind sounded more fearfully; perhaps the leaping waves snatched more hungrily at their prey in the sheltering darkness; perhaps the doomed ship groaned more audibly and intelligibly; at least these things seemed so to the passenger, who now clung to the main shrouds and threw piercing glances hither and thither through the night. Sheltered beneath the windward bulwark crouched the Captain with his chief mate, their position only to be determined by their voices as they shouted an occasional order to the men, who sometimes sullenly obeyed, sometimes in the darkness contented themselves with muttering that it was impossible. At last a man came staggering aft with the request, or rather demand, from his comrades for the key of the spirit-room. It was received with an oath of denial, and the man sullenly withdrew; but the demand had aroused the officers to a sense of their imminent peril, as the storm had failed to do.

The Captain, rising with difficulty to his feet, began to make his way toward the hatch, intending to descend and broach the casks, well knowing, drunkard as he was, that if once the men gained access to them his shadow of control over them was lost, and with it all hope for the ship and those in it. As he passed Murray the latter said, indignantly,

"Why don't you have lanterns placed in the rigging, and send that look-out man back to his duty? He has left it to plot mutiny with his comrades there on the forecastle. We shall all be murdered next, if you don't show some authority."

To this perhaps unwise but very natural reproof the angry skipper retorted with a string of oaths and coarse abuse, bidding his passenger attend to his own concerns, and expressing a hope that, in case of mutiny, he might become the first victim.

Mr. Murray turned contemptuously from him, and again fixed his eyes and his attention upon the dense mass of blackness ahead, into which the hunted ship was wildly plunging, trembling at every leap.

As Murray's attention again became fixed upon the night, he was aware of a new sound added to the wild swirl of winds and waves. A heavy rushing sound—a hissing of the waters as they parted perforce before some swift-advancing object—a shrieking of the wind as it tore through the shrouds, not only above his head but beyond in the black unknown. Murray fixed his straining eyes upon the point whence these sounds approached. Yes, a great black mass, shapeless and ominous as terror itself, bore down upon them, the seething waves and shrieking wind singing jubilee over the destruction in its path. On it came—there was no more doubt.

"Ship ahoy!" shouted Murray. "Helmsman! mate! bestir yourselves! Ahoy! ahoy there!"

The wind snatched the words from his lips, rent them to fragments, and flung them scoffingly back upon him. It was barely that those in his own ship heard him, and then the mate, staggering to his feet, gazed blankly at the doom impending so closely over them a full minute before he shouted to the helmsman through his trumpet,

"Port there! port, you villain! port, you dog!"

It was too late. Before the man could obey the order fully, before the leaping ship could be put off her course, before one-tenth of that ship's crew knew that Death had laid his hand upon their garments, and claimed them for his own, the blow had fallen. The unknown ship, swerving slightly, as those on board her discovered too late the obstacle in their path, and vainly strove to evade it, came crashing down upon the Roebuck, amidst a wild confusion of sea and wind, of human shrieks and cries and oaths, of splintering wood and falling masts. Then, carried on by her fearful impetus, the stranger, cutting through the doomed Roebuck, passed on into the blackness, with no power, had she the inclination, to render assistance to her victims.

Seizing a spar that mercifully would have dealt him a death-blow, James Murray found himself floating in the water, surrounded on every side by drowning men and fragments of the shattered vessel. Clinging to his spar, he struggled to maintain his head above the blinding waves that sought to bury him while yet quick in the grave beneath his feet, and he succeeded.

The storm soon scattered the few survivors of the wreck who had not at once been drowned; and when at last the morning broke, and Murray, raising himself as well as he was able upon the spar, looked despairingly about him, no trace remained of ship or company—nothing but the wild waste of waters, stretching far away to where on the horizon line the great waves reared their crests upon the sullen sky.

"Worse than death—worse a thousand times!" groaned the desolate survivor; and for a moment he was tempted to release himself from spar and life-preserver, and sink at once, escaping thus the torturing hours lying between him and the almost inevitable end. But in the powerful organization of the man vitality was strong and deeply seated; and after his first weak terror at the gloomy prospect, James Murray summoned his strength, and resolved to die, if die he must, when no farther efforts of his own could sustain him.

Hunger and thirst were now his greatest foes. Against the former he was fortified for a while by some bread and meat which he had placed in his pocket before coming on deck, thinking it possible that the crew might suddenly take to the boats without adequate preparation, and determining in such a case neither to be left behind, nor to die of starvation should the winds and waves allow a boat to live. But this food, saturated as it was with salt-water, would only increase the fearful thirst already tormenting him—a surer and a crueler foe to life than any hunger—and so Murray reflected, with a shudder. Still he resolved to neglect no means of preserving life, even though it must be in torture, and tying together his cravat and handkerchief, he passed them about his body, and firmly secured himself to the spar. This left both his hands at liberty, and gave him greater ease of position.

Extracting from his water-filled pocket a bit of the meat, he ate it hungrily, and could have cried at finding the bread a mere mass of saline pulp, entirely inedible. Somewhat refreshed by this slight nourishment, the lonely man looked once more about him, scanning the horizon with anxious scrutiny if haply a white-winged vessel might be on its way to rescue him. But the only comfort that could be gathered from all the untold miles of sea and sky around and above him was the hope that the storm was over. Surely the clouds were thinner and more broken; the rain had ceased; the fitful wind did not so incessantly lash the waves into more furious sweeps. Toward noon a watery sun shone for a moment through rifts of sullen cloud, was overwhelmed, but struggled out again with fuller rays, and from that gained steadily upon the clouds, until at setting he flashed out a broad banner of victorious rays far across the unquiet sea, still throbbing fiercely with its late emotion.

Still no hope, no rescue for James Murray. Every hour of that December day had stolen somewhat from the vigor that upheld him. His limbs were numb, although he tried to keep the blood alive in them by active motion. His teeth chattered, his eyes grew dim, a sick dizziness at his brain made sea and sky swim before his sight; in his ears grew a drowsy song as of the sirens calling to him from beneath the waves.

"I can not live till morning; and oh, my child!—" No anger now, only yearning love and bitterest sorrow. In that dreary trial the heart of the worldly man was learning the lessons that prosperity had never taught. Again he said:

"I hope she will never know how her poor father died; I hope she will be happy all her life. I wish she knew that I forgave her before I died. Poor dear, I said hard things to her that night before she left me. I would give all my slender chance of life to take them back. Why should she not choose for herself, as I did in my youth? Cruel and tyrannical! She did not say it, though. That poor little note she left for me had no such words as those in it. I tore it, and stamped upon the pieces before I burned them. God forgive me! Did her mother see me do that, I wonder. Fifteen years ago since Mary died, and she bid me to be father and mother both to that poor child. Have I done it? O God, let me live! Save me from this death, that I may make amends for the wrong I had sworn to do!"

He raised himself from the water as far as he might, and gazed once more on all around with a piteous earnestness such as no care for mere life had brought into that hard face.

Nothing but sea and sky, cloud and wave. Only there, on the horizon line, what is that? A wave leaping higher than its fellows? No, for it does not sink and rise as the waves do. It can not be a ship, it is so low in the water; there are no masts to be traced on that golden back-ground of the sunset clouds. A boat, perhaps; if so, are there men in it? Will it cross his path? Can he attract their notice?

A wild flutter of hope and desire thrill through the soul and body of that man, struggling so vehemently for life, and he begins with all the little strength at his command to swim toward the distant haven of his hope. But before he has made the least perceptible progress, before he has resolved one of all those doubts as to the nature of the object he so wildly strives to gain, heavy darkness shuts down upon him and it. It is no longer possible to distinguish the least trace of the boat, if such it was, and with a bitter groan James Murray ceases his efforts and sinks down upon the spar in listless inaction.

"It will be gone by morning," said he, "or I shall be dead."

But morning dawned, and he was not dead. Very weak and exhausted indeed, unable to swim or to make any other motion, but still alive, still conscious of that little link holding him to this lower world, still anxious for the sunrise, that he might with his dying eyes sweep the wide horizon line before he closed them forever.

So faint and weak he was he could not bring himself at once to make the exertion of rising on the spar that he might take that last look. It was not till the warm sunlight fell upon his face that he gathered his energies and feebly rose.

Oh, God is good! It is close upon him, drifting slowly down across his very path. No boat, indeed, but the dismasted hulk of a vessel, its bows shattered and sunk, but its stern high and safe above the water, and human figures looking down from it curiously upon him.

He raised his arm and feebly waved it; as feebly shouted a reply to the hail that met his dull ears, and then the song of the siren shut out all other sound, a thick darkness closed his eyes, and he had fainted.

An hour after, when James Murray unclosed those heavy eyes, he stared incredulously into the face bending so tenderly over him, and moved uneasily within the arms that folded themselves about him. But he could not shake off the dream.

"Hope?" whispered he, incredulously.

"Yes, dear, dearest father, it is indeed your own wicked child, to whom God has kindly given time and space to ask your forgiveness."

The father feebly closed his eyes without reply—it was all so strange. It was so little while since he had longed to live that he might ask her forgiveness.

A man's voice spoke next:

"Let me pour some more of this brandy between his lips, dearest. You should not have spoken yet of such matters."

"I could not help it, Miles. I have so longed to say it. But see, he is getting better surely; see the color in his lips. Oh, father dear, open your eyes once more!"

James Murray did not resist that appeal, but opening his eyes, fixed them more lovingly upon his daughter's face than she remembered him ever to have done before.

Tears rushed into her own, but she restrained them at a look from her husband, and only stooped to kiss her father's cheek.

"It was Miles who saved you," whispered she, after a moment. "He leaped in and drew you to the vessel."

"Where is he now—Miles?" asked Mr. Murray, feebly.

"Here. Oh, darling father, you forgive us both—I see that you do!" And then the tears would come, and did.

"And now, Sir, if you are strong enough I will take you down to the cabin and put you in a berth," said Tresethen, presently. "We have the after-part of the ship at our command, and may be very comfortable here for a long time if the fair weather holds."

"Wait a while and I'll go down myself. I'm too heavy for any one to carry."

"I think not, Sir, if I may try." And the broad-shouldered young Englishman, raising his reluctant burden from the deck, carried him carefully down the steep steps, and after stripping off his wet and almost frozen clothes, placed him carefully in a berth and covered him deep with blankets.

"Now, if you will take a good long sleep, Sir," said he, cheerily, "I think you'll wake up all right, and Hope will have some hot tea ready for you."

Mr. Murray did not answer, but went to sleep with a queer smile upon his lips. To think that this should be the end of all the threats and curses he had heaped upon the head of that young man!

Hope was ready with the tea, and before night her father was nearer to being "all right" than could have been expected after the severe exposure he had undergone.

The next day he was able to sit up and hear the story of the Tresethen's voyage and present position. He was not surprised at learning that this very hulk on which they now found themselves was the remains of the destroyer of the Roebuck. That shock, so fatal to the smaller vessel, was not harmless to the larger. Her bows were badly stove, and shortly after the collision a cry was raised that the ship was sinking, and must immediately be deserted. With the selfishness of terror the crew seized upon the boats and refused to allow the passengers a place. The Captain, after exerting alike uselessly his authority and his powers of persuasion, declared finally that unless the passengers were taken he himself would remain behind.

"So much the better!" cried the brutal boatswain as he pushed off the overloaded boat, which was immediately hidden by the darkness. The three, thus abandoned, sat down quietly upon the quarter-deck and waited for their death. It did not come, and in the morning they perceived, that, having settled to a certain depth, the ship would sink no farther, at least toward the stern. The cabin and cabin stores were thus saved to them, insuring shelter and subsistence so long as the hulk should float in its present position. A quantity of charcoal stored in an empty state-room promised the comfort of fire, and in all, except the uncertainty of permanent safety, their situation might be as agreeable and comfortable as it had been during the first days of their voyage. But a few more hours brought yet another shock to convince them that no man may calculate in what form his last hour shall meet him.

The Captain, whose great weakness was a love of gain, had mentioned several times that a great deal of money might be collected from the seamen's chests in the fore-castle, if we could get at them, as the sailors had, according to custom, received their wages for the outward voyage upon the day of sailing.

The next morning after the shipwreck he had been heard to quietly leave the cabin at an early hour and ascend the companion-way. Some time after, Tresethen, going up to join him, was startled at finding only his coat lying upon the deck. The Captain was never seen again; and the two survivors could only surmise that he (being a bold and skillful swimmer) had dived into the fore-castle to try to recover the treasure hidden there, and had either become entangled in the wreck, or struck his head in the descent so as to stun himself. At any rate the sea never gave up this one of its many secrets, and Tresethen and his bride remained alone, until, by almost a miracle, James Murray was brought to join them.

A week was passed away, and, spite of all the perils of their position—spite of their uncertain future—Hope thought and said that it was the happiest week of all her life. Her father having once made up his mind to forgive and like her husband, did it so heartily that his daughter sometimes smiled merrily at finding her own opinions and arguments peremptorily set aside in favor of Tresethen's, and in noticing the honest admiration in the face of the older man, when his new son argued eloquently and firmly, although respectfully, with Murray's unreasoning prejudice against England and Englishmen.

Tresethen, too, beginning with a mere feeling of compassion and forbearance, grew to feel a real affection for Hope's father—to regard him with that complacent fondness one always feels for a person he has won over from opposition to amity.

But these pleasant days were drawing to a close. Hope, awaking one night from uneasy dreams, was startled by hearing the splash of water close to the edge of her berth, and putting out her hand, dipped it into the ice-cold element stealing so treacherously upon her sleep. Rousing hastily her husband and father, and procuring a light, her terrible suspicions were soon confirmed. The wreck was settling. They must at once abandon the cabins, and trust themselves to the shelterless deck. Hastily gathering what food was at hand, and snatching some clothing from the beds, the fugitives fled from the cruel foe, steadily if slowly pursuing them.

The first effort of both men was to shelter as much as possible the delicate girl so dear to both; but when Hope was wrapped closely in shawls and blankets, and seated between them upon the deck, there seemed no more to be done but to wait resignedly, till that creeping, sliding water, whose warning splash sounded every moment nearer, should at last reach and overwhelm them.

"What should be the cause of this sudden change?" asked Mr. Murray, breaking with an effort the painful silence.

"Captain Jones told me," said Tresethen, "the reason the vessel did not sink at once was that he had caused a bulkhead, as nearly airtight as he could get it, to be placed across some portion of the hold, thinking that, in case of just such a disaster as befell us, this confined body of air would, as it actually did, buoy up the stern and prevent the wreck from sinking. In the first moments after the collision he supposed that his experiment had failed, and did not mention it to us until several hours of safety had reassured him. I suppose this partition must now have given way at some point, so as slowly to admit the water. Probably it was just beneath our feet last night, while we sat so cheerfully talking over our future plans before separating for the night."

"Dreadful!" murmured Hope, hiding her face upon her husband's breast.

"Well, I don't know, daughter and son," said James Murray, after a little pause. "It don't strike me that we've been so hardly dealt with after all. It would have been worse if I had died floating on that spar, and you had gone down when your shipmates did, and neither of us had ever said the words we have said since. It would have been worse, even if you had got safely to England and lived out your lives, with the weight on your consciences of having started wrong; while I, a poor, miserable, lonely old man, had staid in America cursing and swearing at my disobedient children."

"Oh, father!"

"Well, I did girl, and so that Mr. Hepworth will tell you—would have told you, I may as well say. No, children, I think, on the whole, Almighty God has done full as much for us as we any way deserve, considering we none of us have kept straight to the mark; and I for one have wandered off far enough. Now, son and daughter, don't you agree with me that we shall all go off into eternity the happier and the better for this last week we've spent together?"

"Indeed I do, Sir," said Miles, solemnly; and Hope, sobbing on her father's neck, answered him with quivering kisses.

"I know I haven't lived what the ministers call a godly life," said James Murray again, after a little thought. "But I hope I've been sorry first or last for all the wrong I've done; and I've heard it read that such as repented were to be forgiven. I don't know yet. We all shall soon. Hope, child, can't you say over one of those prayers I used to hear your mother teaching you in the old times?"

Controlling her own emotion with quiet womanly strength, Hope, after a little pause, repeated in her clear, low voice the simplest and the greatest of all petitions, the Lord's own prayer.

When she had done, no more was said for a long while. Each one took counsel with his own heart, and silently set his house in order for the mighty visitor who stood close without the door. At last Tresethen said, quietly,

"The day is dawning."

All eyes turned eastward and watched silently while the sun rose through a glory of purple and golden clouds and came to look at them. Presently his light and warmth revived their chilled frames, and, creeping closer together, they divided the food they had brought with them in their hasty flight. It was not much, not more than would last one day; but as all thought, though none said, it was very unlikely that another sunrise should find them in need of earthly food.

The bright winter day passed on. The air, though keen, was not insupportably cold, and the little party were well provided with wrappings of various sorts, and exerted themselves, from time to time, to take such exercise as the limits of the deck, now very nearly level with the water, would allow. But here again the waters stayed. For what reason they could not tell, but from an hour before sunset the settling of the wreck was suspended, and faint human hopes and longings came creeping back to the three hearts that thought to have done with them forever.

Darkness fell, and the father slept, his head upon his daughter's lap. She, gathered to her husband's breast, neither spoke nor moved, and though her blue eyes did not close her spirit seemed far away. Tresethen, strong and manful, warded off as yet the subtle attacks of cold and hunger, watching sleeplessly the starry horizon, hoping, longing to see there the dim outline of a sail.

The long night passed, the morning broke. Hope quietly arousing herself drew forth the remnant of her yesterday's food and tried to slip a portion into her father's mouth that he might unconsciously swallow it. But Murray awaking suddenly detected the pious fraud, and smiling feebly, said,

"No, no, child; life is young and full of promise for you—keep it while you may. My race is run."

"Will you not take it, father? Indeed I do not want it."

"No, Hope; positively no."

"Then you must, Miles. You are the strongest of us all. Eat, and you may yet be saved."

"Do you think, my wife, that I would live so?" asked Tresethen, reproachfully. "What charm remains on earth for me, that I should take the morsel from your lips and watch you die of hunger in my arms? Eat this morsel yourself, my darling, if you love me!"

"No, Miles, I can not—I will not. Indeed, I think it would choke me were I to attempt it."

"Then we will divide it in three parts, and each agree to eat his own share for the sake of the others."

"I will try," said Hope, faintly; and James Murray, sitting upright, could not restrain the hungry glare of his hollow eyes as he seized the portion offered him by Tresethen. Hope—her husband's eye upon her—swallowed with difficulty her own morsel, watching in her turn Tresethen, who, making a very good pretense at eating, quietly hid his untasted food, reserving it for Hope.

Again the sun rose and looked pityingly down upon the forlorn group clinging to that sinking wreck.

The three watched it steadily.

"Hope! Mr. Murray! what is that? There, close under the sun—you can hardly see it for the light! Is it—can it be?—it is, a sail!"

"You're right, boy; it is surely a sail!" cried the father, rising excitedly to his feet.

Hope did not speak, but her dim eyes turned to Miles with a look of unspeakable thankfulness.

It was indeed a sail—a homeward-bound merchantman, sweeping gayly on before a strong east wind, directly in the path of the sinking hulk.

Every moment as it passed brought her nearer, and brought back life and hope to those three, so lately resigned to die.

Nearer and nearer, till the fluttering ensign of distress held aloft by Tresethen was acknowledged from her decks; near and nearer, till she gracefully rounded to, and a boat was manned and lowered. Then, as it came leaping on across the waters, how those hungry eyes watched lest it should suddenly be swallowed up; lest it should not, after all, be meant for them; lest they should die some sudden death before it reached them. And then, when it was come—when rough hands, but tender hearts, helped them aboard with many a word of pity and of wonder—then how the truth of their safety in very deed came crowding in upon their hearts, till even Tresethen turned away his face, while Hope and Murray sobbed aloud.

All honor to that captain and that crew, Englishmen every one! All honor to the underlying good of human nature in its roughest form! How many ways it found to prove itself in the days before that merchantman dropped her anchor in Boston harbor! How affectionately Tresethen and Murray and Hope herself grasped the hard hands of those sailors as they parted from them at the wharf! How tenderly they ever recalled their faces and their names; and how gladly, years after, they ministered to the wants of one of them who, sick and poor, sent to ask their charity!

And so Miles and Hope came home to the roof whence they had stolen a while before; and that angry father, who had pursued them with such threats of vengeance, welcomed them there as one welcomes all that makes life dear; and when the year came round, and there was a baby to be christened, none but Mr. Hepworth should bestow that benediction on its little head, and sanction with his presence the merry dinner afterward which Mr. Murray gave, as he told every one, in honor of "My grandson, Sir, Miles Tresethen, Junior!"

LOUIS AGASSIZ.

WITH Humboldt terminated an important period in the history of science. Gay-Lussac, Laplace, Arago, and Cuvier, who were with him the master minds whose unwearied labors served so largely to advance its boundaries that those who immediately followed them found themselves in possession of an advance point never before gained in a single epoch, had one after the other been snatched away by death, and left him the sole (or nearly the sole, for the venerable Biot was then still living) representative of this great era. At last Humboldt, at the age of ninety, died in 1859; and those who had listened to the teachings of this great school of philosophers were left in possession of the great depository they had labored with such assiduity to enrich. Nor were the immediate recipients of this legacy of knowledge laggard in assuming the labors of their predecessors. Owen, Liebig, Geoffroy St. Hilaire, and Agassiz constitute the master spirits of another epoch whose cycle has not yet been completed, but whose discoveries and contributions, as already established, clearly demonstrate that it will fall but little behind the great scientific age that preceded it.

Of these, one of the most industrious as well as one of the most successful prosecutors of original scientific researches is Agassiz. He is of French origin, but a native of Switzerland, having been born in Motier, in the Canton of Fribourg, in 1807. He had scarcely completed his preparatory studies when he was appointed Professor of Natural History in the University of Neufchatel, which position he continued to occupy until his departure for the United States in 1846.

It is a remarkable fact that Guyot, whom Ritter declared to be one of his best pupils, and who was Professor of Physical Geography in the University of Neufchatel; Matile, the Professor of History in the same institution; and Agassiz, should, after many years' conjoint labor as colleagues, find themselves residents of the United States, and professors of various schools in this country. It is pleasant to say that a warm friendship, begun in youth and continued through the varying shades of manhood, still subsists between these early associates.

In 1833 Agassiz began the publication of his great work on "Fossil Fishes," in five quarto volumes, accompanied by about four hundred folio plates, comprising the figures and descriptions of nearly one thousand specimens of fossil fishes. This work at once won the admiration of all the savans of Europe, and established for him a reputation which he has since so honorably maintained.

Born in the midst of those wonderful and majestic creations which tower up on every side in the lofty pinnacles and deep ravines of the Swiss Alps, his attention was early directed to an explanation of their phenomena. Every one knows that the deep valleys of these mountainous regions contain immense rivers denominated glaciers, as those of the Aar and Chamouni, whose waters are constantly frozen, and which gradually flow down to empty themselves into the Rhone with a motion so imperceptible that its progress is only determined by fixing points that may be permanent upon the icy current and contiguous shore, and at intervals of several months noticing the distance which those objects on the ice have receded from those on the bank of the stream. Hugri, who had placed a cabin on the Aar in 1827, found that in 1830 it had moved about 110 yards downward. Agassiz, in 1840, by fixing the position of the rock on the Aar, which he denominated "Hôtel des Neufchâtelois," found that its motion was at the rate of 243 feet each year; at which rate of progress the frozen stream would finally flow from the lakes, whence it was collected to the Rhone, at an average rate of one mile in about twenty-two years.

But the phenomena of motion, however interesting, was of far less importance, as a question of large generalization, than what is known as "the glacial theory," which Agassiz announced in a paper read before the Helvetic Society of Natural History in 1837, which was a remarkable advance in geological discoveries. It may be well to state that a few years since two theories were advocated to account for all the changes that had taken place on the surface of the globe. One of these, known as the Wernerian theory from its author, ascribed all these changes to the action of water. The other, known as the Huttonian theory, attributed them with equal force to the effect of fire. The action of both fire and water are so manifest upon the surface of the globe, that although each theory had many warm and able advocates, yet the great majority of the scientific world were disposed not to place implicit confidence in either, although attributing to each a great share in these effects. While discussions were going on in regard to which had the greatest agency in shaping the outer or external crust of the earth into the mountains and valleys that now diversify its surface, Agassiz, by his close and searching observations on the glaciers, attempted to show that water had exercised an influence in the arrangement of the visible parts of the earth as it now presents itself in a form heretofore never thought of.

"The appearance of the Alps," says Agassiz, in the promulgation of this theory, "the result of the greatest convulsion which has modified the surface of our globe, found its surface covered with ice, at least from the North Pole to the Mediterranean and Cuspien seas." From the effects produced by the motion of this great icy covering in scratches upon the rocks, not only in the Alps, where the glaciers are seen at this day, but in Norway and Scotland, and, still later, on the American continent, he inferred that the whole surface had been subjected to the action of this ice movement, which had left enduring traces of its progress in the inscriptions it had surely although rudely traced on the adjacent rocks in its passage downward to what now form the beds of the ocean and great seas.

This glacial theory presupposes that this globe, which we inhabit with such conscious security, and which in its arrangement in the great solar circle is so disposed as to give a due proportion of dryness and moisture, and heat and cold to its various parts, so as to fit them for the abode of man and those animals which exist with him, was at least north of the Mediterranean at a day no farther distant than that which witnessed the upheaval of the Alps, entirely enveloped in one dense and unyielding investiture of ice; that the whole of the North American continent was at that time subjected to a degree of cold so intense as to destroy every species of animal life and every particle of vegetation; and that with a restoration of this part of the earth's surface to a sufficient degree of heat—for it appears to have previously possessed an elevated temperature far more tropical than it now enjoys—it came forth from its icy investiture bleak and barren, and entirely devoid of animate existence. While it is true that these very original and ingenious speculations have not as yet obtained general acceptance, it is nevertheless certain that such geologists as Buckland and Lyell in England, and Professor Hitchcock in the United States, have either adopted in whole or in part the theory as established by the facts upon which they have been enabled to generalize. Professor Hitchcock has found in the New England States evidences of striation of rocks which go far toward the establishment of this theory; and I may add, that I have likewise seen in the mountain gorges of Western Maryland similar striations which it seems scarcely possible to account for on any other supposition.

But whether this theory be true or not, yet the deductions of Agassiz on the glacial movements form very important contributions to science, and are both exact and interesting. It is, however, rather as a naturalist than a physicist that Agassiz has gained his greatest reputation; and when, at the suggestion of Humboldt, he was requested by the King of Prussia to visit the United States in order to investigate its fossil remains, it was rather as the author of the elaborate work on "Fossil Fishes," than as the promulgator of a new physical theory of the earth's perturbations, that he was warmly welcomed by scientific men.

He arrived in the United States in 1846, accompanied by Count Portralis, who, as an attaché to the Coast Survey, has since contributed to the pages of its reports much exact information connected with this important branch of the public service. Agassiz had, while in Europe, received an invitation to deliver a course of lectures before the Lowell Institute, and soon after his arrival in Boston he was introduced in this manner to the public as a lecturer on Natural History. Possessing great natural powers as a public speaker, with a reasonably fair acquaintance with the English language, and ardent enthusiasm for the subject he was engaged in delineating, it is not remarkable that his lectures should have been exceedingly popular, or that his audiences should have filled to overflowing the edifice in which they were delivered.

He originally contemplated a tarry of two years in the United States, and was provided by the Prussian Government with funds for this object; but soon after his arrival he met with Professor Bache, who not only tendered to him the use of the vessels engaged in the Coast Survey for the purpose of prosecuting his researches, but employed him on the special service of examining the formation of the Florida Reefs. This piece of good fortune determined him to remain an indefinite period in the United States, in which he found a vast and hitherto nearly unexplored field for research in the department of natural history, to which he particularly devoted his attention. This resolve was finally made a permanent one by his appointment to the Professorship of Zoology and Geology in the Lawrence Scientific School, then just established. He has since become a permanent resident of Cambridge, has associated himself by marriage with a Boston lady, and drawn around him a circle of home associations which promise to possess sufficient power to retain him hereafter in his adopted country.

My acquaintance with Agassiz began at the meeting of the American Association for the Advancement of Science, held in Providence in 1855. This meeting was remarkable for the circumstance that the plan and organization of the Dudley Observatory was there arranged and prosecuted chiefly by Dr. Armsby of Albany, with such zeal that when the Association assembled at Albany the following year the whole arrangement was so far developed that its organization was inducted by an able address by Edward Everett.

At Providence the harmony of the meeting was for a time disturbed by a rival faction, which was somewhat jealous of the mode in which the appointments were made by those who were intrusted with the management of the Association. One of the most effective and conciliatory speakers on this occasion was Agassiz, who by his tact succeeded in a great degree in restoring harmony, upon the very eve of what promised to be an unpleasant if not irreconcilable discord which threatened the very existence of the Association.

During the week appropriated to the meetings of the Association I frequently met him at the dinner parties and evening receptions given by the citizens to the members. Agassiz, who was at that time somewhat under fifty years of age, possessed a remarkably fine personal appearance, and a physique which, while not overburdened with flesh, exhibited much power of endurance. Among the eminent savans assembled on this occasion, including Pierce of Harvard, Alexander of Princeton, Olmsted of Yale, Henry of the Smithsonian, Bache of the Coast Survey, Henry and William B. Rogers, and Sir William Logan, Agassiz had unquestionably the finest head and the most strikingly intellectual countenance. He was indeed not only a highly intellectual person in appearance, but a very handsome man, and withal was possessed of the blandest and most engaging manners.

The topics usually discussed at the social ré-unions were of a scientific character. On one occasion the party invited to dinner had assembled with the single exception of Agassiz. While waiting his coming the conversation turned upon the characteristics of the toad, and called forth a difference of opinion, which upon his arrival was referred to him for settlement.

"Yes," replied Agassiz, in answer to the appeal, "on my way hither I saw a toad jumping in the path before me, and put him in my pocket for future examination. Here he is:" and to the surprise of the party he drew forth a living specimen of the object under discussion, and placing him in the palm of his hand commenced a dissertation upon its peculiarities and habits with as perfect nonchalance as if he had been invited thither for the express purpose. It is needless to say that the party listened with the utmost attention to his explanations, and relinquished the subject on the announcement that the dinner waited their attendance, in all probability better acquainted with the habits of this unobtrusive yet very useful being than they ever would have been but for this accidental circumstance.

On this occasion Agassiz was the chief talker, for two reasons: first, because he talked admirably; and, second, because each of the other guests desired most to hear him. He never speaks for effect—at least it so impressed me, not only on this but frequent other occasions where we have chanced to meet—but from the fullness of his heart. He enters with great warmth into the subject that engages his attention, and is happy to find one whom he can interest in it; and thus, while carrying learned men far beyond the boundaries of their own knowledge in the topic of which he is master, he appears perfectly unconscious of any superiority over those with whom he is conversing. He tells what he has to say, either in private conversation or in public, with great earnestness, and listens with respectful attention to what is told him by others.

Agassiz occupies, as a summer retreat, a cottage on one of the boldest and most weather-beaten cliffs on the promontory of Nahant. From this spot he can look out upon the ocean as it stretches uninterruptedly away toward the continent of Europe, and be lulled to sleep by the ceaseless surging of its waves upon the rocky shore. While I was at Nahant a few years since he was away at Cambridge, busily employed in the arrangement of the Zoological Museum which he has since developed in such an admirable manner and in such gigantic proportions. We met, however, at the railway station at Lynn, where I left the cars in order to visit Prescott. He appeared jaded, and was far from the possession of his ordinary good health. He had not attended the meeting of the Association for the Advancement of Science the previous year, and upon my calling his attention to the circumstance, he replied that for some time he had not been well.

I remarked that, during the summer months at least, I had expected to find him at Nahant, where he might procure a stock of health to enable him to prosecute his labors with more energy during the remainder of the year.

"You are right," he replied, "you are right: but with the resolve not to come to town during the summer, I find that I am so much interested in the classification of my Museum that I have spent nearly the whole summer there."

I expressed the hope that, on his present visit to Nahant, he would find it sufficiently attractive to wean him for a few weeks at least from his dearly loved fossil remains, and be induced to snuff the fresh air from the ocean, instead of that exhaled from the musty preparations of a cabinet of natural history in the process of preparation; and thus we parted, I must confess upon my part, with the most serious misgivings as to his capability long to continue the laborious task he was imposing upon himself in the arrangement of his Museum, and the preparation of his "Contributions to the Natural History of the United States," which at that time, as now, occupied a large share of his attention.

I was therefore agreeably surprised in meeting him at Newport on the occasion of the re-assembling of the Scientific Association at that place in August, 1860, to find that every trace of bodily ailment had passed away, and that he appeared as fresh and vigorous as I had ever seen him. He had the year previous paid a visit to Switzerland, where his mother, venerable with years but erect and dignified in carriage, as well as his sister, Madame Françillon, and her children reside.

Professor Silliman, in his last visit to Europe, bore a note of introduction from Agassiz to his mother and sister, and paid them a visit at Lausanne, a Swiss town of some fifteen thousand inhabitants, where they resided. He first met with Madame Françillon Agassiz, who, according to the custom, bears her maiden name as well as that of her husband's, where the family occupies a prominent position in society. He found this lady, who appeared with a smiling face, brilliant black eyes, and the softened features of her brother, surrounded by a beautiful group of children seven in number. She extended to him and his daughter a cordial welcome, and in the frankest manner had spread for their reception a welcome board, on which a finely flavored cup of tea—a great fondness for which is one of the Professor's weaknesses—carried his thoughts back to his New England home and his own table, around which Agassiz and himself had spent many a pleasant hour.

Although the evening was rainy it did not deter Agassiz's sister from accompanying her new friends to her mother's, to whom their coming had been announced by her little-son, who was the bearer of the introductory note from Agassiz. She had mislaid her spectacles and could not read the note, but she said that when her grandson told her that two American gentlemen, accompanied by a lady, were coming in a few minutes, she felt assured that they were the friends of her son Louis. When Professor Silliman explained their intimacy; that he had often been a guest in his family; that he knew his interesting American wife; and when he still further gave a friendly notice of her son's domestic happiness, and of his high standing and success in his adopted country, her strong frame was agitated, her voice trembled with emotion, and the flowing tears told the story of a mother's heart which fourscore years had failed to chill.

Agassiz had made such progress in the arrangement of his Museum as to make a description of his plans a subject of interest to the scientific world, and he was invited to give to the Association a general view of its arrangement. It is the custom of the Association, after a short time spent in general business, to divide into sections for the reading and discussing of scientific papers. On the occasion referred to, both sections adjourned in order to enable all the members to listen to Agassiz, and long before he made his appearance every available place was occupied by members or visitors at Newport; for this was the height of the season at this fashionable watering-place, and its gay visitors were in attendance in large numbers.

The meetings of the Association were held at the State House—a venerable building familiar to the visitors of Newport, whose associations are connected with some of the most stirring events in our national history; and the room occupied on this occasion was the great State-chamber, from whose frames looked out the commanding portraits of many of those distinguished men, who, on more than one trying occasion, had made these walls echo back their masterly and impassioned eloquence.

Agassiz gracefully acknowledged the compliment extended to him; and after a brief and apposite allusion to the historic character of the edifice, at once began his explanation of the arrangement of the Museum, which, with the "Contributions to the Natural History of the United States"—which is a part of his plan—may be considered the crowning work of his life. This Museum is a conception of the grandest kind, and is intended not only to represent the present state of knowledge of Natural History, but its future development for a long period. The visitor on entering finds himself in an apartment which serves the purpose of an ante-room, in which is arranged a general classification of all the subjects to which the whole is appropriated. This room is intended as a general introduction to Natural History, in which the earlier or more rudimentary stages of its progress can be traced before the student enters into the exact details found in their appropriate departments within. On more than one occasion, while Agassiz was eloquently describing his vast plan, I felt amazed that Boston should be the only city in the Union capable of developing so noble a foundation; and asked myself over and over again why New York, whose men of wealth exceeded in numbers those of any other city on the continent, should not by private benefaction endeavor to cope with its New England rival. Here is a comparatively small town, the commercial capital of one of the most sterile sections of the country, possessing a Review which for half a century has been a model of literary excellence; an institution of learning which, during the same period, has stood at the head of its class; and a scientific school and a museum of natural history of which the whole nation have good reason to be proud; and a director of its cabinet of natural history whom kings and emperors have in vain sought, by the most brilliant offers, to entice from his simple republican home to do honor to their proud capitals. Among these offers the most tempting are those of Professor of Natural Sciences in the University of Göttingen, to fill the post so ably occupied by Blumenbach; and the director of the "Jardin des Plantes" in Paris, which is certainly the most enviable situation a man of science could occupy. During the recent visit of Prince Jerome to the United States he called on Agassiz while in Boston, and, in the name of his royal cousin, renewed this latter offer, which had already been twice tendered to him by the Emperor. Yet up to this period he has never hesitated as to his objects of life, and the situation he seeks to occupy.

Mere pecuniary compensation seems to have had but little influence with Agassiz, who has always looked to this source only as a means to accomplish great ends. While a youth, as a student of medicine at Zurich and afterward at Munich, where he became the intimate friend of Oken the zoologist, Martins the botanist, Schelling the philosopher, and Dollinger the founder of the school of modern physiology, he was sustained by a small income allowed by his father, which was entirely withdrawn upon his receiving the degree of Doctor of Medicine.

He had, while a student, made, under his able masters, much progress in Natural History, and especially in the fresh-water fish of Europe, of which he had elaborately drawn a large number of specimens. His ardent desire to prosecute these studies in Paris was fortunately gratified by a singular, and what might be called an almost providential, circumstance. Mr. Christinat, a clergyman and friend of his father's, chanced to come into possession of a small sum of money, which he immediately offered to his young friend to enable him to prosecute his studies. Agassiz accepted the offer and went to Paris, where he became acquainted with Arago, Humboldt, Cuvier, and the other distinguished savans, who were assembled from all parts of Europe in this great centre of scientific intelligence. Cuvier, to whom he showed his drawings, was so much impressed with the proficiency he had already made in this department that he at once offered to him his own collections, and at the same time received him as a warm friend into his family circle.

The means, however, furnished by Mr. Christinat proved inadequate to sustain him until he should have completed his studies, and he was about to return home with a sorrowful heart when he met Professor Mitscherlich, who was then on a visit to Paris, who observed his sorrowful mood and kindly asked him the cause of his depressed feelings.

"I told him," said Agassiz, "that I had to go, for I had nothing left. I was then," he said, "but twenty-four years of age, and had no more means to meet my expenses."

The next morning, as he was seated at breakfast in front of the yard of the hotel where he lived, he saw the servant of Humboldt approach, who handed him a letter with the remark that it required no answer, and immediately left. The letter was couched in these words:

"MY FRIEND,—I hear that you intend leaving Paris in consequence of some embarrassment. This shall not be. I wish you to remain here so long as the object for which you came is not accomplished. I inclose you a check for £50. It is a loan which you may repay when you can."

With the means thus generously furnished he did remain and complete the course of investigation he had contemplated. Years after, when Agassiz found himself in a situation to repay this loan, he wrote to Humboldt, asking for the privilege to remain forever in his debt, satisfied that it would be more in accordance with his feelings than to recover the money he had lent. That Agassiz was correct in his judgment is evident not only from the circumstance that their relations always continued to be of the most friendly character, but because Agassiz's visit to America was made with means supplied by the Prussian Government at the suggestion of Humboldt, with which his influence on all matters of science was supreme.

This instance of Humboldt's generosity was not a solitary one.

"What he has done for me," said Agassiz, "I know he has done for many others, in silence and unknown to the world. He may be said, especially in his later years, to have been the friend of every cultivated man, wishing to lose no opportunity to do all the good of which he was capable; for he had a degree of benevolence and generosity that was unbounded."

These intimate personal relations gave him an excellent opportunity of forming a judgment of Humboldt's character. "He was brought up," he said, "in connection with courtiers and men in high positions in life. He was no doubt imbued with the prejudices of his caste. He was a nobleman of high descent; and yet the friend of kings was a bosom friend of Arago; and he was the man who could, after his return from America, refuse the highest position at the court of Berlin—that of Secretaryship of Public Instruction—preferring to live in Paris in a modest way in the society of those illustrious men who then made Paris the centre of intellectual culture."

Of his writings he says: "There is a fullness and richness of expression and substantial power which is most remarkable. He has aimed to present what nature has presented to him. You see his works, page after page running into volumes without divisions into chapters or heads of any sort; and so conspicuous is this peculiarity of style in his compositions that I well remember hearing Arago say: 'Humboldt, you don't know how to write a book. You write without end; but that is not a book. It is a picture without a frame.'"

"Such an expression," he added, "from one scientific man to another, without giving offense, could only come from a man as intimately associated as Arago was with Humboldt. Each understood the other, and held his intellectual attainments in the highest estimation."

While Agassiz was engaged in obtaining evidences in corroboration of his glacial theory he visited Great Britain, and was the guest of the late Sir Robert Peel and Lord Egerton, afterward Earl of Ellesmere. He was warmly welcomed by Sir Roderic Murchison, Lyell, Buckland, Owen, and other scientific men, and every facility was afforded for a thorough investigation. In Scotland he met with Hugh Miller, who showed him a portion of a crustacea found in the old red sandstone. The specimen was not only new to Agassiz, but apparently so small a part of the whole as to preclude the possibility of developing its true character, and yet Agassiz sketched out with so much certainty its shape as to find credence not only with the geologist but with the naturalist. He had not, it is true, the same means of verifying his opinion that was given to Professor Owen—who, from a single bone, described the true skeleton of the bird to which it belonged, and which, with the entire skeleton afterward obtained, is now one of the greatest curiosities in the British Museum—but sufficient to establish its true position among ancient fossils.

While Agassiz was at Charleston, South Carolina, he announced his remarkable and original views concerning the diversity of the human race, which has probably more than any other subject enunciated by him given rise to a widespread and frequently profitless discussion. The theory of Agassiz in respect to the origin of the human race is, that like all other organized beings it could not have originated in single individuals, but must have been created in that numeric harmony which is characteristic of each species. He was first led to this conclusion from the observation of the local habits of animals and plants, each occupying its own geographical position although frequently possessed of the power of extensive migration.

This doctrine was warmly opposed, more especially by divines, on the ground that it directly impugned the Biblical account of the origin of man as detailed in the first part of the book of Genesis. Among the ablest opponents of this theory were the Rev. Dr. Bachman—a very able divine and a distinguished naturalist, to whom Audubon is much indebted for suggestions in relation to the contents of his valuable work—and the Rev. Dr. Smyth, both of whom were residents of Charleston, and each the author of a work intended to controvert Agassiz's theory.

Both of these volumes were handed to me by the Rev. Dr. Morris—an able entomologist and the librarian of the Peabody Institute at Baltimore—about the time of their publication, some ten years since. A perusal of them failed to satisfy me of the inconsistency of such a theory as was attributed to Agassiz. I soon afterward read his own statement of his views, as published in the Christian Examiner for 1850; and am free to say that I do not discover in them any facts inconsistent with the Mosaic account, or which tend in the least by their admission to shake my own religious belief. Agassiz's teachings, so far from leading to skepticism tend directly to the contemplation of a Supreme Being as the great first cause, and supporter of the order and harmony of the universe.

"The geographical distribution of organized beings," said Agassiz, "displays more fully the direct intervention of a Supreme Intelligence than any other adaptation of the physical world."

"The great difficulty," he added, "in the whole of this subject, as a matter of pure scientific inquiry, is that it is looked at as the result of absolute changes from such means as we are already acquainted with. Now there will be no scientific evidence of God's working in nature until naturalists shall have shown that the whole creation is the expression of a thought, and not the product of physical agents."

Surely this is not the language of one who has failed to discover the hand of God in the great works of the creation. In regard to the unity or diversity of the human race, he says: "All the statements of the Bible have reference either to the general unity which we all acknowledge among men, as well as their diversity, or to the genealogy of one particular race, the history of which is more fully recorded in Genesis. But there is nowhere any mention of those physical differences characteristic of the colored races of men, such as the Mongolians and negroes, which may be quoted as evidence that the sacred writers considered them as descended from a common stock. Have we not, on the contrary, the distinct assertion that the Ethiopian can not change his skin, nor the leopard his spots?"

"When I was a medical student in the University of Heidelberg in 1826," said Agassiz, "I obtained a sight of a stuffed skin of a gar-pike in the Museum of Carlsruhe. I instantly became satisfied that this genus stood alone in the class of fishes, and that we could not by any possibility associate it with any of the types of living fishes, nor succeed in finding any among living types fairly to associate it with."

This single circumstance, apparently trivial in itself, produced a deep impression upon the mind of Agassiz, and gradually led him to adopt the views in regard to classification he has enunciated in his works and adopted in his Museum at Cambridge. "To the gar-pike, standing alone and isolated among all living beings," he declares, "I am indebted for my escape from all fanciful attempts at symmetrical classifications."

This remarkable fish, which is only found in the waters of the temperate portion of the North American continent, was first made known to naturalists by Catesby, who published a figure and short account of it in his "Natural History of South Carolina."

At a somewhat later period, when Agassiz's attention was directed to fossil fishes, he was particularly struck not only with the great difference in the characters of the class of fishes in the early geological age, as compared with those now existing, but with the marked similarity between these ancient inhabitants of the earth and the gar-pike. It is, in fact, the living representative of those species whose former existence is made known to us by the impressions they have left in the rocks formed during the period of their annihilation, and although now isolated in the present creation, yet it had once many and diverse living representatives all over Europe, as well as in Asia and America.

The inference from these facts is, that North America was a vast continent long before the other portions of the globe underwent those physical changes that have given to them their present structure, and at the same time destroyed their former animal and vegetable life. Hence, so far from being denominated the New World, it should, so far as its physical structure goes, be called the Old; because it is in North America alone that the naturalist finds a country which has remained undisturbed from the period when the ancient representatives of the gar-pike peopled its waters, while in all others these changes have been so great as to exclude such forms from the animals suited to them.

The gar-pike (Lepidosteus) is one of the swiftest fishes with which naturalists are acquainted. "He darts," says Agassiz, "like an arrow through the waters, and the facility with which he overcomes rapids, even the rapids of the Niagara, shows that the Falls of St. Marys would be no natural barrier to him if there were no natural causes to keep him within the limits in which he is found; and which extend from Lake Michigan, St. Clair, and Mud Lake, through Lakes Erie and Ontario, down to the St. Lawrence and its outlet to the sea, in which he does not venture far, though he does not altogether avoid brackish and salt water."

Yet, notwithstanding this very extensive distribution of the gar-pike in the waters of the contiguous lakes, he has never been found in Lake Superior, and is presumed by Agassiz not to inhabit it.

This remarkable location of both animals and vegetables within certain circumscribed boundaries is one of the most interesting facts developed by the study of Natural History, and comes with particular significance in its application to the study of these phenomena on this continent. The questions whether the wild bear of the Northern States is identical with the one found in similar countries in Europe, and presents the changes that characterize him, from the peculiar circumstances by which he is surrounded; or, whether the many birds that inhabit the North American forests are derived from a similar stock in Europe, or were created within the limits in which they are now found; or, still more, whether the alligator, the snapping turtle, and the rattlesnake, which are only to be found in America, derived their origin from a country in which their species is now extinct, can only be determined by that sort of careful scrutiny which such minds as those of Agassiz are enabled to bestow upon the subject.

The habits of Agassiz are essentially those of a hard student. He is an early riser, and is seldom absent from his Museum after nine o'clock in the morning. In early life it was his custom to devote the greater part of the night to writing, and he seldom retired before two or three o'clock in the morning. Of late, however, the failure of his eyesight has rendered an interdiction of night labor a matter of absolute necessity: and perhaps fortunately so; because in the ardor of his pursuits he gives but slight attention to his bodily health, and might easily have shattered even his hardy constitution.

There is probably no scientific man of his age who is moved by less disinterested motives in the performance of his duty than Agassiz. With the brilliant offers of place and preferment open to him from abroad, he is content to labor in his self-allotted task without for a moment being diverted from the chief object that engrosses his attention. "I feel," he says, "that the task allotted to me is the development of the Natural History of this continent. Here I am not trammelled by the forms which others have prescribed, and which, to some extent, I must follow, in Europe, but am free to make my own selection and arrangement. Both as to the object and the mode of its performance I am satisfied that America, and not Europe, is my field and my home."

CHAPTER LVII.

THE LOVES AND HOPES OF ALBERT FITZALLEN.

FELIX GRAHAM, when he left poor Mary Snow, did not go on immediately to the doctor's shop. He had made up his mind that Mary Snow should never be his wife, and therefore considered it wise to lose no time in making such arrangements as might be necessary both for his release and for hers. But, nevertheless, he had not the heart to go about the work the moment that he left her. He passed by the apothecary's, and looking in saw a young man working sedulously at a pestle. If Albert Fitzallen were fit to be her husband and willing to be so, poor as he was himself, he would still make some pecuniary sacrifice by which he might quiet his own conscience and make Mary's marriage possible. He still had a sum of £1200 belonging to him, that being all his remaining capital; and the half of that he would give to Mary as her dower. So in two days he returned, and again looking in at the doctor's shop, again saw the young man at his work.

"Yes, Sir, my name is Albert Fitzallen," said the medical aspirant, coming round the counter. There was no one else in the shop, and Felix hardly knew how to accost him on so momentous a subject, while he was still in charge of all that store of medicine, and liable to be called away at any moment to relieve the ailments of Clapham. Albert Fitzallen was a pale-faced, light-haired youth, with an incipient mustache, with his hair parted in equal divisions over his forehead, with elaborate shirt-cuffs elaborately turned back, and with a white apron tied round him so that he might pursue his vocation without injury to his nether garments. His face, however, was not bad, nor mean, and had there not been about him a little air of pretension, assumed perhaps to carry off the combined apron and beard, Felix would have regarded him altogether with favorable eyes.

"Is it in the medical way?" asked Fitzallen, when Graham suggested that he should step out with him for a few minutes. Graham explained that it was not in the medical way—that it was in a way altogether of a private nature; and then the young man, pulling off his apron and wiping his hands on a thoroughly medicated towel, invoked the master of the establishment from an inner room, and in a few minutes Mary Snow's two lovers were walking together, side by side, along the causeway.

"I believe you know Miss Snow," said Felix, rushing at once into the middle of all those delicate circumstances.

Albert Fitzallen drew himself up, and declared that he had that honor.

"I also know her," said Felix. "My name is Felix Graham—"

"Oh, Sir, very well," said Albert. The street in which they were standing was desolate, and the young man was able to assume a look of decided hostility without encountering any other eyes than those of his rival. "If you have any thing to say to me, Sir, I am quite prepared to listen to you—to listen to you, and to answer you. I have heard your name mentioned by Miss Snow." And Albert Fitzallen stood his ground as though he were at once going to cover himself with his pistol arm.

"Yes, I know you have. Mary has told me what has passed between you. You may regard me, Mr. Fitzallen, as Mary's best and surest friend."

"I know you have been a friend to her; I am aware of that. But, Mr. Graham, if you will allow me to say so, friendship is one thing, and the warm love of a devoted bosom is another."

"Quite so," said Felix.

"A woman's heart is a treasure not to be bought by any efforts of friendship," said Fitzallen.

"I fully agree with you there," said Graham.

"Far be it from me to make any boast," continued the other, "or even to hint that I have gained a place in that lady's affections. I know my own position too well, and say proudly that I am existing only on hope." Here, to show his pride, he hit himself with his closed fist on his shirt-front. "But, Mr. Graham, I am free to declare, even in your presence, though you may be her best and surest friend"—and there was not wanting, from the tone of his voice, a strong flavor of scorn as he repeated these words—"that I do exist on hope, let your claims be what they will. If you desire to make such hope on my part a cause of quarrel, I have nothing to say against it." And then he twirled all that he could twirl of that incipient mustache.

"By no means," said Graham.

"Oh, very well," said Fitzallen. "Then we understand that the arena of love is open to us both. I do not fail to appreciate the immense advantages which you enjoy in this struggle." And then Fitzallen looked up into Graham's ugly face, and thought of his own appearance in the looking-glass.

"What I want to know is this," said Felix. "If you marry Mary Snow, what means have you of maintaining her? Would your mother receive her into her house? I presume you are not a partner in that shop; but would it be possible to get you in as a partner, supposing Mary were to marry you and had a little money as her fortune?"

"Eh!" said Albert, dropping his look of pride, allowing his hand to fall from his lips, and standing still before his companion with his mouth wide open.

"Of course you mean honestly by dear Mary."

"Oh, Sir, yes, on the honor of a gentleman. My intentions, Sir, are —. Mr. Graham, I love that young lady with a devotion of heart that—that—that— Then you don't mean to marry her yourself; eh, Mr. Graham?"

"No, Mr. Fitzallen, I do not. And now, if you will so far confide in me, we will talk over your prospects."

"Oh, very well. I'm sure you are very kind. But Miss Snow did tell me—"

"Yes, I know she did, and she was quite right. But as you said just now, a woman's heart can not be bought by friendship. I have not been a bad friend to Mary, but I had no right to expect that I could win her love in that way. Whether or no you may be able to succeed, I will not say, but I have abandoned the pursuit." In all which Graham intended to be exceedingly honest, but was, in truth, rather hypocritical.

"Then the course is open to me," said Fitzallen.

"Yes, the course is open," answered Graham.

"But the race has still to be run. Don't you think that Miss Snow is of her nature very—very cold?"

Felix remembered the one kiss beneath the lamp-post—the one kiss given and received. He remembered also that Mary's acquaintance with the gentleman must necessarily have been short; and he made no answer to this question. But he made a comparison. What would Madeline have said and done had he attempted such an iniquity? And he thought of her flashing eyes and terrible scorn, of the utter indignation of all the Staveley family, and of the wretched abyss into which the offender would have fallen.

He brought back the subject at once to the young man's means, to his mother, and to the doctor's shop; and though he learned nothing that was very promising, neither did he learn any thing that was the reverse. Albert Fitzallen did not ride a very high horse when he learned that his supposed rival was so anxious to assist him. He was quite willing to be guided by Graham, and, in that matter of the proposed partnership, was sure that old Balsam, the owner of the business, would be glad to take a sum of money down. "He has a son of his own," said Albert, "but he don't take to it at all. He's gone into wine and spirits; but he don't sell half as much as he drinks."

Felix then proposed that he should call on Mrs. Fitzallen, and to this Albert gave a blushing consent. "Mother has heard of it," said Albert, "but I don't exactly know how." Perhaps Mrs. Fitzallen was as attentive as Mrs. Thomas had been to stray documents packed away in odd places. "And I suppose I may call on—on—Mary?" asked the lover, as Graham took his leave. But Felix could give no authority for this, and explained that Mrs. Thomas might be found to be a dragon still guarding the Hesperides. Would it not be better to wait till Mary's father had been informed? And then, if all things went well, he might prosecute the affair in due form and as an acknowledged lover.

All this was very nice, and as it was quite unexpected Fitzallen could not but regard himself as a fortunate young man. He had never contemplated the possibility of Mary Snow being an heiress. And when his mother had spoken to him of the hopelessness of his passion, had suggested that he might perhaps marry his Mary in five or six years. Now the dearest wish of his heart was brought close within his reach, and he must have been a happy man. But yet, though this certainly was so, nevertheless there was a feeling of coldness about his love, and almost of disappointment as he again took his place behind the counter. The sorrows of Lydia in the play when she finds that her passion meets with general approbation are very absurd, but nevertheless are quite true to nature. Lovers would be great losers if the path of love were always to run smooth. Under such a dispensation, indeed, there would probably be no lovers. The matter would be too tame. Albert did not probably bethink himself of a becoming disguise, as did Lydia—of an amiable ladder of ropes, of a conscious moon, or a Scotch parson; but he did feel, in some undefined manner, that the romance of his life had been taken away from him. Five minutes under a lamp-post with Mary Snow was sweeter to him than the promise of a whole bevy of evenings spent in the same society, with all the comforts of his mother's drawing-room around him. Ah yes, dear readers—my male readers, of course, I mean—were not those minutes under the lamp-post always very pleasant?

But Graham encountered none of this feeling when he discussed the same subject with Albert's mother. She was sufficiently alive to the material view of the matter, and knew how much of a man's married happiness depends on his supplies of bread-and-butter. Six hundred pounds! Mr. Graham was very kind—very kind indeed. She hadn't a word to say against Mary Snow. She had seen her, and thought her very pretty and modest looking. Albert was certainly warmly attached to the young lady. Of that she was quite certain. And she would say this of Albert—that a better-disposed young man did not exist any where. He came home quite regular to his meals, and spent ten hours a day behind the counter in Mr. Balsam's shop—ten hours a day, Sundays included, which Mrs. Fitzallen regarded as a great drawback to the medical line—as should I also, most undoubtedly. But six hundred pounds would make a great difference. Mrs. Fitzallen little doubted but that sum would tempt Mr. Balsam into a partnership, or perhaps the five hundred, leaving one hundred for furniture. In such a case Albert would spend his Sundays at home, of course. After that, so much having been settled, Felix Graham got into an omnibus and took himself back to his own chambers.

So far was so good. This idea of a model wife had already become a very expensive idea, and in winding it up to its natural conclusion poor Graham was willing to spend almost every shilling that he could call his own. But there was still another difficulty in his way. What would Snow père say? Snow père was, he knew, a man with whom dealings would be more difficult than with Albert Fitzallen. And then, seeing that he had already promised to give his remaining possessions to Albert Fitzallen, with what could he bribe Snow père to abandon that natural ambition to have a barrister for his son-in-law? In these days, too, Snow père had derogated even from the position in which Graham had first known him, and had become but little better than a drunken, begging impostor. What a father-in-law to have had! And then Felix Graham thought of Judge Staveley.

He sent, however, to the engraver, and the man was not long in obeying the summons. In latter days Graham had not seen him frequently, having bestowed his alms through Mary, and was shocked at the unmistakable evidence of the gin-shop which the man's appearance and voice betrayed. How dreadful to the sight are those watery eyes; that red, uneven, pimpled nose; those fallen cheeks; and that hanging, slobbered mouth! Look at the uncombed hair, the beard half shorn, the weak, impotent gait of the man, and the tattered raiment, all eloquent of gin! You would fain hold your nose when he comes nigh you, he carries with him so foul an evidence of his only and his hourly indulgence. You would do so, had you not still a respect for his feelings, which he himself has entirely forgotten to maintain. How terrible is that absolute loss of all personal dignity which the drunkard is obliged to undergo! And then his voice! Every tone has been formed by gin, and tells of the havoc which the compound has made within his throat. I do not know whether such a man as this is not the vilest thing which grovels on God's earth. There are women whom we affect to scorn with the full power of our contempt; but I doubt whether any woman sinks to a depth so low as that. She also may be a drunkard, and as such may more nearly move our pity and affect our hearts, but I do not think she ever becomes so nauseous a thing as the man that has abandoned all the hopes of life for gin. You can still touch her; ay, and if the task be in one's way, can touch her gently, striving to bring her back to decency. But the other! Well, one should be willing to touch him too, to make that attempt of bringing back upon him also. I can only say that the task is both nauseous and unpromising. Look at him as he stands there before the foul, reeking, sloppy bar, with the glass in his hand, which he has just emptied. See the grimace with which he puts it down, as though the dram had been almost too unpalatable. It is the last touch of hypocrisy with which he attempts to cover the offense; as though he were to say, "I do it for my stomach's sake; but you know how I abhor it." Then he skulks sullenly away, speaking a word to no one, shuffling with his feet, shaking himself in his foul rags, pressing himself into a heap—as though striving to drive the warmth of the spirit into his extremities! And there he stands lounging at the corner of the street, till his short patience is exhausted, and he returns with his last penny for the other glass. When that has been swallowed the policeman is his guardian.

Reader, such as you and I have come to that, when abandoned by the respect which a man owes to himself. May God in his mercy watch over us and protect us both!

Such a man was Snow père as he stood before Graham in his chambers in the Temple. He could not ask him to sit down, so he himself stood up as he talked to him. At first the man was civil, twirling his old hat about, and shifting from one foot to the other; very civil, and also somewhat timid, for he knew that he was half drunk at the moment. But when he began to ascertain what was Graham's object in sending for him, and to understand that the gentleman before him did not propose to himself the honor of being his son-in-law, then his civility left him, and, drunk as he was, he spoke out his mind with sufficient freedom.

"You mean to say, Mr. Graham"—and under the effect of gin he turned the name into Gorm—"that you are going to throw that young girl over?"

"I mean to say no such thing. I shall do for her all that is in my power. And if that is not as much as she deserves, it will, at any rate, be more than you deserve for her."

"And you won't marry her?"

"No, I shall not marry her. Nor does she wish it. I trust that she will be engaged, with my full approbation—"

"And what the deuce, Sir, is your full approbation to me? Whose child is she, I should like to know? Look here, Mr. Gorm; perhaps you forget that you wrote me this letter when I allowed you to have the charge of that young girl?" And he took out from his breast a very greasy pocket-book, and displayed to Felix his own much-worn letter—holding it, however, at a distance, so that it should not be torn from his hands by any sudden raid. "Do you think, Sir, I would have given up my child if I didn't know she was to be married respectable? My child is as dear to me as another man's."

"I hope she is. And you are a very lucky fellow to have her so well provided for. I've told you all I've got to say, and now you may go."

"Mr. Gorm!"

"I've nothing more to say; and if I had, I would not say it to you now. Your child shall be taken care of."

"That's what I call pretty cool on the part of any gen'leman. And you're to break your word—a regular breach of promise, and nothing ain't to come of it! I'll tell you what, Mr. Gorm, you'll find that something will come of it. What do you think I took this letter for?"

"You took it, I hope, for Mary's protection."

"And by — she shall be protected."

"She shall, undoubtedly; but I fear not by you. For the present I will protect her; and I hope that soon a husband will do so who will love her. Now, Mr. Snow, I've told you all I've got to say, and I must trouble you to leave me."

Nevertheless there were many more words between them before Graham could find himself alone in his chambers. Though Snow père might be a thought tipsy—a sheet or so in the wind, as folks say, he was not more tipsy than was customary with him, and knew pretty well what he was about. "And what am I to do with myself, Mr. Gorm?" he asked in a sniveling voice, when the idea began to strike him that it might perhaps be held by the courts of law that his intended son-in-law was doing well by his daughter.

"Work," said Graham, turning upon him sharply and almost fiercely.

"That's all very well. It's very well to say 'Work!'"

"You'll find it well to do it, too. Work, and don't drink. You hardly think, I suppose, that if I had married your daughter I should have found myself obliged to support you in idleness?"

"It would have been a great comfort in my old age to have had a daughter's house to go to," said Snow, naïvely, and now reduced to lachrymose distress.

But when he found that Felix would do nothing for him; that he would not on the present occasion lend him a sovereign, or even half a crown, he again became indignant and paternal, and in this state of mind was turned out of the room.

"Heaven and earth!" said Felix to himself, clenching his hands and striking the table with both of them at the same moment. That was the man with whom he had proposed to link himself in the closest ties of family connection. Albert Fitzallen did not know Mr. Snow; but it might be a question whether it would not be Graham's duty to introduce them to each other.

CHAPTER LVIII.

MISS STAVELEY DECLINES TO EAT MINCED VEAL.

THE house at Noningsby was now very quiet. All the visitors had gone, including even the Arbuthnots. Felix Graham and Sophia Furnival, that terrible pair of guests, had relieved Mrs. Staveley of their presence; but, alas! the mischief they had done remained behind them. The house was very quiet, for Augustus and the judge were up in town during the greater part of the week, and Madeline and her mother were alone. The judge was to come back to Noningsby but once before he commenced the circuit which was to terminate at Alston; and it seemed to be acknowledged now on all sides that nothing more of importance was to be done or said in that locality until after Lady Mason's trial.

It may be imagined that poor Madeline was not very happy. Felix had gone away, having made no sign, and she knew that her mother rejoiced that he had so gone. She never accused her mother of cruelty, even within her own heart. She seemed to realize to herself the assurance that a marriage with the man she loved was a happiness which she had no right to expect. She knew that her father was rich. She was aware that in all probability her own fortune would be considerable. She was quite sure that Felix Graham was clever and fit to make his way through the world. And yet she did not think it hard that she should be separated from him. She acknowledged from the very first that he was not the sort of man whom she ought to have loved, and therefore she was prepared to submit.

It was, no doubt, the fact that Felix Graham had never whispered to her a word of love, and that therefore, on that ground, she had no excuse for hope. But had that been all, she would not have despaired. Had that been all, she might have doubted, but her doubt would have been strongly mingled with the sweetness of hope. He had never whispered a syllable of love, but she had heard the tone of his voice as she spoke a word to him at his chamber door; she had seen his eyes as they fell on her when he was lifted into the carriage; she had felt the tremor of his touch on that evening when she walked up to him across the drawing-room and shook hands with him. Such a girl as Madeline Staveley does not analyze her feelings on such a matter, and then draw her conclusions. But a conclusion is drawn; the mind does receive an impression; and the conclusion and impression are as true as though they had been reached by the aid of logical reasoning. Had the match been such as her mother would have approved, she would have had a hope as to Felix Graham's love—strong enough for happiness.

As it was, there was no use in hoping; and therefore she resolved—having gone through much logical reasoning on this head—that by her all ideas of love must be abandoned. As regarded herself, she must be content to rest by her mother's side as a flower ungathered. That she could marry no man without the approval of her father and mother was a thing to her quite certain; but it was, at any rate, as certain that she could marry no man without her own approval. Felix Graham was beyond her reach. That verdict she herself pronounced, and to it she submitted. But Peregrine Orme was still more distant from her; Peregrine Orme, or any other of the curled darlings who might come that way playing the part of a suitor. She knew what she owed to her mother, but she also knew her own privileges.

There was nothing said on the subject between the mother and child during three days. Lady Staveley was more than ordinarily affectionate to her daughter, and in that way made known the thoughts which were oppressing her; but she did so in no other way. All this Madeline understood, and thanked her mother with the sweetest smiles and the most constant companionship. Nor was she, even now, absolutely unhappy or wretchedly miserable; as under such circumstances would be the case with many girls. She knew all that she was prepared to abandon, but she understood also how much remained to her. Her life was her own, and with her life the energy to use it. Her soul was free. And her heart, though burdened with love, could endure its load without sinking. Let him go forth on his career. She would remain in the shade, and be contented while she watched it.

So strictly wise and philosophically serene had Madeline become within a few days of Graham's departure, that she snubbed poor Mrs. Baker, when that good-natured and sharp-witted housekeeper said a word or two in praise of her late patient.

"We are very lonely, ain't we, Miss, without Mr. Graham to look after?" said Mrs. Baker.

"I am sure we are all very glad that he has so far recovered as to be able to be moved."

"That's in course—though I still say that he went before he ought. He was such a nice gentleman. Where there's one better there's twenty worse; and as full of cleverness as an egg's full of meat." In answer to which Madeline said nothing.

"At any rate, Miss Madeline, you ought to say a word for him," continued Mrs. Baker; "for he used to worship the sound of your voice. I've known him to lie there and listen, listen, listen, for your very footfall."

"How can you talk such stuff, Mrs. Baker? You have never known any thing of the kind; and even if he had, how could you know it? You should not talk such nonsense to me, and I beg you won't again." Then she went away, and began to read a paper about sick people written by Florence Nightingale.

But it was by no means Lady Staveley's desire that her daughter should take to the Florence Nightingale line of life. The charities of Noningsby were done on a large scale, in a quiet, handsome, methodical manner, and were regarded by the mistress of the mansion as a very material part of her life's duty; but she would have been driven distracted had she been told that a daughter of hers was about to devote herself exclusively to charity. Her ideas of general religion were the same. Morning and evening prayers, church twice on Sundays, attendance at the Lord's table at any rate once a month, were to herself—and in her estimation for her own family—essentials of life. And they had on her their practical effects. She was not given to backbiting—though, when stirred by any motive near to her own belongings, she would say an ill-natured word or two. She was mild and forbearing to her inferiors. Her hand was open to the poor. She was devoted to her husband and her children. In no respect was she self-seeking or self-indulgent. But, nevertheless, she appreciated thoroughly the comforts of a good income—for herself and for her children. She liked to see nice-dressed and nice-mannered people about her, preferring those whose fathers and mothers were nice before them. She liked to go about in her own carriage, comfortably. She liked the feeling that her husband was a judge, and that he and she were therefore above other lawyers and other lawyers' wives. She would not like to have seen Mrs. Furnival walk out of a room before her, nor perhaps to see Sophia Furnival when married take precedence of her own married daughter. She liked to live in a large place like Noningsby, and preferred country society to that of the neighboring town.

It will be said that I have drawn an impossible character, and depicted a woman who served both God and Mammon. To this accusation I will not plead, but will ask my accusers whether in their life's travail they have met no such ladies as Lady Staveley?

But such as she was, whether good or bad, she had no desire whatever that her daughter should withdraw herself from the world, and give up to sick women what was meant for mankind. Her idea of a woman's duties comprehended the birth, bringing up, education, and settlement in life of children, also due attendance upon a husband, with a close regard to his special taste in cookery. There was her granddaughter Marian. She was already thinking what sort of a wife she would make, and what commencements of education would best fit her to be a good mother. It is hardly too much to say that Marian's future children were already a subject of care to her. Such being her disposition, it was by no means matter of joy to her when she found that Madeline was laying out for herself little ways of life, tending in some slight degree to the monastic. Nothing was said about it, but she fancied that Madeline had doffed a ribbon or two in her usual evening attire. That she read during certain fixed hours in the morning was very manifest. As to that daily afternoon service at four o'clock—she had very often attended that, and it was hardly worthy of remark that she now went to it every day. But there seemed at this time to be a monotonous regularity about her visits to the poor, which told to Lady Staveley's mind—she hardly knew what tale. She herself visited the poor, seeing some of them almost daily. If it was foul weather they came to her, and if it was fair weather she went to them. But Madeline, without saying a word to any one, had adopted a plan of going out exactly at the same hour with exactly the same object, in all sorts of weather. All this made Lady Staveley uneasy; and then, by way of counterpoise, she talked of balls, and offered Madeline carte blanche as to a new dress for that special one which would grace the as-sizes. "I don't think I shall go," said Madeline; and thus Lady Staveley became really unhappy. Would not Felix Graham be better than no son-in-law? When some one had once very strongly praised Florence Nightingale in Lady Staveley's presence, she had stoutly declared her opinion that it was a young woman's duty to get married. For myself, I am inclined to agree with her. Then came the second Friday after Graham's departure, and Lady Staveley observed, as she and her daughter sat at dinner alone, that Madeline would eat nothing but potatoes and sea-kale. "My dear, you will be ill if you don't eat some meat."

"Oh no, I shall not," said Madeline, with her prettiest smile.

"But you always used to like minced veal."

"So I do, but I won't have any to-day, mamma, thank you."

Then Lady Staveley resolved that she would tell the judge that Felix Graham, bad as he might be, might come there if he pleased. Even Felix Graham would be better than no son-in-law at all.

On the following day, the Saturday, the judge came down with Augustus, to spend his last Sunday at home before the beginning of his circuit, and some little conversation respecting Felix Graham did take place between him and his wife.

"If they are both really fond of each other they had better marry," said the judge, curtly.

"But it is terrible to think of their having no income," said his wife.

"We must get them an income. You'll find that Graham will fall on his legs at last."

"He's a very long time before he begins to use them," said Lady Staveley. "And then you know The Cleeve is such a nice property, and Mr. Orme is—"

"But, my love, it seems that she does not like Mr. Orme."

"No, she doesn't," said the poor mother, in a tone of voice that was very lachrymose. "But if she would only wait she might like him—might she not now? He is such a very handsome young man."

"If you ask me, I don't think his beauty will do it."

"I don't suppose she cares for that sort of thing," said Lady Staveley, almost crying. "But I'm sure of this, if she were to go and make a nun of herself it would break my heart—it would indeed. I should never hold up my head again."

What could Lady Staveley's idea have been of the sorrows of some other mothers, whose daughters throw themselves away after a different fashion?

After lunch on Sunday the judge asked his daughter to walk with him, and on that occasion the second church service was abandoned. She got on her bonnet and gloves, her walking-boots and winter shawl, and putting her arm happily and comfortably within his, started for what she knew would be a long walk.

"We'll get as far as the bottom of Cleeve Hill," said the judge.

Now the bottom of Cleeve Hill, by the path across the fields and the common, was five miles from Noningsby.

"Oh, as for that, I'll walk to the top if you like," said Madeline.

"If you do, my dear, you'll have to go up alone," said the judge. And so they started.

There was a crisp, sharp enjoyment attached to a long walk with her father which Madeline always loved, and on the present occasion she was willing to be very happy; but as she started, with her arm beneath his, she feared she knew not what. She had a secret, and her father might touch upon it; she had a sore, though it was not an unwholesome, festering sore, and her father might probe the wound. There was, therefore, the slightest shade of hypocrisy in the alacrity with which she prepared herself, and in the pleasant tone of her voice as she walked down the avenue toward the gate.

But by the time that they had gone a mile, when their feet had left the road and were pressing the grassy field-path, there was no longer any hypocrisy in her happiness. Madeline believed that no human being could talk as did her father, and on this occasion he came out with his freshest thoughts and his brightest wit. Nor did he, by any means, have the talk all to himself. The delight of Judge Staveley's conversation consisted chiefly in that—that though he might bring on to the carpet all the wit and all the information going, he rarely uttered much beyond his own share of words. And now they talked of pictures and politics—of the new gallery that was not to be built at Charing Cross, and the great onslaught which was not to end in the dismissal of Ministers. And then they got to books—to novels, new poetry, magazines, essays, and reviews; and with the slightest touch of pleasant sarcasm the judge passed sentence on the latest efforts of his literary contemporaries. And thus at last they settled down on a certain paper which had lately appeared in a certain Quarterly—a paper on a grave subject, which had been much discussed—and the judge on a sudden stayed his hand and spared his railery. "You have not heard, I suppose, who wrote that?" said he. No; Madeline had not heard. She would much like to know. When young people begin their world of reading there is nothing so pleasant to them as knowing the little secrets of literature: who wrote this and that, of which folk are then talking; who manages this periodical, and puts the salt and pepper into those reviews. The judge always knew these events of the inner literary world, and would communicate them freely to Madeline as they walked. No; there was no longer the slightest touch of hypocrisy in her pleasant manner and eager voice as she answered, "No, papa,

I have not heard. Was it Mr. So-and-so?" and she named an ephemeral literary giant of the day. "No," said the judge, "it was not So-and-so; but yet you might guess, as you know the gentleman." Then the slight shade of hypocrisy came upon her again in a moment. "She couldn't guess," she said; "she didn't know." But as she thus spoke the tone of her voice was altered. "That article," said the judge, "was written by Felix Graham. It is uncommonly clever, and yet there are a great many people who abuse it."

And now all conversation was stopped. Poor Madeline, who had been so ready with her questions, so eager with her answers, so communicative and so inquiring, was stricken dumb on the instant. She had ceased for some time to lean upon his arm, and therefore he could not feel her hand tremble; and he was too generous and too kind to look into her face; but he knew that he had touched the fibres of her heart, and that all her presence of mind had for the moment fled from her. Of course such was the case, and of course he knew it. Had he not brought her out there that they might be alone together when he subjected her to the violence of this shower-bath?

"Yes," he continued, "that was written by our friend Graham. Do you remember, Madeline, the conversation which you and I had about him in the library some time since?"

"Yes," she said, "she remembered it."

"And so do I," said the judge, "and have thought much about it since. A very clever fellow is Felix Graham. There can be no doubt of that."

"Is he?" said Madeline.

I am inclined to think that the judge also had lost something of his presence of mind, or, at least, of his usual power of conversation. He had brought his daughter out there with the express purpose of saying to her a special word or two; he had beat very wide about the bush with the view of mentioning a certain name; and now that his daughter was there, and the name had been mentioned, it seemed that he hardly knew how to proceed.

"Yes, he is clever enough," repeated the judge, "clever enough; and of high principles and an honest purpose. The fault which people find with him is this—that he is not practical. He won't take the world as he finds it. If he can mend it, well and good; we all ought to do something to mend it; but while we are mending it we must live in it."

"Yes, we must live in it," said Madeline, who hardly knew at the moment whether it would be better to live or die in it. Had her father remarked that they must all take wings and fly to heaven, she would have assented.

Then the judge walked on a few paces in silence, bethinking himself that he might as well speak out at once the words which he had to say. "Madeline, my darling," said he, "have you the courage to tell me openly what you think of Felix Graham?"

"What I think of him, papa?"

"Yes, my child. It may be that you are in some difficulty at this moment, and that I can help you. It may be that your heart is sadder than it would be if you knew all my thoughts and wishes respecting you, and all your mother's. I have never had many secrets from my children, Madeline, and I should be pleased now if you could see into my mind and know all my thoughts and wishes as they regard you."

"Dear papa!"

"To see you happy—you and Augustus and Isabella—that is now our happiness; not to see you rich or great. High position and a plentiful income are great blessings in this world, so that they be achieved without a stain. But even in this world they are not the greatest blessings. There are things much sweeter than them." As he said this, Madeline did not attempt to answer him, but she put her arm once more within his, and clung to his side.

"Money and rank are only good, if every step by which they are gained be good also. I should never blush to see my girl the wife of a poor man whom she loved; but I should be stricken to the core of my heart if I knew that she had become the wife of a rich man whom she did not love."

"Papa!" she said, clinging to him. She had meant to assure him that that sorrow should never be his, but she could not get beyond the one word.

"If you love this man, let him come," said the judge, carried by his feelings somewhat beyond the point to which he had intended to go. "I know no harm of him. I know nothing but good of him. If you are sure of your own heart, let it be so. He shall be to me as another son—to me and to your mother. Tell me, Madeline, shall it be so?"

She was sure enough of her own heart; but how was she to be sure of that other heart? "It shall be so," said her father. But a man could not be turned into a lover and a husband because she and her father agreed to desire it—not even if her mother would join in that wish. She had confessed to her mother that she loved this man, and the confession had been repeated to her father. But she had never expressed even a hope that she was loved in return. "But he has never spoken to me, papa," she said, whispering the words ever so softly lest the winds should carry them.

"No; I know he has never spoken to you," said the judge. "He told me so himself. I like him the better for that."

So then there had been other communications made besides that which she had made to her mother. Mr. Graham had spoken to her father, and had spoken to him about her. In what way had he done this, and how had he spoken? What had been his object, and when had it been done? Had she been indiscreet, and allowed him to read her secret? And then a horrid thought came across her mind. Was he to come there and offer her his hand because he pitied and was sorry for her? The Friday fastings and the evening church and the sick visits would be better far than that. She could not, however, muster courage to ask her father any question as to that interview between him and Mr. Graham.

"Well, my love," he said, "I know it is impertinent to ask a young lady to speak on such a subject; but fathers are impertinent. Be frank with me. I have told you what I think, and your mamma agrees with me. Young Mr. Orme would have been her favorite—"

"Oh, papa, that is impossible!"

"So I perceive, my dear, and therefore we will say no more about it. I only mention his name because I want you to understand that you may speak to your mamma quite openly on the subject. He is a fine young fellow, is Peregrine Orme."

"I'm sure he is, papa."

"But that is no reason you should marry him if you don't like him."

"I could never like him—in that way."

"Very well, my dear. There is an end of that, and I'm sorry for him. I think that if I had been a young man at The Cleeve, I should have done just the same. And now let us decide this important question. When Master Graham's ribs, arms, and collar-bones are a little stronger, shall we ask him to come back to Noningsby?"

"If you please, papa."

"Very well, we'll have him here for the assize week. Poor fellow! he'll have a hard job of work on hand just then, and won't have much time for philandering. With Chaffanbrass to watch him on his own side, and Leatherham on the other, I don't envy him his position. I almost think I should keep my arm in the sling till the assizes were over, by way of exciting a little pity."

"Is Mr. Graham going to defend Lady Mason?"

"To help to do so, my dear."

"But, papa, she is innocent; don't you feel sure of that?"

The judge was not quite so sure as he had been once. However, he said nothing of his doubts to Madeline. "Mr. Graham's task on that account will only be the more trying if it becomes difficult to establish her innocence."

"Poor lady!" said Madeline. "You won't be the judge; will you, papa?"

"No, certainly not. I would have preferred to have gone any other circuit than to have presided in a case affecting so near a neighbor, and I may almost say a friend. Baron Maltby will sit in that court."

"And will Mr. Graham have to do much, papa?"

"It will be an occasion of very great anxiety to him, no doubt." And then they began to return home—Madeline forming a little plan in her mind by which Mr. Furnival and Mr. Chaffanbrass were to fail absolutely in making out that lady's innocence, but the fact was to be established to the satisfaction of the whole court, and of all the world, by the judicious energy of Felix Graham.

On their homeward journey the judge again spoke of pictures and books, of failures and successes, and Madeline listened to him gratefully. But she did not again take much part in the conversation. She could not now express a very fluent opinion on any subject, and, to tell the truth, could have been well satisfied to have been left entirely to her own thoughts. But just before they came out again upon the road her father stopped her and asked a direct question.

"Tell me, Madeline, are you happy now?"

"Yes, papa."

"That is right. And what you are to understand is this: Mr. Graham will now be privileged by your mother and me to address you. He has already asked my permission to do so, and I told him that I must consider the matter before I either gave it or withheld it. I shall now give him that permission." Whereupon Madeline made her answer by a slight pressure upon his arm.

"But you may be sure of this, my dear; I shall be very discreet, and commit you to nothing. If he should choose to ask you any question, you will be at liberty to give him any answer that you may think fit." But Madeline at once confessed to herself that no such liberty remained to her. If Mr. Graham should choose to ask her a certain question, it would be in her power to give him only one answer. Had he been kept away, had her father told her that such a marriage might not be, she would not have broken her heart. She had already told herself that, under such circumstances, she could live, and still live, contented. But now—now if the siege were made, the town would have to capitulate at the first shot. Was it not an understood thing that the governor had been recommended by the king to give up the keys as soon as they were asked for?

"You will tell your mamma of this, my dear," said the judge, as they were entering their own gate.

"Yes," said Madeline. But she felt that, in this matter, her father was more surely her friend than her mother. And indeed she could understand her mother's opposition to poor Felix much better than her father's acquiescence.

"Do, my dear. What is any thing to us in this world if we are not all happy together? She thinks that you have become sad, and she must know that you are so no longer."

"But I have not been sad, papa," said Madeline, thinking with some pride of her past heroism.

When they reached the hall door she had one more question to ask; but she could not look in her father's face as she asked,

"Papa, is that review you were speaking of here at Noningsby?"

"You will find it on my study table; but remember, Madeline, I don't above half go along with him."

The judge went into his study before dinner, and found that the review had been taken.

CHAPTER LIX.

NO SURRENDER.

SIR PEREGRINE ORME had gone up to London, had had his interview with Mr. Round.

and had failed. He had then returned home, and hardly a word on the subject had been spoken between him and Mrs. Orme. Indeed, little or nothing was now said between them as to Lady Mason or the trial. What was the use of speaking on a subject that was in every way the cause of so much misery? He had made up his mind that it was no longer possible for him to take any active step in the matter. He had become bail for her appearance in court, and that was the last trifling act of friendship which he could show her. How was it any longer possible that he could befriend her? He could not speak up on her behalf with eager voice, and strong indignation against her enemies, as had formerly been his practice. He could give her no counsel. His counsel would have taught her to abandon the property in the first instance, let the result be what it might. He had made his little effort in that direction by seeing the attorney, and his little effort had been useless. It was quite clear to him that there was nothing further for him to do—nothing further for him, who but a week or two since was so actively putting himself forward and letting the world know that he was Lady Mason's champion.

Would he have to go into court as a witness? His mind was troubled much in his endeavor to answer that question. He had been her great friend. For years he had been her nearest neighbor. His daughter-in-law still clung to her. She had lived at his house. She had been chosen to be his wife. Who could speak to her character if he could not do so? And yet, what could he say if so called on? Mr. Furnival, Mr. Chaffanbrass—all those who would have the selection of the witnesses, believing themselves in their client's innocence, as no doubt they did, would of course imagine that he believed in it also. Could he tell them that it would not be in his power to utter a single word in her favor?

In these days Mrs. Orme went daily to the Farm. Indeed, she never missed a day from that on which Lady Mason left The Cleeve up to the time of the trial. It seemed to Sir Peregrine that his daughter's affection for this woman had grown with the knowledge of her guilt; but, as I have said before, no discussion on the matter now took place between them. Mrs. Orme would generally take some opportunity of saying that she had been at Orley Farm; but that was all.

Sir Peregrine during this time never left the house once except for morning service on Sundays. He hung his hat up on its accustomed peg when he returned from that ill-omened visit to Mr. Round, and did not move it for days, ay, for weeks, except on Sunday mornings. At first his groom would come to him, suggesting to him that he should ride, and the woodman would speak to him about the young coppices; but after a few days they gave up their efforts. His grandson also strove to take him out, speaking to him more earnestly than the servants would do; but it was of no avail. Peregrine, indeed, gave up the attempt sooner, for to him his grandfather did in some sort confess his own weakness. "I have had a blow," said he; "Peregrine, I have had a blow. I am too old to bear up against it—too old and too weak." Peregrine knew that he alluded in some way to that proposed marriage, but he was quite in the dark as to the manner in which his grandfather had been affected by it.

"People think nothing of that now, Sir," said he, groping in the dark as he strove to administer consolation.

"People will think of it—and I think of it. But never mind, my boy. I have lived my life, and am contented with it. I have lived my life, and have great joy that such as you are left behind to take my place. If I had really injured you I should have broken my heart—have broken my heart."

Peregrine of course assured him that let what would come to him the pride which he had in his grandfather would always support him. "I don't know any body else that I could be so proud of," said Peregrine; "for nobody else that I see thinks so much about other people. And I always was, even when I didn't seem to think much about it—always."

Poor Peregrine! Circumstances had somewhat altered him since that day, now not more than six months ago, in which he had pledged himself to abandon the delights of Cowcross Street. As long as there was a hope for him with Madeline Staveley all this might be very well. He preferred Madeline to Cowcross Street with all its delights. But when there should be no longer any hope—and indeed, as things went now, there was but little ground for hoping—what then? Might it not be that his trial had come on him too early in life, and that he would solace himself in his disappointment, if not with Carrotty Bob, with companionships and pursuits which would be as objectionable, and perhaps more expensive?

On three or four occasions his grandfather asked him how things were going at Noningsby, striving to interest himself in something as to which the outlook was not altogether dismal, and by degrees learned—not exactly all the truth—but as much of the truth as Peregrine knew.

"Do as she tells you," said the grandfather, referring to Lady Staveley's last words.

"I suppose I must," said Peregrine, sadly. "There's nothing else for it. But if there's any thing that I hate in this world it's waiting."

"You are both very young," said his grandfather.

"Yes; we are what people call young, I suppose. But I don't understand all that. Why isn't a fellow to be happy when he's young as well as when he's old?"

Sir Peregrine did not answer him, but no doubt thought that he might alter his opinion in a few years. There is great doubt as to what may be the most enviable time of life with a man. I am inclined to think that it is at that period when his children have all been born but have not yet began to go astray or to vex him with disappointment; when his own pecuniary prospects are settled, and he knows pretty well what his tether will allow him; when the appetite is still good and the digestive organs at their full power; when he has ceased to care as to the length of his girdle, and before the doctor warns him against solid breakfasts and port-wine after dinner; when his affectations are over and his infirmities have not yet come upon him; while he can still walk his ten miles, and feel some little pride in being able to do so; while he has still nerve to ride his horse to hounds, and can look with some scorn on the ignorance of younger men who have hardly yet learned that noble art. As regards men, this, I think, is the happiest time of life; but who shall answer the question as regards women? In this respect their lot is more liable to disappointment. With the choicest flowers that blow the sweetest aroma of their perfection lasts but for a moment. The hour that sees them at their fullest glory sees also the beginning of their fall.

On one morning before the trial Sir Peregrine rang his bell and requested that Mr. Peregrine might be asked to come to him. Mr. Peregrine was out at the moment, and did not make his appearance much before dark, but the baronet had fully resolved upon having this interview, and ordered that the dinner should be put back for half an hour. "Tell Mrs. Orme, with my compliments," he said, "that if it does not put her to inconvenience we will not dine till seven." It put Mrs. Orme to no inconvenience; but I am inclined to agree with the cook, who remarked that the compliments ought to have been sent to her.

"Sit down, Peregrine," he said, when his grandson entered his room with his thick boots and muddy gaiters. "I have been thinking of something."

"I and Samson have been cutting down trees all day," said Peregrine. "You've no conception how the water lies down in the bottom there; and there's a fall every yard down to the river. It's a sin not to drain it."

"Any sins of that kind, my boy, shall lie on your own head for the future. I will wash my hands of them."

"Then I'll go to work at once," said Peregrine, not quite understanding his grandfather.

"You must go to work on more than that, Peregrine." And then the old man paused. "You must not think that I am doing this because I am unhappy for the hour, or that I shall repent it when the moment has gone by."

"Doing what?" asked Peregrine.

"I have thought much of it, and I know that I am right. I can not get out as I used to do, and do not care to meet people about business."

"I never knew you more clear-headed in my life, Sir."

"Well, perhaps not. We'll say nothing about that. What I intend to do is this: to give up the property into your hands at Lady-day. You shall be master of The Cleeve from that time forth."

"Sir?"

"The truth is, you desire employment, and I don't. The property is small, and therefore wants the more looking after. I have never had a regular land steward, but have seen to that myself. If you'll take my advice you'll do the same. There is no better employment for a gentleman. So now, my boy, you may go to work and drain wherever you like. About the Crutchley bottom I have no doubt you're right. I don't know why it has been neglected." These last words the baronet uttered in a weak, melancholy tone, asking, as it were, forgiveness for his fault; whereas he had spoken out the purport of his great resolution with a clear, strong voice, as though the saying of the words pleased him well.

"I could not hear of such a thing as that," said his grandson, after a short pause.

"But you have heard it, Perry, and you may be quite sure that I should not have named it had I not fully resolved upon it. I have been thinking of it for days, and have quite made up my mind. You won't turn me out of the house, I know."

"All the same. I will not hear of it," said the young man, stoutly.

"Peregrine!"

"I know very well what it all means, Sir, and I am not at all astonished. You have wished to do something out of sheer goodness of heart, and you have been balked."

"We will not talk about that, Peregrine."

"But I must say a few words about it. All that has made you unhappy, and—and—and—" He wanted to explain that his grandfather was ashamed of his baffled attempt, and for that reason was cowed and down at heart at the present moment; but that in the three or four months when this trial would be over and the wonder passed away, all that would be forgotten, and he would be again as well as ever. But Peregrine, though he understood all this, was hardly able to express himself.

"My boy," said the old man, "I know very well what you mean. What you say is partly true, and partly not quite true. Some day, perhaps, when we are sitting here together over the fire, I shall be better able to talk over all this; but not now, Perry. God has been very good to me, and given me so much that I will not repine at this sorrow. I have lived my life, and am content."

"Oh yes, of course all that's true enough. And if God should choose that you should die, you know, or I either, some people would be sorry, but we shouldn't complain ourselves. But what I say is this: you should never give up as long as you live. There's a sort of feeling about it which I can't explain. One should always say to one's self, No surrender." And Peregrine, as he spoke, stood up from his chair, thrust his hands into his trowsers-pockets, and shook his head.

Sir Peregrine smiled as he answered him. "But, Perry, my boy, we can't always say that. When the heart, and the spirit, and the body have all surrendered, why should the voice tell a foolish falsehood?"

"But it shouldn't be a falsehood," said Peregrine. "Nobody should ever knock under of his own accord."

"You are quite right there, my boy; you are quite right there. Stick to that yourself. But remember that you are not to knock under to any of your enemies. The worst that you will meet with are folly, and vice, and extravagance."

"That's of course," said Peregrine, by no means wishing on the present occasion to bring under discussion his future contests with any such enemies as those now named by his grandfather.

"And now suppose you dress for dinner," said the baronet. "I've got ahead of you there, you see. What I've told you to-day I have already told your mother."

"I'm sure she doesn't think you right."

"If she thinks me wrong she is too kind and well-behaved to say so—which is more than I can say for her son. Your mother, Perry, never told me that I was wrong yet, though she has had many occasions—too many, too many. But come, go and dress for dinner."

"You are wrong in this, Sir, if ever you were wrong in your life," said Peregrine, leaving the room. His grandfather did not answer him again, but followed him out of the door, and walked briskly across the hall into the drawing-room.

"There's Peregrine been lecturing me about draining," he said to his daughter-in-law, striving to speak in a half-bantering tone of voice, as though things were going well with him.

"Lecturing you!" said Mrs. Orme.

"And he's right, too. There's nothing like it. He'll make a better farmer, I take it, than Lucius Mason. You'll live to see him know the value of an acre of land as well as any man in the county. It's the very thing that he's fit for. He'll do better with the property than ever I did."

There was something beautiful in the effort which the old man was making when watched by the eyes of one who knew him as well as did his daughter-in-law. She knew him, and understood all the workings of his mind, and the deep sorrow of his heart. In very truth the star of his life was going out darkly under a cloud; but he was battling against his sorrow and shame—not that he might be rid of them himself, but that others might not have to share them. That doctrine of "No surrender" was strong within his bosom, and he understood the motto in a finer sense than that in which his grandson had used it. He would not tell them that his heart was broken—not if he could help it. He would not display his wound if it might be in his power to hide it. He would not confess that lands, and houses, and seigniorial functions were no longer of value in his eyes. As far as might be possible he would bear his own load till that and the memory of his last folly might be hidden together in the grave.

But he knew that he was no longer fit for a man's work, and that it would be well that he should abandon it. He had made a terrible mistake. In his old age he had gambled for a large stake, and had lost it all. He had ventured to love—to increase the small number of those who were nearest and dearest to him, to add one to those whom he regarded as best and purest—and he had been terribly deceived. He had for many years almost worshiped the one lady who had sat at his table, and now in his old age he had asked her to share her place of honor with another. What that other was need not now be told. And the world knew that this woman was to have been his wife! He had boasted loudly that he would give her that place and those rights. He had ventured his all upon her innocence and her purity. He had ventured his all—and he had lost.

I do not say that on this account there was any need that he should be stricken to the ground—that it behooved him, as a man of high feeling, to be broken-hearted. He would have been a greater man had he possessed the power to bear up against all this, and to go forth to the world bearing his burden bravely on his shoulders. But Sir Peregrine Orme was not a great man, and possessed few or none of the elements of greatness. He was a man of a singularly pure mind, and endowed with a strong feeling of chivalry. It had been every thing to him to be spoken of by the world as a man free from reproach—who had lived with clean hands and with clean people around him. All manner of delinquencies he could forgive in his dependents which did not tell of absolute baseness: but it would have half-killed him had he ever learned that those he loved had become false or fraudulent. When his grandson had come to trouble about the rats he had acted, not over-cleverly, a certain amount of paternal anger; but had Peregrine broken his promise to him, no acting would have been necessary. It may therefore be imagined what were now his feelings as to Lady Mason.

Her he could forgive for deceiving him. He had told his daughter-in-law that he would forgive her; and it was a thing done. But he could not forgive himself in that he had been deceived. He could not forgive himself for having mingled with the sweet current of his Edith's life the foul waters of that criminal tragedy. He could not now bid her desert Lady Mason; for was it not true that the woman's wickedness was known to them two, through her resolve not to injure those who had befriended her? But all this made the matter worse rather than better to him. It is all very well to say, "No surrender;" but when the load placed upon the back is too heavy to be borne, the back must break or bend beneath it.

His load was too heavy to be borne, and therefore he said to himself that he would put it down. He would not again see Lord Alston and the old friends of former days. He would attend no more at the magistrates' bench, but would send his grandson out into his place. For the few days that remained to him in this world he might be well contented to abandon the turmoils and troubles of life. "It will not be for long," he said to himself, over and over again. And then he would sit in his arm-chair for hours, intending to turn his mind to such solemn thoughts as might befit a dying man. But as he sat there he would still think of Lady Mason. He would remember her as she had leaned against his breast on that day that he kissed her; and then he would remember her as she was when she spoke those horrid words to him—"Yes; I did it; at night, when I was alone." And this was the woman whom he had loved! This was the woman whom he still loved—if all the truth might be confessed.

His grandson, though he read much of his grandfather's mind, had failed to read it all. He did not know how often Sir Peregrine repeated to himself those words, "No surrender," or how gallantly he strove to live up to them. Lands and money and seats of honor he would surrender, as a man surrenders his tools when he has done his work; but his tone of feeling and his principle he would not surrender, though the maintenance of them should crush him with their weight. The woman had been very vile, desperately false, wicked beyond belief, with premeditated villainy, for years and years—and this was the woman whom he had wished to make the bosom companion of his latter days!

"Samson is happy now, I suppose, that he has got the axe in his hand," he said to his grandson.

"Pretty well for that, Sir, I think."

"That man will cut down every tree about the place if you'll let him." And in that way he strove to talk about the affairs of the property.

CHAPTER LX.

WHAT REBEKAH DID FOR HER SON.

EVERY day Mrs. Orme went up to Orley Farm and sat for two hours with Lady Mason. We may say that there was now no longer any secret between them, and that she whose life had been so innocent, so pure, and so good, could look into the inmost heart and soul of that other woman whose career had been supported by the proceeds of one terrible life-long iniquity. And now, by degrees, Lady Mason would begin to plead for herself, or, rather, to put in a plea for the deed she had done, acknowledging, however, that she, the doer of it, had fallen almost below forgiveness through the crime. "Was he not his son as much as that other one; and had I not deserved of him that he should do this thing for me?" And again, "Never once did I ask of him any favor for myself from the day that I gave myself to him, because he had been good to my father and mother. Up to the very hour of his death I never asked him to spend a shilling on my own account. But I asked him to do this thing for his child; and when at last he refused me, I told him that I myself would cause it to be done."

"You told him so?"

"I did; and I think that he believed me. He knew that I was one who would act up to my word. I told him that Orley Farm should belong to our babe."

"And what did he say?"

"He bade me beware of my soul. My answer was very terrible, and I will not shock you with it. Ah me! it is easy to talk of repentance, but repentance will not come with a word."

In these days Mrs. Orme became gradually aware that hitherto she had comprehended but little of Lady Mason's character. There was a power of endurance about her, and a courage that was almost awful to the mind of the weaker, softer, and better woman. Lady Mason, during her sojourn at The Cleeve, had seemed almost to sink under her misfortune; nor had there been any hypocrisy, any pretense in her apparent misery. She had been very wretched; as wretched a human creature, we may say, as any crawling God's earth at that time. But she had borne her load, and, bearing it, had gone about her work, still striving with desperate courage as the ground on which she trod continued to give way beneath her feet, inch by inch. They had known and pitied her misery; they had loved her for misery—as it is in the nature of such people to do; but they had little known how great had been the cause for it. They had sympathized with the female weakness which had succumbed when there was hardly any necessity for succumbing. Had they then known all, they would have wondered at the strength which made a struggle possible under such circumstances.

Even now she would not yield. I have said that there had been no hypocrisy in her misery during those weeks last past; and I have said so truly. But there had perhaps been some pretenses, some acting of a part, some almost necessary pretense as to her weakness. Was she not bound to account to those around her for her great sorrow? And was it not above all things needful that she should enlist their sympathy and obtain their aid? She had been obliged to cry to them for help, though obliged also to confess that there was little reason for such crying. "I am a woman, and weak," she had said, "and therefore can not walk alone, now that the way is stony." But what had been the truth with her? How would she have cried, had it been possible for her to utter the sharp cry of her heart? The waters had been closing over her head, and she had clutched at a hand to save her; but the owner of that hand might not know how imminent, how close was the danger.

But in these days, as she sat in her own room with Mrs. Orme, the owner of that hand might know every thing. The secret had been told, and there was no longer need for pretense. As she could now expose to view the whole load of her wretchedness, so also could she make known the strength that was still left for endurance. And these two women who had become endeared to each other under such terrible circumstances, came together at these meetings with more of the equality of friendship than had ever existed at The Cleeve. It may seem strange that it should be so—strange that the acknowledged forger of her husband's will should be able to maintain a better claim for equal friendship than the lady who was believed to be innocent and true! But it was so. Now she stood on true ground; now, as she sat there with Mrs. Orme, she could speak from her heart, pouring forth the real workings of her mind. From Mrs. Orme she had no longer aught to fear; nor from Sir Peregrine. Every thing was known to them, and she could now tell of every incident of her crime with an outspoken boldness that in itself was incompatible with the humble bearing of an inferior in the presence of one above her.

And she did still hope. The one point to be gained was this: that her son, her only son, the child on whose behalf this crime had been committed, should never know her shame, or live to be disgraced by her guilt. If she could be punished, she would say, and he left in ignorance of her punishment, she would not care what indignities they might heap upon her. She had heard of penal servitude, of years, terribly long, passed in all the misery of vile companionship; of solitary confinement, and the dull madness which it engenders; of all the terrors of a life spent under circumstances bearable only by the uneducated, the rude, and the vile. But all this was as nothing to her compared with the loss of honor to her son. "I should live," she would say, "but he would die. You can not ask me to become his murderer!"

It was on this point that they differed always. Mrs. Orme would have had her confess every thing to Lucius, and strove to make her understand that if he were so told, the blow would fall less heavily than it would do if the knowledge came to him from her conviction at the trial. But the mother would not bring herself to believe that it was absolutely necessary that he should ever know it. "There was the property! Yes; but let the trial come, and if she were acquitted, then let some arrangement be made about that. The lawyers might find out some cause why it should be surrendered." But Mrs. Orme feared that if the trial were over, and the criminal saved from justice, the property would not be surrendered. And then how would that wish of repentance be possible? After all, was not that the one thing necessary?

I will not say that Mrs. Orme in these days ever regretted that her sympathy and friendship had been thus bestowed, but she frequently acknowledged to herself that the position was too difficult for her. There was no one whose assistance she could ask; for she felt that she could not in this matter ask counsel from Sir Peregrine. She herself was good, and pure, and straight-minded, and simple in her perception of right and wrong; but Lady Mason was greater than she in force of character—a stronger woman in every way, endowed with more force of will, with more power of mind, with greater energy, and a swifter flow of words. Sometimes she almost thought it would be better that she should stay away from Orley Farm; but then she had promised to be true to her wretched friend, and the mother's solicitude for her son still softened the mother's heart.

In these days, till the evening came, Lucius Mason never made his way into his mother's sitting-room, which, indeed, was the drawing-room of the house—and he and Mrs. Orme, as a rule, hardly ever met each other. If he saw her as she entered or left the place, he would lift his hat to her and pass by without speaking. He was not admitted to those councils of his mother's, and would not submit to ask after his mother's welfare or to inquire as to her affairs from a stranger. On no other subject was it possible that he should now speak to the daily visitor and the only visitor at Orley Farm. All this Mrs. Orme understood, and saw that the young man was alone and comfortless. He passed his hours below, in his own room, and twice a day his mother found him in the parlor, and then they sat through their silent, miserable meals. She would then leave him, always saying some soft words of motherly love, and putting her hand either upon his shoulder or his arm. On such occasions he was never rough to her, but he would never respond to her caress. She had ill-treated him, preferring in her trouble the assistance of a stranger to his assistance. She would ask him neither for his money nor his counsel, and as she had thus chosen to stand aloof from him, he also would stand aloof from her. Not for always—as he said to himself over and over again; for his heart misgave him when he saw the lines of care so plainly written on his mother's brow. Not for always should it be so. The day of the trial would soon be present, and the day of the trial would soon be over; then again would they be friends. Poor young man! Unfortunate young man!

Mrs. Orme saw all this, and to her it was very terrible. What would be the world to her if her boy should frown at her, and look black when she caressed him? And she thought that it was the fault of the mother rather than of the son; as indeed was not all that wretchedness the mother's fault? But then again, there was the one great difficulty. How could any step be taken in the right direction till the whole truth had been confessed to him?

The two women were sitting together in that up stairs room, and the day of the trial was now not a full week distant from them, when Mrs. Orme again tried to persuade the mother to intrust her son with the burden of all her misery. On the preceding day Mr. Solomon Aram had been down at Orley Farm, and had been with Lady Mason for an hour.

"He knows the truth!" Lady Mason had said to her friend. "I am sure of that."

"But did he ask you?"

"Oh no, he did not ask me that. He asked of little things that happened at the time; but from his manner I am sure he knows it all. He says that I shall escape."

"Did he say escape?"

"No; not that word, but it was the same thing. He spoke to Lucius, for I saw them on the lawn together."

"You do not know what he said to him?"

"No; for Lucius would not speak to me, and I could not ask him." And then they both were silent, for Mrs. Orme was thinking how she could bring about that matter that was so near her heart. Lady Mason was seated in a large old-fashioned arm-chair, in which she now passed nearly all her time. The table was by her side, but she rarely turned herself to it. She sat leaning with her elbow on her arm, supporting her face with her hand; and opposite to her, so close that she might look into her face and watch every movement of her eyes, sat Mrs. Orme—intent upon that one thing, that the woman before her should be brought to repent the evil she had done.

"And you have not spoken to Lucius?"

"No," she answered. "No more than I have told you. What could I say to him about the man?"

"Not about Mr. Aram. It might not be necessary to speak of him. He has his work to do; and I suppose that he must do it in his own way?"

"Yes; he must do it in his own way. Lucius would not understand."

"Unless you told him every thing, of course he could not understand."

"That is impossible."

"No, Lady Mason, it is not impossible. Dear Lady Mason, do not turn from me in that way. It is for your sake, because I love you, that I press you to do this. If he knew it all—"

"Could you tell your son such a tale?" said Lady Mason, turning upon her sharply, and speaking almost with an air of anger.

Mrs. Orme was for a moment silenced, for she could not at once bring herself to conceive it possible that she could be so circumstanced. But at last she answered. "Yes," she said, "I think I could, if—"

And then she paused.

"If you had done such a deed! Ah, you do not know, for the doing of it would be impossible to you. You can never understand what was my childhood, and how my young years were passed. I never loved any thing but him—that is, till I knew you, and—and—" But instead of finishing her sentence she pointed down toward The Cleeve. "How, then, can I tell him? Mrs. Orme, I would let them pull me to pieces, bit by bit, if in that way I could save him."

"Not in that way," said Mrs. Orme; "not in that way."

But Lady Mason went on pouring forth the pent-up feelings of her bosom, not regarding the faint words of her companion. "Till he lay in my arms I had loved nothing. From my earliest years I had been taught to love money, wealth, and property; but as to myself the teachings had never come home to me. When they bade me marry the old man because he was rich, I obeyed them—not caring for his riches, but knowing that it behooved me to relieve them of the burden of my support. He was kinder to me than they had been, and I did for him the best I could. But his money and his wealth were little to me. He told me over and over again that when he died I should have the means to live, and that was enough. I would not pretend to him that I cared for the grandeur of his children who despised me. But then came my baby, and the world was all altered for me. What could I do for the only thing that I had ever called my own? Money and riches they had told me were every thing."

"But they had told you wrong," said Mrs. Orme, as she wiped the tears from her eyes.

"They had told me falsely. I had heard nothing but falsehoods from my youth upward," she answered, fiercely. "For myself I had not cared for these things; but why should not he have money and riches and land? His father had them to give over and above what had already made those sons and daughters so rich and proud. Why should not this other child also be his father's heir? Was he not as well born as they? was he not as fair a child? What did Rebekah do, Mrs. Orme? Did she not do worse; and did it not all go well with her? Why should my boy be an Ishmael? Why should I be treated as the bondwoman, and see my little one perish of thirst in this world's wilderness?"

"No Saviour had lived and died for the world in those days," said Mrs. Orme.

"And no Saviour had lived and died for me," said the wretched woman, almost shrieking in her despair. The lines of her face were terrible to be seen as she thus spoke, and an agony of anguish loaded her brow, upon which Mrs. Orme was frightened to look. She fell on her knees before the wretched woman, and taking her by both her hands strove all she could to find some comfort for her.

"Ah, do not say so. Do not say that. Whatever may come, that misery—that worst of miseries need not oppress you. If that indeed were true!"

"It was true; and how should it be otherwise?"

"But now, now. It need not be true now. Lady Mason, for your soul's sake say that it is so now."

"Mrs. Orme," she said, speaking with a singular quiescence of tone after the violence of her last words, "it seems to me that I care more for his soul than for my own. For myself I can bear even that. But if he were a cast-away—"

I will not attempt to report the words that passed between them for the next half hour, for they concerned a matter which I may not dare to handle too closely in such pages as these. But Mrs. Orme still knelt there at her feet, pressing Lady Mason's hands, pressing against her knees, as with all the eagerness of true affection she endeavored to bring her to a frame of mind that would admit of some comfort. But it all ended in this: Let every thing be told to Lucius, so that the first step back to honesty might be taken, and then let them trust to Him whose mercy can ever temper the wind to the shorn lamb.

But, as Lady Mason had once said to herself, repentance will not come with a word. "I can not tell him," she said at last. "It is a thing impossible. I should die at his feet before the words were spoken."

"I will do it for you," said Mrs. Orme, offering from pure charity to take upon herself a task perhaps as heavy as any that a human creature could perform. "I will tell him."

"No, no!" screamed Lady Mason, taking Mrs. Orme by both her arms as she spoke. "You will not do so: say that you will not. Remember your promise to me. Remember why it is that you know it all yourself."

"I will not, surely, unless you bid me," said Mrs. Orme.

"No, no; I do not bid you. Mind, I do not bid you. I will not have it done. Better any thing than that, while it may yet be avoided. I have your promise; have I not?"

"Oh yes; of course I should not do it unless you told me." And then, after some further short stay, during which but little was said, Mrs. Orme got up to go.

"You will come to me to-morrow," said Lady Mason.

"Yes, certainly," said Mrs. Orme.

"Because I feared that I had offended you."

"Oh no; I will take no offense from you."

"You should not, for you know what I have to bear. You know, and no one else knows. Sir Peregrine does not know. He can not understand. But you know and understand it all. And, Mrs. Orme, what you do now will be counted to you for great treasure—for very great treasure. You are better than the Samaritan, for he went on his way. But you will stay till the last. Yes; I know you will stay." And the poor creature kissed her only friend—kissed her hands and her forehead and her breast. Then Mrs. Orme went without speaking, for her heart was full, and the words would not come to her; but as she went she said to herself that she would stay till the last.

Standing alone on the steps before the front-door she found Lucius Mason all alone, and some feeling moved her to speak a word to him as she passed. "I hope all this does not trouble you much, Mr. Mason," she said, offering her hand to him. She felt that her words were hypocritical as she was speaking them; but under such circumstances what else could she say to him?

"Well, Mrs. Orme, such an episode in one's family history does give one some trouble. I am unhappy—very unhappy; but not too much so to thank you for your most unusual kindness to my poor mother." And then, having been so far encouraged by her speaking to him, he accompanied her round the house on to the lawn, from whence a path led away through a shrubbery on to the road which would take her by the village of Coldharbor to The Cleeve.

"Mr. Mason," she said, as they walked for a few steps together before the house, "do not suppose that I presume to interfere between you and your mother."

"You have a right to interfere now," he said.

"But I think you might comfort her if you would be more with her. Would it not be better if you could talk freely together about all this?"

"It would be better," he said; "but I fear that that is no longer possible. When this trial is over, and the world knows that she is innocent; when people shall see how cruelly she has been used—"

Mrs. Orme might not tell the truth to him, but she could with difficulty bear to hear him dwell thus confidently on hopes which were so false. "The future is in the hands of God, Mr. Mason; but for the present—"

"The present and the future are both in His hands, Mrs. Orme. I know my mother's innocence, and would have done a son's part toward establishing it, but she would not allow me. All this will soon be over now, and then, I trust, she and I will once again understand each other. Till then I doubt whether I should be wise to interfere. Good-morning, Mrs. Orme; and pray believe that I appreciate at its full worth all that you are doing for her." Then he again lifted his hat and left her.

Lady Mason from her window saw them as they walked together, and her heart for a moment misgave her. Could it be that her friend was treacherous to her? Was it possible that even now she was telling every thing that she had sworn that she would not tell? Why were they two together, seeing that they passed each other day by day without intercourse? And so she watched with anxious eyes till they parted, and then she saw that Lucius stood idly on the terrace swinging his stick as he looked down the hill toward the orchard below him. He would not have stood thus calmly had he already heard his mother's shame. This she knew; and having laid aside her immediate fears she retreated back to her chair. No; she would not tell him: at any rate till the trial should be over.

THE HARTFORD CONVENTION.

"I HOPE you will give the scoundrels of the Hartford Convention their just deserts."—"I hope you will do justice to the patriotic members of the Hartford Convention." Such are the opposing injunctions given in letters recently received by the writer concerning a History of the War of 1812 from two correspondents who were young and ardent politicians fifty years ago. They are strangers to each other, and live four hundred miles apart. They have each borne, during that long half century, in the midst of the ever-changing scenes of political life, the deep impressions made upon their minds in young manhood by the opinions prevalent when the second war for Independence was drawing to a close. They represent the opposing political parties of that period—Federalists and Democrats. One party regarded the Hartford Convention as a conclave of wise and devoted patriots; the other party regarded it as a nest of traitors. We of to-day may look back upon those scenes of tumult without passion, and with vision unobscured by the smoke and dust of contending factions. These have long since been cleared away by the sweeping wings of Time, and acts and actors appear in full proportions and perfect features in the mirror of historic truth. Let us see what that mirror reflects concerning the Hartford Convention, its origin and its motives.

From the beginning the interests of different sections of the new Republic were diverse, and, to the common and more narrow view, conflicting. The bleak hills of New England, on which snows lay a third of the year, and whose fertile valleys were far inferior in area to the hills and the mountains, were not so inviting to the hand of labor as the gently-rolling plains and broad savannas south of the Potomac and the Roanoke, nor promised half so generous returns for the expenditure of toil. The hardy New Englanders, reared among mountain winds, on which a pabulum of physical vigor and purity always floats, and inspired by rugged and ever-varying scenery, which gives lasting stimulus to the brain, were restless and active; and while many delved in the stingy soil many others went out upon the ocean, from every creek and estuary and harbor, in search of wealth and enjoyment. They became a commercial people, and cherished Manufactures, the godmother of Commerce.

The soft climate and generous soil of the South enticed labor by truthful promises of large reward. The songs of birds, the fragrance of flowers, the delicious dreamy loveliness of nature in earth and sky, made it a paradise wherein no serpent was visible. But the tempter was there. Idleness, with its siren voice, called Labor away to the intoxications of Ease and fatal Indulgence. The sinews of Industry were palsied by the charm, and the European was soon made to dread the drudgery of the field. The African came to his relief. He took the hoe and the seed from the white man's hand, and made the fields blossom more beautiful than ever. The "dominant race" gladly accepted the relation of master and slave. The tobacco and rice of the South were more remunerative than the wheat and flax of the North, in proportion to the intelligent labor bestowed on their cultivation, and the master was content. Soon came the Cotton Plant, like a beautiful white fairy, from other lands, with wealth-bearing pinions and the mien of a king. The planters received the stranger with joy. Labor and capital were in their hands, and the theatre for their employment was in the fertile fields around them. They cared nothing for the ocean except as a highway for the new monarch, nor for ships except as vehicles for his majesty. The inhabitants below the Potomac and the Roanoke became an agricultural people. Over all that region the brain of the white man planned and the sinews of the negro executed.

In the North the "dominant race" labored; in the South it merely governed.

The industrial pursuits of each section were distinct in character, but, rightly considered, were wedded in interest. But political jealousies, arising from the conflicts between National and State sovereignty, caused a conflict of interests; and from the beginning the idea was prevalent that one section was endeavoring to control the National Government for the promotion of its own interests at the expense of those of the other. Virginia charged such motives upon New England until Jefferson, the great expounder of her political dogmas, was seated in the Presidential chair, when New England retorted in kind. During the first quarter of the present century, while the three successive Presidents were Virginians, commercial New England was politically opposed to the National Administration, supposed to be managed in the interest of the agricultural South; and in the great arena of political combat—the National Congress—these industries formed the chief topic for debate, crimination and recrimination, in connection with certain political ideas held in common by the opposing parties respectively with England and France. These two nations were waging a tremendous war against each other. The opponents of the Administration were the Federal party, who, during the presidencies of Washington and Adams, sympathized with England as the exponent and champion of law and order. The Administration party were Republicans or Democrats, who, with Jefferson as their leader, sympathized with France, during that time, as the champion of popular liberty and the enemy of tyrants. Hence the Democrats were called the "French party," and the Federalists the "English party." These were political watchwords down to the close of the war of 1812.

In 1806 the conflict for power between England and France was fearful, and each party soon aimed tremendous blows at the other, unmindful of the fact that they fell as destructively upon neutral nations. By a British Order in Council, issued in May of that year, the whole coast of Europe, from Brest in France to the mouth of the Elbe in Germany—a line six hundred miles in extent—was declared to be in a state of blockade, and neutral vessels were prohibited entering any of the ports on that coast. This was a measure which had been resorted to by England twice before for starving France. She was then Mistress of the Seas; and she used her power regardless of right or justice.

Napoleon, Emperor of the French, retaliated. From the imperial camp at Berlin, in November following, he issued a Decree declaring all the British islands in a state of blockade. This was followed in January by a British Order in Council, which forbade neutral vessels trading from one port to another of France or her allies, or which was in possession of her armies, or of any country from which British vessels were excluded. This was followed in December by another Decree, issued by Napoleon from his "Royal Palace at Milan," which declared all vessels bound to or sailing from England, or which had submitted to English search, to be subject to capture and condemnation. Thus, by really "paper blockades" (for neither party had ships sufficient to enforce the Orders and Decrees), the commerce of the world was suddenly paralyzed. That of the United States, which for some years had been very lucrative, was utterly prostrated. England was most blamed, because she inaugurated the iniquitous measures against the interests of neutrals; but toward both nations the Americans felt the greatest indignation.

Negotiations were immediately opened with both belligerent governments for the removal of these disastrous restrictions upon commerce. But all peaceful efforts were made in vain. Napoleon was determined to make the Americans his allies, if possible; and England, with her usual domineering spirit, was equally determined to punish all who might in any way favor her deadly enemy. An English publicist, employed by the Government to present an excuse to the world for conduct which she knew to be indefensible by the law of nations, declared that the neutral commerce of the Americans, by which France was benefited, was "war in disguise." Making this sophistry her defensive plea, England proceeded to destroy that commerce.

Negotiations having failed, the United States Government resolved to try the effects of non-intercourse, used so potently during the days preceding the Revolution. At about the same time when the Milan Decree was issued the President of the United States recommended to Congress the laying of an Embargo, universal in extent and unlimited in duration. The Administration party were in a large majority in the National Congress, and a most stringent Embargo was put in operation. It bound the coasting trade and the land intercourse between the States and the neighboring British colonies. What little vitality American commerce had preserved was by this measure totally destroyed, and a large portion of the community, especially in the Eastern States, were instantly thrown out of employment and reduced to distress.

The Embargo created intense excitement throughout the country, especially in New England. The Federal party took a bold stand against it as an Administration measure, and mercantile communities vehemently denounced it as cruel and positively unnecessary. During two years that the Embargo or other restrictive measures were in force it was evaded and defied. It was denounced in town meetings as tyrannical; and New England magistrates refused to enforce its provisions, because the law was unconstitutional. The Sovereignty of the States was invoked to interfere; and in some instances partisan and personal feeling was so strong that men openly defended the course of Great Britain as just and necessary—"essential to her existence." Threats of disunion and secession were heard from several quarters; and so general and open was the opposition to the administrators of the National Government by the leaders of the Federal party in New England, that the impression went abroad that the Eastern States were ready to leave the Union, and form a separate and independent government. "Look, Sir"—said Dewitt Clinton, in the Senate of New York, in February, 1809—"Look, Sir, at the storm which is gathering in the East. Its clouds are black, heavy, and portentous. Look at the resolves of several of the towns, and even of the capital of Massachusetts. Observe the disorganizing, Jacobinical, seditious, and traitorous spirit which pervades them. The Legislatures of the different States are invited to array themselves against the General Government. The very men who, a few years ago, were the strenuous advocates for smiting down the State governments, for a strong National Executive that would maintain the Union of the States—for an energetic, absorbing National Government—are now the warm partisans of State supremacy. The resolutions of Boston are more seditious and reprehensible than any that were passed at the time of the Whisky Insurrection of Pennsylvania." Others sounded alarm notes, and suspicions of positive disloyalty on the part of New England were felt throughout the Union.

At this juncture a secret agent was sent to Boston from the representative of the British Government in Canada, to watch the course of political events there, sound the leading Federalists as to their willingness, in the event of a separation, to make a connection with Great Britain, and to do all in his power to foment greater discord between the Northern and Southern sections of the Union. He remained there several weeks, but saw no reason for avowing his true character to any one, not even to the British consul. At length he became convinced that he could not serve his employer as he had expected. "Weak men," he said, "are sure to temporize when great events call upon them for decision." His mission was speedily ended by recall. Mr. Erskine, the British minister at Washington, to the disappointment of his Government, made arrangements for the settlement of disputes between the United States and Great Britain, which caused the President to proclaim the Embargo to be at an end. This silenced the opposition. Their disunion schemes, if they ever had any, were left without present excuse; and in his wrathful disappointment, the Secretary of the Governor-General of Canada wrote to the British spy: "I am cruelly out of spirits at the idea of England truckling to such a debased and accursed Government as that of the United States." Once again the secret machinations of the ruling powers of England to destroy the American Government were frustrated, as they ever will be.

England repudiated the peaceful and just arrangements made by Mr. Erskine, and commercial restrictions were again imposed by the Government of the United States. The old party animosities were revived in all their vigor, and in the spring of 1812 a new cause for mutual exasperation and for suspicion of the loyalty of New England appeared. Hitherto the mission of the British spy had been unknown in the United States. He failed to get his promised reward in Canada, and after waiting a long time in vain he went to England with certificates of his fidelity as a spy. He was received with the greatest favor into aristocratic circles. He was admitted to membership in the PITT CLUB without the formality of an election; and he had free entrance to exclusive circles so long as his money lasted. But when that failed, and he became a suppliant at the feet of Lord Liverpool for the reward of his faithfulness, he was coolly referred back to the successor of his employer in Canada. The spy (John Henry) was exasperated. He sailed for Boston instead of for Quebec, and laid the whole secrets of his mission at the feet of the President of the United States for a handsome consideration. Preparations for declaring war against Great Britain were then maturing. These disclosures would greatly aid the war party and confound the opposition; so the President published them to the world, saying, in his message to Congress: "They prove that at a recent period, while the United States, notwithstanding the wrongs sustained by them, ceased not to observe the laws of peace and neutrality toward Great Britain, and in the midst of peace and amicable profession and negotiations on the part of the British Government, through its public minister here, a secret agent of that Government was employed in certain States, more especially at the seat of the government of Massachusetts, in fomenting disaffection to the constituted authorities of the nation, and in intrigues with the disaffected, for the purpose of bringing about resistance to the laws, and eventually, in concert with a British force, of destroying the Union and forcing the Eastern part thereof into a political connection with Great Britain."

A most profound sensation was produced by these disclosures throughout the country. The old suspicions of New England disloyalty were intensified, and the Administration party and all who were in favor of war made the most of the excitement. That most was but little. The fact remains that the British Government had been treacherously endeavoring to destroy the Union while professing friendship, but investigation led to no discovery of a shadow of proof that any American in New England or elsewhere had been a party to the shameful scheme.

War was declared in June, 1812, by a vote, in the House of Representatives, of 79 against 49. Of the 79 votes Pennsylvania and the States south of it gave 62. In the Senate the majority and geographical character of the vote were about the same. It was essentially a Southern measure. New England complained. War put her commerce in jeopardy, while it threatened no great harm to the planter. War was declared because American commerce and sailors' rights were injured by Great Britain, but by that portion of the Union, South and West, where commerce and sailors' rights were almost practically unknown. "The war," says a late writer (Edwin Williams), "may be said to have been a measure of the South and West to take care of the interests of the North, much against the will of the latter."

Before and after the declaration of war the Federalists, especially in New England, vehemently opposed it. It could not be denied that the Americans had just cause for the measure. England, the old oppressor, was again before them with her frowns and superciliousness. Her complicity in the destruction of American commerce, and her persistence in the nefarious practice of impressing American seamen into the British service, were a sufficient justification for an independent nation to seek redress by an appeal to arms.

But New England was more exposed to desolation and more inviting to invasion than any other section of the country. The war was with a powerful maritime nation, whose privateers would soon sweep the coast marine of New England from the sea, and whose ships-of-the-line might lay the sea-port towns in ashes from Fairfield to Castine. The people of New England were peaceful and opposed to war; their representatives in Congress had voted against the war; then why should they give it support and countenance?

The war had been declared only after long-suffering and patient attempts to procure redress without a resort to arms. A majority of the people of the republic were in favor of this method of vindicating their national honor and independence; and the representatives of that majority had made the declaration. It was therefore unpatriotic to cast obstacles in the way. Yet it was done with fearful effect. The more desperate opponents of the war and of the Administration—politicians whom true patriots despised—formed a "Peace party," avowedly for the purpose of embarrassing the Government, and compelling it to make peace with Great Britain on any terms. They controlled the press extensively, and through it they operated powerfully upon the public mind. They decried national victories, and magnified those of the British. They were professional alarmists. They used every exertion to destroy the public credit. They discouraged Government loans, promoted smuggling, and in every conceivable way gave "aid and comfort to the enemy" without performing overt acts of treason.

Many of the clergy and magistrates arrayed themselves against the Government. Disunion was openly advocated. "The Union has been long since virtually dissolved," said the rector of Trinity Church, Boston, "and it is full time that this part of the disunited States should take care of itself." "If at the command of wicked rulers," said the pastor of the church at Medford, "they undertake an unjust war, each man who volunteers his services in such a cause, or loans his money for its support, or by his conversation, his writings, or any other mode of influence encourages its prosecution, that man is an accomplice in the wickedness, loads his conscience with the blackest crimes, brings the guilt of blood upon his soul, and in the sight of God and His law is a murderer." "The Israelites became weary of yielding the fruit of their labor to pamper their splendid tyrants," said a Doctor of Divinity at Byfield. "They left their political woes. They separated. Where is our Moses?" And when the brave soldiers of the West had fallen at the Raisin and the Thames, in conflict with the savages of the forest brought against them by the British, this same D.D. said, exultingly, "Those Western States, which have been violent for this abominable war of murder—those States which have thirsted for blood—God has given them blood to drink! Their men have fallen. Their lamentations are deep and loud."

Thus spoke the pulpit here and there, while magistrates and public officers set the Government at defiance. Three of the New England Governors refused to respond to the call of the President for militia, appealing to the Constitution and the "reserved rights" of the States for justification. The use of the jails of Massachusetts for British prisoners was refused; and in many ways New England stood in an attitude of half-rebellion against the National Government during a greater portion of the war. They argued that the Divine law of self-preservation was superior to all human law; and then pointed to the fact, with much force, that the militia of New England, especially of the portion bordering on the sea, were needed for the defense of their coast.

In the autumn of 1814, when the war had been prosecuted for more than two years, and the utter prostration of business had produced wide-spread distress, especially in New England—when the banks of the country had suspended specie payments, and the Government was bankrupt, clamors for peace became more tumultuous than ever. Negotiations for peace were already in progress at Ghent in Belgium; but the unfair demands and denials of Great Britain gave very little promise of satisfactory results. That haughty power would not consent to make peace except on very humiliating terms for the Americans; and yet there were those who could not value national independence, or comprehend their duty to posterity, who thought that peace would be cheaply purchased even on such terms. While the Legislature of New York pronounced the terms proposed by the British "extravagant and disgraceful," and that of Virginia called them "arrogant and insulting," the New England Legislatures had no word of condemnation.

The National Government, meanwhile, was putting forth all its strength in the prosecution of the war, and in the autumn of 1814 measures were adopted for filling the ranks of the existing army to the full amount of 62,000 men, and the creation of an additional regular force of 40,000, to be locally employed for the defense of the frontier and sea-coast, the whole number to be raised by conscription or draft. This brought matters to a crisis in New England. In some of the other States the matter of local defenses had been left almost wholly to the discretion of their respective Governors. But the President, made suspicious of the loyalty of the New England people by the manifestations of opposition to the General Government which had appeared there for several years preceding, insisted upon the exclusive control of all military movements there. Because the Massachusetts militia had not been placed under General Dearborn's orders, the Secretary of State, in an official letter to Governor Strong, refused to pay the expenses of defending Massachusetts against the common enemy. Similar action for similar cause had been had in Connecticut. Great discontent followed; and a clamor was immediately raised that New England was abandoned to the enemy by the National Government. A joint Committee of the Massachusetts Legislature reported that, in the position in which that State stood, no choice was left her between submission to the enemy, which was not to be thought of, and the appropriation to her own defense of those revenues derived from her people, but which the General Government had hitherto thought proper to expend elsewhere. This was a covert threat of independent action on the part of New England. The Committee then proceeded to recommend "a conference between those States, the affinity of whose interests is closest, and whose habits of intercourse, from local and other causes, are most frequent, to the end that, by a comparison of their sentiments and views, some mode of defense suited to the circumstances and exigencies of those States, and measures for accelerating the return of prosperity may be devised; and also to enable the delegates from those States, should they deem it expedient, to lay the foundation of a radical reform in the national compact, by inviting to a future Convention a deputation from all the States in the Union."

The Democratic members of the Massachusetts Legislature vehemently assailed this report and its recommendations. They denounced it as a disguised movement to prepare the way for a dissolution of the Union. The protests of the minority were of no avail. The report of the Committee was adopted by a vote of three to one; and as the country was in a state of great alarm, owing to the recent destruction of the National capital by the enemy, and the prospect of a more vigorous prosecution of the war along the coast from the Chesapeake to the Penobscot, immediate action followed. A circular letter was addressed by the Massachusetts Legislature to the Governors of the other New England States, inviting the appointment of delegates to meet in Convention at an early day, "to deliberate upon the dangers to which the Eastern section of the Union is exposed by the course of the war, and which there is too much reason to believe will thicken round them in its progress; and to devise, if practicable, means of security and defense which may be consistent with the preservation of their resources from total ruin, and adapted to their local situation, mutual relations, and habits, and not repugnant to their obligations as members of the Union." They also proposed a consideration of some amendments to the Constitution on the subject of slave representation, that might secure to the New England States equal advantages with others. "This Legislature," said the circular, "is content, for its justification, to repose on the purity of its own motives, and upon the known attachment of its constituents to the National Union, and to the rights and independence of their country."

The proposition of Massachusetts was acceded to, and a convention of delegates representing the New England States was appointed to be held at Hartford, in Connecticut, on the 15th of December. This movement created much alarm at the seat of Government, more especially because at about the same time the Legislature of Massachusetts appropriated a million of dollars toward the support of ten thousand men to relieve the militia in service, and to be, like that militia, exclusively under State control. All sorts of wild rumors and suggestions were put afloat, and the accusations of plottings and treasons made against the Federal party, from the alleged monarchical schemes of Hamilton to the failure of John Henry, were spread before the excited public mind in the most startling colors. A new organization called "Washington Benevolent Societies," nominally for charitable purposes, but really with political aims, distinguished the Federalists at this time and drew upon them the most vigilant suspicions. President Madison, naturally timid, was greatly harassed by fears of sedition and disunion, and the extreme doctrines of State rights which he had put forth by resolutions of the Virginia Legislature in 1798, for a political purpose, now assumed a fearful ghostly shape in New England garb. The Democratic press in all parts of the country exhibited real or feigned alarm; and the thoughts of millions were turned toward Hartford, a small commercial town of only four thousand inhabitants, on the memorable day appointed for the assembling of that mysterious Convention.

On Thursday morning, the 15th of December, 1815, the famous Hartford Convention commenced its sessions. Twenty-six delegates were present: namely, George Cabot, Nathan Dane, William Prescott, Harrison Gray Otis, Timothy Bigelow, Joshua Thomas, Samuel Sumner Wilde, Joseph Lyman, Stephen Longfellow, Jun., Daniel Waldo, Hodijah Baylies, and George Bliss, from Massachusetts; Chauncey Goodrich, John Treadwell, James Hillhouse, Zephaniah Swift, Nathaniel Smith, Calvin Goddard, and Roger Minot Sherman, from Connecticut; Daniel Lyman, Samuel Ward, Edward Manton, and Benjamin Hazard, from Rhode Island; Benjamin West, and Mills Olcott, from New Hampshire; and William Hall, Jun., from Vermont. George Cabot of Boston was chosen President of the Convention, and Theodore Dwight of Hartford was appointed Secretary. The sessions of the Convention continued three weeks, and were held with closed doors. Major (afterward General) Jesup, a young Kentuckian, was then stationed with his regiment at Hartford. He had been ordered there nominally for the purpose of recruiting for the regular army, but really under instructions, no doubt, to watch the movements of the supposed traitorous conclave. It was believed that with this force at hand, and New York troops under the vigilant Governor Tompkins at supporting distance, any sudden rebellious manifestation might be suppressed.

The doubt, perplexity, and alarm created by this Convention were heightened by the tone of the Federal newspapers in New England, and especially in Boston, during its sittings. Writers in those papers, who were evidently disunionists, seemed apprehensive that the delegates were too conservative, and would not take the high and independent stand which the crisis demanded. They called loudly for relief; and throughout all their essays a desire for a withdrawal from the Union and a separate peace with England was plainly manifested. The Byfield Doctor of Divinity already alluded to had said in the pulpit: "New England, if invaded, would be obliged to defend herself. Do you not thus owe it to your children, and owe it to your God, to make peace for yourselves?" And this suggestion of his appeal became the text for many a lay sermon that heightened the suspicion of New England loyalty in the public mind, and fixed upon the Hartford Convention a stigma which, in the lapse of half a century, has not been entirely removed.

Day after day the Convention proceeded in its work with closed doors. Its session was opened every morning with prayer by Hartford clergymen, among whom the Rev. Dr. Strong was the most prominent. On the second day a committee appointed to inquire "what subjects will be proper to be considered by the Convention? and to report such propositions for that purpose," submitted the following as proper topics for their consideration: "The powers claimed by the Executive of the United States to determine, conclusively, in respect to calling out the militia of the States into the service of the United States; and the dividing the United States into military districts, with an officer of the army in each thereof, with discretionary authority from the Executive of the United States to call for the militia to be under the command of such officer. The refusal of the Executive of the United States to supply or pay the militia of certain States, called out for their defense, on the grounds of their not having been called out under the authority of the United States, or not having been, by the Executive of the State, put under the command of the commander over the military district. The failure of the Government of the United States to supply and pay the militia of the States, by them admitted to have been in the United States service. The Report of the Secretary of War to Congress on filling the ranks of the army, together with a bill or act on that subject. A bill before Congress, providing for classifying and drafting the militia. The expenditure of the revenue of the nation in offensive operations on the neighboring provinces of the enemy. The failure of the Government of the United States to provide for the common defense; and the consequent obligations, necessity, and burdens devolved on the separate States to defend themselves—together with the mode and the ways and means in their power for accomplishing the object." Such was the work which the Convention, at the outset, proposed for itself.

On the 20th, a committee appointed for the purpose reported "a general project of such measures" as might be proper for the Convention to adopt. On the 24th, after receiving a communication from several citizens belonging to the county of Washington, in the State of New York, they adopted a report that it would be expedient for the Convention to "prepare a general statement of the unconstitutional attempts of the Executive Government of the United States to infringe upon the rights of the individual States in regard to the militia, and of the still more alarming claims to infringe on the rights of the States manifested in the letter of the Secretary of War," etc., and to recommend to the Legislatures of the States the adoption of the most effectual and decisive measures to protect the militia and the States from the usurpations contained in these proceedings. Also to prepare a statement concerning the general subject of State defenses, and to recommend an earnest application to the National Government for an arrangement with the States by which they would be allowed to retain a portion of the taxes levied by Congress, to be devoted to the expenses of self-defense, and for the reimbursement of money already expended by them for such purpose. They also proposed, by amendments to the Constitution, to accomplish the following results: 1. The restriction of the power of Congress to declare and make war. 2. A restraint of the exercise of unlimited power by Congress to make new States and admit them into the Union. 3. A restraint of the powers of Congress in laying embargoes and restrictions on commerce. 4. A stipulation that a President of the United States shall not be elected from the same State two consecutive terms; and, 5. That the same person shall not be elected President a second time. 6. That alterations be made concerning slave representation and taxation.

On the 4th of January, 1815, a Report with

Resolutions, to be laid before the Legislatures of the respective States represented in the Convention, was adopted; and the next morning, at nine o'clock, after prayer by Dr. Strong, the Convention finally adjourned. The Report, moderate but firm, able in construction, and forcible though heretical in arguments and conclusions, was immediately published and extensively circulated throughout the country. It exhibited the ring of the metal of the protest of the minority of the Twelfth Congress against the declaration of war, written chiefly by the now venerable Josiah Quincy of Boston, the last survivor of that Congress. It was read with the greatest avidity. It disappointed the expectations of the ultra-Federalists and the suspicious Democrats. The few disunionists of New England found in it no promises of a separation; and the Administration party perceived in it no signs of sedition or treason. It presented a concise view of the current and past policy of the Government, and summed up the sentiments of the Convention in the following resolutions, which were recommended for adoption to the State Legislatures:

"Resolved, That it be and hereby is recommended to the Legislatures of the several States represented in this Convention to adopt all such measures as may be necessary effectually to protect the citizens of said States from the operation and effects of all acts which have been or may be passed by the Congress of the United States, which shall contain provisions subjecting the militia or other citizens to forcible drafts, conscriptions, or impressments, not authorized by the Constitution of the United States.

"Resolved, That it be and hereby is recommended to the said Legislatures to authorize an immediate and earnest application to be made to the Government of the United States, requesting their consent to some arrangement whereby the said States may, separately or in concert, be empowered to assume upon themselves the defense of their territory against the enemy; and a reasonable portion of the taxes collected within said States may be paid into the respective treasuries thereof, and appropriated to the payment of the balance due said States, and to the future defense of the same. The amount so paid into the said treasuries to be credited, and the disbursements made as aforesaid to be charged, to the United States.

"Resolved, That it be and it hereby is recommended to the Legislatures of the aforesaid States to pass laws (where it has not already been done) authorizing the Governors or Commanders-in-chief of their militia, to make detachments of the same, or to form voluntary corps, as shall be most convenient and conformable to their Constitutions, and to cause the same to be well armed, equipped, and disciplined, and held in readiness for service; and, upon the request of the Governor of either of the other States, to employ the whole of such detachments or corps, as well as the regular force of the State, or such part thereof as may be required, and can be spared consistently with the safety of the State, in assisting the State making such request, to repel any invasion thereof which shall be made or attempted by the public enemy."

There were other resolutions, but they referred to amendments of the Constitution already alluded to. The most that can be said against the resolutions just quoted is, that they abandon the doctrine of a consolidated nation formed by the ratification of the Constitution by the people, for which the Washingtonian Federalists so strenuously contended, and are deeply tinged with the fatal heresy of State supremacy, or, at least, State independence, which has produced fearful effects in our day.

It was resolved that, should the proposed application to Congress be fruitless, and the existing circumstances seem to warrant, a Committee appointed for the purpose should call another Convention to meet in Boston in June following. This contingency did not occur. The Legislatures of Massachusetts and Connecticut accepted the report, and appointed commissioners to go to Washington to lay the proposed arrangement as to taxes before Congress; a proposition in the form of a request, but, under the circumstances, with the spirit of a demand. Peace came at this moment, with her insignia of reconciliation, and by a sweep of her wand all disputes raised by the presence of war were instantly hushed.

When the Hartford Convention adjourned on the 5th of January the opinion was prevalent that another Convention would be held. On that account the injunction of secrecy was not removed, and the journal of the Convention was sealed and placed in the hands of the President. Because it was not published conjecture invented many reasons, all unfavorable to the movement and the participators in it. It was asserted by the opposite party that treasonable schemes were proposed in the Convention, and the names of members were given as the authors of them. Some went so far as to describe the manner in which they were received, debated, and disposed of. The members of the Convention took no steps to refute the many charges against them. The journal was placed in the office of the Secretary of the State of Massachusetts in the autumn of 1819, where it might be read by all who chose to peruse it. It was accompanied by the following certificate: "I, George Cabot, late President of the Convention assembled at Hartford on the fifteenth day of December, 1814, do hereby certify, that the foregoing is the original and only journal of the proceedings of that Convention; and that the twenty-seven written pages which compose it, and the printed report, comprise a faithful and complete record of all the motions, resolutions, votes, and proceedings of that Convention. And I do further certify, that this journal has been constantly in my exclusive custody from the time of the adjournment of the Convention to the delivery of it into the office of the Secretary of this Commonwealth."

The journal was afterward published in pamphlets and newspapers. Its freedom from all treasonable or even seditious features (unless we regard the belief in the political heresy of State supremacy to be such) would immediately destroy the political capital created by the mystery that had enshrouded it, so it was immediately asserted and widely believed, in the face of the unimpeachable testimony of Mr. Cabot, that the obnoxious parts of it—the demon hoofs and horns of treason—had been suppressed in the publication. For long years that Convention remained a by-word and a reproach to the Federal party and other organizations that succeeded it. Even the testimony in a court of justice, under oath, of a man so universally esteemed as Roger Minot Sherman, when he said, in 1831—"I believe I know their proceedings perfectly, and that every measure, done or proposed, has been published to the world"—could not remove the prejudice concerning that Convention, its aims and its doings, which unscrupulous politicians were ever ready to foster. Even now, the Hartford Convention is associated in the minds of many with the Nullification movements in South Carolina in 1832-33, and the rampant treason in arms in the Slave States in 1861-62. It is surprising to see the writer of a current history of this rebellion use the following language—"Well would it have been for the country—for the lately seceded States—if the loyal people of the cotton-growing Commonwealths had crushed their disloyal leaders, as the New Englanders crushed out the treason hatched by the Hartford Disunion Convention!"

He who will take pains to inquire, without prejudice, will be satisfied that the twenty-six eminent men who composed the Hartford Convention were as wise as loyal and patriotic as the average of the legislators and politicians of that day or since. They represented the conservative sentiment of discontented New England during a season of great trial.

THE UNSIGNED RECEIPT.

THE year before I retired from practice I had, among the young gentlemen who read law under my direction, one whose name was Edward Marsh. He was quite clever and assiduous. His father had been a client of mine for many years, and, previous to his insolvency, a very profitable one. From regard for him, and in consideration of his altered circumstances, I declined to accept the customary fee for directing his son's studies. Young Marsh is now practicing law in one of our Western States, where he is quite distinguished. I am told that they talk of him for a judgeship, although he has only been four years at the bar. He has ability, doubtless, and learning, probably; but at the outset of my legal career they did not place boys on the bench. The profession is going to the dogs, and the judiciary along with it.

However, I did not commence an essay upon the bench and bar. I intended to tell the story of a case in which this young Marsh figured a little, though not so prominently as others.

I came into the case in this way. I had been engaged in court all day in a very fatiguing suit, and merely visited my office to obtain some papers that I wished to examine at home at my leisure. While I was at my secretary there came a tap at the door, and on bidding the intruder enter Marsh came in.

"I beg your pardon, Sir," said he, "but I would like to have a little conversation with you."

"Very good. Go on."

"I wish, as a favor to me, you would undertake the case of Evans."

"I do not wish to; I have declined already. How will it serve you?"

"Why, you see, Sir, I and Kitty—that is, Kitty and I—"

He paused, in embarrassment, and I turned in some surprise.

"Pray, who is Kitty, Mr. Marsh?"

"Miss Kitty Evans."

"Oh, I see," I rejoined, laughing. "Kitty is our daughter, and you want me to take up the case of the father-in-law elect."

"Why, you see, Sir, the rest of the bar share your aversion to the case; and he prefers you, at any rate. If you would take it at my instance it would be of service to me."

Under the circumstances I reconsidered my refusal, and told Marsh to send Kitty's father to me on the following day. The lover departed in high spirits.

This Evans was a real-estate agent and rent collector, who had acquired some money by his profession. He was indefatigable in dunning delinquent tenants, and sufficiently prompt in paying over the proceeds, so that he had a number of patrons. But he had not the best reputation along with this. He was regarded as a rather slippery fellow. The little intercourse I had had with him had satisfied me he was not a desirable client—the impression on my mind was adverse to his fairness and honesty, and I shunned him.

The particular case in which he desired my services was as follows:

Among the patrons of Evans had been a wealthy man named Clarence Preston. The collections made for him during one quarter had amounted to eighteen hundred and twenty dollars, which had been paid over, less the five per cent. commission, in the presence of Preston's attorney. Evans took a receipt, but went away leaving it on his patron's table. He called to get it on the following morning, but was astounded to learn that Mr. Preston had been attacked by apoplexy about two hours after he had left the house and died at midnight. Mr. Van Buren, the attorney, had placed his seal on all the papers of the deceased. When the executor took charge Evans renewed his application for the receipt. Mr. Schermerhorn, the executor, made search accordingly, and found a paper partly answering Evans's description, but differing in one important particular. It recited and acknowledged the payment of seventeen hundred and twenty-nine dollars; but it was without signature. Evans then went to the attorney as a witness, but, to his consternation, the latter denied that any money had been paid, or receipt given therefor, in his presence. The executor, under these circumstances, brought suit to recover the rents collected, and claimed eighteen hundred and sixty-five dollars as due to the estate.

When Evans called on me, according to appointment, I questioned him closely.

"Are you sure," I asked, "that the receipt had been signed when you left?"

"Positively. There was no blotting-paper, and I let it lie for a few minutes on the table to dry, and that is how I came, engrossed with the conversation we had, to forget it."

"Did Mr. Schermerhorn show you the unsigned receipt?"

"Yes. It was the same I had written. I knew it by my own handwriting, and by a couple of specks in the paper. I had neglected to bring my receipt-book with me, and wrote the receipt on a loose piece of paper lying on the table."

"Might it not have been an unsigned duplicate?"

"No; I only prepared one for Preston to sign."

"Were there any marks showing an erasure of the signature?"

"Not the slightest that I could see, and I held it up to the light. There is the mystery. The place where the signature had been was apparently plain, white paper."

"Have you the number and description of the notes you paid?"

"A description of one only—not its letter or number. That was a hundred-dollar bill on the Mechanics' Bank of Philadelphia. It had on its back the initials of the tenant—John Y. Carter—from whom I received it. The other notes were those of the Shoe and Leather Bank, with which I deposit. A private mark of my own was also on the Philadelphia note."

"Well," I said, "in accepting your case I am bound to believe your statement; but a court and jury are not, and will not be likely to do so. You will have probably to pay the money in the end, and it would be as well to do it without the expense and trouble of a suit."

"I don't intend to pay money twice; at least not if I can help it," said Evans. "Something may turn up in the mean while. Fight them."

"Very well. As I have agreed to take the case in hand, fight them we will; but you have neither force nor material for a contest. It is simply your story against evidence oral and written."

I knew Mr. Schermerhorn, the sole executor, very well. He lived in the same block that I did, and I determined to drop in on him after dinner, and discuss the matter in a friendly way. It was quite unprofessional to do this, of course; but the whole case was exceptional.

I found Schermerhorn to be frank and communicative.

"It is a matter of personal indifference to me," said he, "and if it looked even fair, I should make a mere show of opposition. But I don't believe a single word of Evans's story. Between ourselves, your client is at a very silly and unprofitable piece of roguery. He is too sharp a fellow to have left a receipt behind him, even if he took one upon a loose piece of paper. But that isn't his way. He would have brought his receipt-book. The claim is an after-thought on hearing of Preston's sudden death."

"But," I suggested, "how does it happen then that the receipt, even if unsigned, was found among Preston's papers?"

"That is not easily accounted for, but it might be. Evans might have left it then, intending to pay the money, but neglecting it, or might have left it before. At all events it proves nothing for you. For there is Van Buren—an upright man of unimpeachable character—who is ready to swear that no money was paid that night, and no receipt passed. He was with Preston when Evans came in, and remained with him after he went, until he was attacked with the apoplectic fit. You won't gainsay his evidence?"

"I am not so sure of that."

"Not so sure! Why, man, you can only do it on the supposition that Van Buren himself pocketed the money, and then blew the signature away—for it shows no mark of an erasure. That would be absurd."

"Improbable, possibly, but not impossible, and so not absurd."

"Yes, absurd!" he rejoined. "For why not destroy the receipt when the money was taken?"

I felt the force of this. I was worsted in the encounter, and withdrew with the conviction that my case was desperate. Before I left, I said:

"I am instructed, and must make what defense I can. Will you have the receipt at trial, or put me to the trouble of compelling its production?"

"No need of process. The receipt, as you call it, will be in court; but it is useless to you, as you will say yourself whenever you see it."

Time slipped away. I should have nearly forgotten the case, until it had gone through its routine, took its place on the calendar, and had its day fixed. But Marsh kept it before me, always having discovered, weekly or oftener, some important point, which amounted to nothing, or conceived some apt suggestion, which turned out to be of no value. I understood and overlooked this meddling, on account of its object. It gave him pretexts for more frequent visits to Evans's pretty daughter.

I was no longer young, but I looked on a lover's expedients with a forgiving eye.

The day of trial came. The plaintiff, who had very able counsel, was ready; and so was I, for defendant, though I could see very little chance of success.

The plaintiff's counsel, Mr. Demarest, opened with a succinct statement. The defendant had collected rents to the amount of eighteen hundred and sixty-five dollars, as the agent of Clarence Preston, now deceased. He had neglected and refused to pay these over, and for this sum, now due the estate, suit was brought.

The leases were brought in to show the amount of rents, and these I admitted to save time. The tenants were brought forward with their receipts to prove the amounts were actually paid to Evans, except in one instance where a tenant was out of town. There his clerk was sworn, who witnessed the payment and the signing of the receipt by Evans—it was for three hundred dollars. On cross-examination he admitted that he did not see the amount to count it, that was actually paid; but saw his employer pay money in gold to Evans, and brought the receipt-book himself, for Evans to sign a receipt, which he, the clerk, had written for three hundred. He had been instructed to write one for that amount in the hearing of Evans.

The plaintiff rested his case, and I opened for the defense. My statement was what the reader expects; but we denied having received so much, as we had allowed one tenant, the one whose clerk had testified, forty-five dollars for taxes, water-rents, and assessments. Deducting this, and our commission, the sum was seventeen hundred and twenty-nine dollars, which we had paid over.

The new law, just then going into effect, allowed a party to be examined in his own behalf, and I put Evans on the stand. He testified to the state of facts already laid before the reader, and mentioned, at my instance, the kind of money received, and the fact that one bill was not bankable, but he had taken it, subject to Preston's approval. Before going to Preston's house, he drew from the Shoe and Leather Bank the amount required, excepting the hundred-dollar bill named, having deposited the rents there, from time to time, as he received them.

A sharp cross-examination now commenced.

"Now, Sir," said the opposite counsel, "you have stated that a receipt was signed on a loose piece of paper. Who drew that receipt up?"

"I did."

"It was entirely in your handwriting then?"

"Yes, Sir, all except the signature."

"How many such receipts did you write?"

"Only one."

"Are you positive of that?"

"Quite positive."

The counsel here produced a manuscript. It was the blank receipt found by Schermerhorn. He showed it to Evans, so folded that the place for the signature was concealed.

"Did you ever see that paper before?"

"Yes, Sir—twice. Once when Mr. Preston signed it, and once since, when Mr. Schermerhorn showed it to me."

"When Mr. Preston signed it. You believe Mr. Preston's signature is attached to it, then?"

"No, Sir; because I have seen it since without a signature. But it was there."

"Could you not have been mistaken?"

"No, Sir. I wrote the body of that receipt, and saw Mr. Preston sign it. There was no blotting-paper on the table, and I let it lie there to dry. That was how I came to forget it."

"Who was present when the receipt was given?"

"Mr. Van Buren yonder."

"Do you think he saw the money paid?"

"Certainly. He spoke in such a way that he must have seen it."

"Will you detail that conversation?"

"Substantially. I said to Mr. Preston that Barnes, one of the tenants, had paid me in uncurrent money—that hundred-dollar bill on a Philadelphia Bank. Van Buren said, 'It is so small a shave, Preston, that you can stand it.' Mr. Preston laughed, and took the money."

"And you positively swear that such a conversation substantially took place on that occasion?"

"I do."

"Now, Sir, let me put a hypothetical case to you, and ask you if it be not possible that it might have occurred. Might you not have written this receipt, and then have felt disinclined to pay at the moment? Did you not, in fact, excuse yourself from paying on the ground of dilatoriness on the part of tenants?"

"No, Sir!" returned Evans, indignantly. "I paid, as I have stated, and I took that receipt."

"But that receipt has no signature."

"I know it, and I can't account for it. But it had. That is certainly the one I wrote, and which Mr. Preston afterward signed in my presence. I particularly identify it by two flaws or specks in the paper which I noticed as I wrote the receipt for signature, and which are there now."

"You have an excellent memory," said Demarest, dryly. "You bank at the Shoe and Leather?"

"Yes."

"Are you not in the habit of paying your collections over in a check drawn to the order of parties?"

"Yes, Sir; but Mr. Preston always seemed to prefer that I should bring money."

"Did he tell you so?"

"No, not in words."

"This, then, was an isolated instance?"

"Yes."

"Ah!" returned the counsel. "You can stand aside, Sir."

Evans still lingered on the stand. The jury-men looked carelessly around the court-room. Some fidgeted in their seats, others yawned. They had evidently made up their minds, and adversely to us. I was too well-read in jury nature not to perceive it.

"Are you through, Sir?" said the judge to me.

"Yes, Sir." But here an idea struck me.

"Stay a moment, Mr. Evans. It is possible that on closer examination some of your testimony may lead to an explanation of one or two doubtful points. Let me have that receipt."

It was handed me.

"Are you sure, Sir, as to the mode of signature? Is it not possible that it was signed in lead pencil?"

"Not at all leading that question," suggested Demarest; but I would not hear the implied objection.

"No, Sir," persisted Evans. "It was signed with ink, and that is why I left it on the table to dry."

I looked at the paper carefully. I could find no traces of signature by the eye; but on passing the end of my little finger over the spot where the signature should have been, I thought I could detect a slight roughness. I mentioned this, and suggested that if we had a magnifying glass such as engravers use we might discover whether there had been any erasure.

"Send for one, then, by all means," said the judge. "I am disposed to allow all the latitude admissible in the case."

I at once dispatched Marsh to the shop of a noted optician, a client of mine, just up Broadway, for a lens.

"In the mean while," continued the judge, "to economize time, suppose you go on with your other witnesses."

"We rest here," I replied, "reserving the farther examination of this paper."

The plaintiff's counsel now called Van Buren to the stand to rebut. This was a summary of his testimony:

He had visited his client, Preston, on the third of November, the evening in question. While they were conversing Evans was announced. He came in, and after some preliminary remarks sat down and wrote a receipt, which he believed was the one produced. After he had done so he said that the tenants had not all paid up, but as he expected the remainder on the next day he would wait and make one payment of it. To this Mr. Preston acceded, and after some indifferent remarks Evans left. Van Buren sat on, continuing the conversation. When Mr. Preston was attacked with apoplexy, the lawyer alarmed the house. A doctor came, but could do nothing effectual for the relief of the patient. When the latter died Van Buren gathered the papers on the table, and thrust them in a long, narrow drawer in the secretary, which, with the rest, he sealed. He believed this receipt was among them, but he did not examine particularly. He sealed the papers because he had drawn up Mr. Preston's will, and knew that it contained a recommendation to the executor to continue him (Van Buren) in the service of the estate. As to the conversation detailed by Evans it never took place. He saw no such note as described, no money paid at all, and no receipt signed by Preston. His testimony was clear, prompt, and decided. It seemed conclusive.

The executor next took the stand, and identified the blank receipt as one he had found in the narrow drawer along with other papers. Mr. Van Buren was present when the seals were broken. There was no other receipt. No such sum of money, nor any notes answering the description, had been found in the house, nor on the person of Mr. Preston.

The cross-examination of both these witnesses was ineffectual in varying their several statements.

The case rested. Marsh did not return, but the optician came himself with a small glass, and an envelope directed to me. I opened the latter. It contained a hundred-dollar bill and a slip of paper, on which was written:

"Examine the bearer about the inclosed. Delay the case until my return. I am off to Jersey City for an important witness. Hurrah for success and Kitty!"

I smiled at the closing words, examined the bank-bill, and held my peace. I then made a close and tedious scrutiny of the receipt with the magnifier.

"Well, Mr. Latitat," said the judge, impatiently, "what do you make out?"

"I find traces of a signature, your Honor," was my reply. "The ink has been skillfully and carefully removed, I think; but the signature has been written with a steel pen, and the strokes have indented the paper."

The receipt and glass were passed, firstly to the opposite counsel, then to the jury, and, finally, to the judge. During the examination I conferred with the optician apart.

His story was clear and brief.

When Marsh came for the glass he recognized him, having seen him at my office, and he said to him,

"I owe Mr. Latitat a hundred dollars and an apology for not having sent it before. I have a Philadelphia note here—good but not current—if he will take that."

Marsh was on the qui vive for Philadelphia bills, and with some remark about lawyers' fees not being always paid in current funds, took the note in his hand. To his surprise it was on the Mechanics' Bank of Philadelphia, and on its back were the initials—"J. Y. C."

"Where did you get this?" he asked.

"From the Jersey City Bank," was the reply.

Marsh explained the case briefly to the optician, who promised to go into court with the note, while the young man would endeavor to get the proper bank officer there as quickly as possible.

There was not a certain connection in the evidence as yet; but it strengthened our case, nevertheless.

The receipt and glass came back to me. The jury were evidently satisfied that there had been a signature; but whether that was Preston's or not was an open question. The counsel for the plaintiff, after a short conference with Van Buren, intimated that the writing apparently erased was by the same hand that had written the body of the receipt.

Evans sprang to his feet at this imputation in great excitement; but I calmed him. I then asked permission to reopen the case on the part of the defense, as testimony of the utmost importance had unexpectedly been found. The opposite counsel demurred. I was as prosy as possible in reply, so as to gain more time. The judge grew impatient again, and cut me off.

"That will do, Mr. Latitat. In a case involving character—and where there is manifest perjury somewhere—there can be no hesitation. Produce your witness."

I recalled Evans, who identified the note as one he had paid Mr. Preston, not only by the initials of the tenant, but by his own, in minute letters, and in red ink, with the date appended, which he had made on its receipt on the face of the note, and which would escape notice except upon close inspection.

When the optician took the stand I turned to look for Van Buren, but that worthy gentleman had left the court-room. The note was promptly identified as one paid out on a check at the Jersey City Bank.

"Is that all?" asked Demarest, maliciously, for he thought I had shot my bolt. The jury, which had begun to sympathize with us, looked their disappointment.

I felt annoyed. Marsh had not returned, and I hastily began to think of some plan to delay matters until he brought in the witness. In my embarrassment I took up the receipt which lay on the table, and happening to turn it in such a way that the light fell upon it, at an acute angle, I saw something that startled me.

Before I had time to announce my discovery, and comment upon it, Marsh touched me, and whispered in my ear. I turned. His face was jubilant in the extreme.

"If it please the court," I said, "we have not quite done. There is another witness. I propose to examine the receiving teller of the Jersey City Bank."

The teller was placed on the stand. He identified the note—his own private mark having been placed on it. He had received it, as it was current in that bank, though not in New York. It should, however, have been sent on in the Philadelphia package in making the exchange. It must have been paid out inadvertently.

"Do you know," I inquired, "from whom you received it?"

"Yes, Sir. It was deposited, along with sixteen hundred dollars in New York funds, on the fifth of November last by Aleyn Van Buren."

Before the sensation had subsided I made another communication which heightened it.

"Now," said I, "if the court and jury will examine this receipt by holding it at an angle to the light, thus"—and I set the example—"they will see a dark line which the ink and the acids that removed it make by contrast with the surrounding smooth surface of the paper; and they can make out, rather plainly, the signature of Clarence Preston."

The examination verified my statement.

One of the jury now arose and addressed the court.

"I am an analytical chemist by profession," said he. "If that signature was originally written in ink, and erased by acid, I think I can restore it if you will send to the nearest druggist's for the means."

Marsh took a slip of paper on which the chemist wrote an order, and soon returned with a vial and a sponge.

Amidst intense excitement, which manifested itself by profound stillness, the jurymen poured some of the colorless liquid from the vial on the sponge. He then drew the latter over the spot that showed traces of writing. At once, distinctly enough, but blurred and blotted by the manipulation, there appeared, in a faint, blue-black color, the name of Clarence Preston.

We took our verdict without farther opposition; and judge, jury, counsel, and plaintiff shook hands with Evans, and congratulated him on his vindicated reputation. The business that from that day flowed in on Evans made his fortune. He was grateful to all concerned, particularly to Marsh, who married Miss Kitty the week following his own admission to the bar. As for Van Buren he left town, and his present whereabouts it is impossible to determine.

MISTRESS AND MAID.

A HOUSEHOLD STORY.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "JOHN HALIFAX, GENTLEMAN."

CHAPTER XII.

MONTHS slipped by; the trees in Burton Crescent had long been all bare; the summer cries of itinerant vegetable dealers and flower sellers had vanished out of the quiet street. The three sisters almost missed them, sitting in that one dull parlor from morning till night, in the intense solitude of people who, having neither heart nor money to spend in gayeties, live forlorn in London lodgings, and knowing nobody, have nobody to visit, nobody to visit them.

Except Mr. Ascott, who still called, and occasionally staid to tea. The hospitalities, however, were all on their side. The first entertainment—to which Selina insisted upon going, and Johanna thought Hilary and Ascott had better go too—was splendid enough, but they were the only ladies present; and though Mr. Ascott did the honors with great magnificence, putting Miss Selina at the head of his table, where she looked exceedingly well, still the sisters agreed it was better that all further invitations to Russell Square should be declined. Miss Selina herself said it would be more dignified and decorous.

Other visitors they had none. Ascott never offered to bring any of his friends; and gradually they saw very little of him. He was frequently out, especially at meal times, so that his aunts gave up the struggle to make the humble dinners better and more to his liking, and would even have hesitated to take the money which he was understood to pay for his board, had he ever offered it, which he did not. Yet still whenever he did happen to remain with them a day, or an evening, he was good and affectionate, and always entertained them with descriptions of all he would do as soon as he got into practice.

Meantime they kept house as economically as possible upon the little ready money they had, hoping that more would come in—that Hilary would get pupils.

But Hilary never did. To any body who knows London this will not be surprising. The wonder was in the Misses Leaf being so simple as to imagine that a young country lady, settling herself in lodgings in an obscure metropolitan street, without friends or introduction, could ever expect such a thing. Nothing but her own daring, and the irrepressible well-spring of hope that was in her healthy youth, could have sustained her in what, ten years after, would have appeared to her, as it certainly was, downright insanity. But Heaven takes care of the mad, the righteously and unselfishly mad, and Heaven took care of poor Hilary.

The hundred labors she went through—weariness of body and travail of soul, the risks she ran, the pitfalls she escaped—what need to record here? Many have recorded the like, many more have known them, and acknowledged that when such histories are reproduced in books how utterly imagination fades before reality. Hilary never looked back upon that time herself without a shuddering wonder how she could have dared all and gone through all. Possibly she never could, but for the sweet old face, growing older yet sweeter every day, which smiled upon her the minute she opened the door of that dull parlor, and made even No. 15 look like home.

When she told, sometimes gayly, sometimes with burning, bursting tears, the tale of her day's efforts and day's failures, it was always comfort to feel Johanna's hand on her hair, Johanna's voice whispering over her, "Never mind, my child, all will come right in time. All happens for good."

And the face, withered and worn, yet calm as a summer sea, full of the "peace which passeth all understanding," was a living comment on the truth of these words.

Another comfort Hilary had—Elizabeth. During her long days of absence, wandering from one end of London to the other, after advertisements that she had answered, or governess institutions that she had applied to, the domestic affairs fell almost entirely into the hands of Elizabeth. It was she who bought in, and kept a jealous eye, not unneeded, over provisions; she who cooked and waited, and sometimes even put a helping hand, coarse, but willing, into the family sewing and mending. This had now become so vital a necessity that it was fortunate Miss Leaf had no other occupation, and Miss Selina no other entertainment, than stitch, stitch, stitch, at the ever-beginning, never-ending wardrobe wants which assail decent poverty every where, especially in London.

"Clothes seem to wear out frightfully fast," said Hilary one day, when she was putting on her oldest gown, to suit a damp, foggy day, when the streets were slippery with the mud of settled rain.

"I saw such beautiful merino dresses in a shop in Southampton Row," insinuated Elizabeth; but her mistress shook her head.

"No, no; my old black silk will do capitally, and I can easily put on two shawls. Nobody knows me; and people may wear what they like in London. Don't look so grave, Elizabeth. What does it signify if I can but keep myself warm? Now, run away."

Elizabeth obeyed, but shortly reappeared with a bundle—a large, old-fashioned, thick shawl.

"Mother gave it me; her mistress gave it her; but we've never worn it, and never shall. If only you didn't mind putting it on, just this once—this terrible soaking day!"

The scarlet face, the entreating tones—there was no resisting them. One natural pang Hilary felt—that in her sharp poverty she had fallen so low as to be indebted to her servant, and then she too blushed, less for shame at accepting the kindness than for her own pride that could not at once receive it as such.

"Thank you, Elizabeth," she said, gravely and gently, and let herself be wrapped in the thick shawl. Its gorgeous reds and yellows would, she knew, make her noticeable, even though "people might wear any thing in London." Still, she put it on with a good grace; and all through her peregrinations that day it warmed, not only her shoulders, but her heart.

Coming home, she paused wistfully before a glittering shoe-shop—her poor little feet were so soaked and cold. Could she possibly afford a new pair of boots? It was not a matter of vanity—she had passed that. She did not care now how ugly and shabby looked the "wee feet" that had once been praised; but she felt it might be a matter of health and prudence. Suppose she caught cold—fell ill—died:—died, leaving Johanna to struggle alone—died before Robert Lyon came home. Both thoughts struck sharp. She was too young still, or had not suffered enough, calmly to think of death and dying.

"It will do no harm to inquire the price. I might stop it out in omnibuses."

For this was the way every new article of dress had to be procured—"stopping it out" of something else.

After trying several pairs—with a fierce, bitter blush at a small hole which the day's walking had worn in her well-darned stockings, and which she was sure the shopman saw, as well as an old lady who sat opposite—Hilary bought the stoutest and plainest of boots. The bill overstepped her purse by sixpence, but she promised that sum on delivery, and paid the rest. She had got into a nervous horror of letting any account stand over for a single day.

Look tenderly, reader, on this picture of struggles so small, of sufferings so uninteresting and mean. I paint it not because it is original, but because it is so awfully true. Thousands of women, well-born, well-reared, know it to be true—burned into them by the cruel conflict of their youth; happy they if it ended in their youth, while mind and body had still enough vitality and elasticity to endure! I paint it, because it accounts for the accusation sometimes made—especially by men—that women are naturally "stingy." Possibly so: but in many instances may it not have been this petty struggle with petty wants, this pitiful calculating of penny against penny, how best to save here and spend there, which narrows a woman's nature in spite of herself? It sometimes takes years of comparative ease and freedom from pecuniary cares to counteract the grinding, lowering effects of a youth of poverty.

And I paint this picture, too, literally, and not on its picturesque side—if, indeed, poverty has a picturesque side—in order to show another side which it really has—high, heroic, made up of dauntless endurance, self-sacrifice, and self-control. Also to indicate that blessing which narrow circumstances alone bestow, the habit of looking more to the realities than to the shows of things, and of finding pleasure in enjoyments mental rather than sensuous, inward rather than external. When people can truly recognize this they cease either to be afraid or ashamed of poverty.

Hilary was not ashamed—not even now, when hers smote sharper and harder than it had ever done at Stowbury. She felt it a sore thing enough; but it never humiliated nor angered her. Either she was too proud or not proud enough; but her low estate always seemed to her too simply external a thing to affect her relations with the world outside. She never thought of being annoyed with the shopkeeper, who, though he trusted her with the sixpence, carefully took down her name and address: still less to suspecting the old lady opposite, who sat and listened to the transaction—apparently a well-to-do customer, clad in a rich black silk and handsome sable furs—of looking down upon her and despising her. She herself never despised any body, except for wickedness.

So she waited contentedly, neither thinking of herself, nor of what others thought of her; but with her mind quietly occupied by the two thoughts, which in any brief space of rest always recurred, calming down all annoyances, and raising her above the level of petty pains—Johanna, and Robert Lyon. Under the influence of these her tired face grew composed, and there was a wishful, far-away, fond look in her eyes, which made it not wonderful that the said old lady—apparently an acute old soul in her way—should watch her, as we do occasionally watch strangers in whom we have become suddenly interested.

There is no accounting for these interests, or to the events to which they give rise. Sometimes they are pooh-pooh-ed as "romantic," "unnatural," "like a bit in a novel;" and yet they are facts continually occurring, especially to people of quick intuition, observation, and sympathy. Nay, even the most ordinary people have known or heard of such, resulting in mysterious, life-long loves; firm friendships; strange yet often wonderful happy marriages; sudden revolutions of fortune and destiny: things utterly unaccountable for, except by the belief in the unscrutable Providence which

"Shapes our ends, Rough-hew them as we will."

When Hilary left the shop she was startled by a voice at her elbow.

"I beg your pardon, but if your way lies up Southampton Row, would you object to give an old woman a share of that capital umbrella of yours?"

"With pleasure," Hilary answered, though the oddness of the request amused her. And it was granted really with pleasure; for the old lady spoke with those "accents of the mountain tongue" which this foolish Hilary never recognized without a thrill at the heart.

"Maybe you think an old woman ought to take a cab, and not be intruding upon strangers; but I am hale and hearty, and being only a street's length from my own door, I dislike to waste unnecessary shillings."

"Certainly," acquiesced Hilary, with a half sigh: shillings were only too precious to her.

"I saw you in the boot-shop, and you seemed the sort of young lady who would do a kindness to an old body like me; so I said to myself, 'I'll ask her.'"

"I am glad you did." Poor girl! she felt unconsciously pleased at finding herself still able to show a kindness to any body.

They walked on and on—it was certainly a long street's length—to the stranger's door, and it took Hilary a good way round from hers; but she said nothing of this, concluding, of course, that her companion was unaware of where she lived—in which she was mistaken. They stopped at last before a respectable house near Brunswick Square, bearing a brass plate, with the words "Miss Balquidder."

"That is my name, and very much obliged to you, my dear. How it rains! Ye're just droukit."

Hilary smiled and shook her damp shawl. "I shall take no harm. I am used to go out in all weathers."

"Are you a governess?" The question was so direct and kindly, that it hardly seemed an impertinence.

"Yes; but I have no pupils, and fear I shall never get any."

"Why not?"

"I suppose, because I know nobody here. It seems so very hard to get teaching in London. But I beg your pardon."

"I beg yours," said Miss Balquidder—not without a certain dignity—"for asking questions of a stranger. But I was once a stranger here myself, and had a 'sair fecht,' as we say in Scotland, before I could earn even my daily bread. Though I wasn't a governess, still I know pretty well what the sort of life is, and if I had daughters who must work for their bread, the one thing I would urge upon them should be—'Never become a governess.'"

"Indeed. For what reason?"

"I'll not tell you now, my dear, standing with all your wet clothes on; but as I said, if you will do me the favor to call—"

"Thank you!" said Hilary, not sufficiently initiated in London caution to dread making a new acquaintance. Besides, she liked the rough-hewn, good-natured face; and the Scotch accent was sweet to her ear.

Yet when she reached home she was half shy of telling her sisters the engagement she had made. Selina was extremely shocked, and considered it quite necessary that the London Directory—the nearest clergyman—or, perhaps Mr. Ascott, who, living in the parish, must know—should be consulted as to Miss Balquidder's respectability.

"She has much more reason to question ours," recollected Hilary, with some amusement; "for I never told her my name or address. She does not know a single thing about me."

Which fact, arguing the matter energetically two days after, the young lady might not have been so sure of, could she have penetrated the ceiling overhead. In truth, Miss Balquidder, a prudent person, who never did things by halves, and, like most truly generous people, was cautious even in her extremest fits of generosity, at that very moment was sitting in Mrs. Jones's first floor, deliberately discovering every single thing possible to be learned about the Leaf family.

Nevertheless, owing to Selina's indignant pertinacity, Hilary's own hesitation, and a dim hope of a pupil which rose up and faded like the rest, the possible acquaintance lay dormant for two or three weeks: till, alas! the fabulous wolf actually came to the door; and the sisters, after paying their week's rent, looked aghast at one another, not knowing where in the wide world the next week's rent was to come from.

"Thank God, we don't owe any thing! not a penny," gasped Hilary.

"No; there is comfort in that," said Johanna. And the expression of her folded hands and upward face was not despairing, even though that of the poor widow, when her barrel of meal was gone, and her cruse of oil spent, would hardly have been sadder.

"I am sure we have wasted nothing, and cheated nobody—surely God will help us."

"I know He will, my child."

And the two sisters, elder and younger, kissed one another, cried a little, and then sat down to consider what was to be done.

Ascott must be told how things were with them. Hitherto they had not troubled him much with their affairs: indeed, he was so little at home. And, after some private consultation, both Johanna and Hilary decided that it was wisest to let the lad come and go as he liked; not attempting—as he once indignantly expressed it—“to tie him to their apron-strings.” For instinctively these maiden ladies felt that with men, and, above all, young men, the only way to bind the wandering heart was to leave it free, except by trying their utmost that home should be always a pleasant home.

It was touching to see their efforts, when Ascott came in of evenings, to enliven for his sake the dull parlor at No. 15. How Johanna put away her mending, and Selina ceased to grumble, and Hilary began her lively chat, that never failed to brighten and amuse the household. Her nephew even sometimes acknowledged that wherever he went, he met nobody so “clever” as Aunt Hilary.

So, presuming upon her influence with him, on this night, after the rest were gone to bed, she—being always the boldest to do any unpleasant thing—said to him,

“Ascott, how are your business affairs progressing? When do you think you will be able to get into practice?”

“Oh, presently. There’s no hurry.”

“I am not so sure of that. Do you know, my dear boy”—and she opened her purse, which contained a few shillings—“this is all the money we have in the world.”

“Nonsense,” said Ascott, laughing. “I beg your pardon,” he added, seeing it was with her no laughing matter; “but I am so accustomed to be hard up that I don’t seem to care. It always comes right somehow—at least with me.”

“How?”

“Oh, I don’t exactly know; but it does. Don’t fret, Aunt Hilary. I’ll lend you a pound or two.”

She drew back. These poor, proud, fond women, who, if their boy, instead of a fine gentleman, had been a helpless invalid, would have tended him, worked for him, nay, begged for him—cheerfully, oh, how cheerfully! wanting nothing in the whole world but his love—they could not ask him for his money. Even now, offered thus, Hilary felt as if to take it would be intolerable.

Still the thing must be done.

“I wish, Ascott”—and she nerved herself to say what somebody ought to say to him—“I wish you would not lend but pay us the pound a week you said you could so easily spare.”

“To be sure I will. What a thoughtless fellow I have been! But—but—I fancied you would have asked me if you wanted it. Never mind, you’ll get it all in a lump. Let me see—how much will it come to? You are the best head going for arithmetic, Aunt Hilary. Do reckon it all up?”

She did so; and the sum total made Ascott open his eyes wide.

“Upon my soul I had no idea it was so much. I’m very sorry, but I seem fairly cleaned out this quarter—only a few sovereigns left to keep the mill going. You shall have them, or half of them, and I’ll owe you the rest. Here!”

He emptied on the table, without counting, four or five pounds. Hilary took two, asking him gravely “If he was sure he could spare so much? She did not wish to inconvenience him.”

“Oh, not at all; and I wouldn’t mind if it did; you have been good aunts to me.”

He kissed her, with a sudden fit of compunction, and bade her good-night, looking as if he did not care to be “bothered” any more.

Hilary retired, more sad, more hopeless about him than if he had slammed the door in her face, or scolded her like a trooper. Had he met her seriousness in the same spirit, even though it had been a sullen or angry spirit—and little as she said he must have felt—she wished him to feel—that his aunts were displeased with him; but that utterly unimpressible light-heartedness of his—there was no doing any thing with it. There was, so to speak, “no catching hold” of Ascott. He meant no harm. She repeated over and over again that the lad meant no harm. He had no evil ways; was always pleasant, good-natured, and affectionate, in his own careless fashion; but was no more to be relied on than a straw that every wind blows hither and thither; or, to use a common simile, a butterfly that never sees any thing farther than the nearest flower. His was, in short, the pleasure-loving temperament, not positively sinful or sensual, but still holding pleasure as the greatest good; and regarding what deeper natures call “duty,” and find therein their strong-hold and consolation, as a mere bugbear, or a sentimental theory, or an impossible folly.

Poor lad! and he had the world to fight with; how would it use him? Even if no heavy sorrows for himself or others smote him, his handsome face would have to grow old, his strong frame to meet sickness—death. How would he do it? That is the thought which always recurs. What is the end of such men as these? Alas! the answer would come from hospital wards, alms-houses and work-houses, debtors’ prisons and lunatic asylums.

To apprehensions like this—except the last, happily it was as yet too far off—Hilary had been slowly and sadly arriving about Ascott for weeks past; and her conversation with him to-night seemed to make them darken down upon her with added gloom. As she went up stairs she set her lips together hard.

“I see there is nobody to do any thing except me. But I must not tell Johanna.”

She lay long awake, planning every conceivable scheme for saving money; till at length, her wits sharpened by the desperation of the circumstances, there flashed upon her an idea that came out of a talk she had had with Elizabeth that morning. True, it was a perfectly new and untried chance—and a mere chance; still it was right to overlook nothing. She would not have ventured to tell Selina of it for the world, and even to Johanna, she only said—finding her as wakeful as herself—said it in a careless manner, as if it had relation to nothing, and she expected nothing from it—

"I think, as I have nothing else to do, I will go and see Miss Balquidder to-morrow morning."

CHAPTER XIII.

MISS BALQUIDDER'S house was a handsome one, handsomely furnished, and a neat little maid-servant showed Hilary at once into the dining-parlor, where the mistress sat before a business-like writing-table, covered with letters, papers, etc., all arranged with that careful order in disorder which indicates, even in the smallest things, the possession of an accurate, methodical mind, than which there are few greater possessions, either to its owner or to the world at large.

Miss Balquidder was not a personable woman; she had never been so even in youth; and age had told its tale upon those large, strong features—"thoroughly Scotch features," they would have been called by those who think all Scotch-women are necessarily big, raw-boned, and ugly; and have never seen that wonderfully noble beauty—not prettiness, but actual beauty in its highest physical as well as spiritual development—which is not seldom found across the Tweed.

But while there was nothing lovely, there was nothing unpleasant or uncomely in Miss Balquidder. Her large figure, in its plain black silk dress; her neat white cap, from under which peeped the little round curls of flaxen hair, neither gray nor snowy, but real "lint-white locks" still; and her good-humored, motherly look—motherly rather than old-maidish—gave an impression which may be best described by the word "comfortable." She was a "comfortable" woman. She had that quality—too rare, alas! in all people, and rarest in women going solitary down the hill of life—of being able, out of the deep content of her own nature, to make other people the same.

Hilary was cheered in spite of herself; it always conveys hope to the young, when in sore trouble, if they see the old looking happy.

"Welcome, my dear! I was afraid you had forgotten your promise."

"Oh no," said Hilary, responding heartily to the hearty clasp of a hand large as a man's, but soft as a woman's.

"Why did you not come sooner?"

More than one possible excuse flashed through Hilary's mind, but she was too honest to give it. She gave none at all. Nor did she like to leave the impression that this was merely a visit, when she knew she had only come from secondary and personal motives.

"May I tell you why I came to day? Because I want advice and help, and I think you can give it, from something I heard about you yesterday."

"Indeed! From whom?"

"In rather a roundabout way; from Mrs. Jones, who told our maid-servant."

"The same girl I met on the staircase at your house? I beg your pardon, but I know where you live, Miss Leaf; your landlady happens to be an acquaintance of mine."

"So she said; and she told our Elizabeth that you were a rich and benevolent woman, who took a great interest in helping other women; not in money"—blushing scarlet at the idea—"I don't mean that, but in procuring them work. I want work—oh! so terribly. If you only knew—"

"Sit down, my dear;" for Hilary was trembling much, her voice breaking, and her eyes filling, in spite of all her self-command.

Miss Balquidder—who seemed accustomed to wait upon herself—went out of the room, and returned with cake and glasses; then she took the wine from the side-board, poured some out for herself and Hilary, and began to talk.

"It is nearly my luncheon-time, and I am a great friend to regular eating and drinking. I never let any thing interfere with my own meals, or other folks' either, if I can help it. I would as soon expect that fire to keep itself up without coals, as my mind to go on working if I don't look after my body. You understand? You seem to have good health, Miss Leaf. I hope you are a prudent girl, and take care of it."

"I think I do;" and Hilary smiled. "At any rate my sister does for me, and also Elizabeth."

"Ah, I liked the look of that girl. If families did but know that the most useful patent of respectability they can carry about with them is their maid-servant! That is how I always judge my new acquaintances."

"There's reason in it too," said Hilary, amused and drawn out of herself by the frank manner and the cordial voice—I use the adjective advisedly: none the less sweet because its good terse English had a decided Scotch accent, with here and there a Scotch word. Also there was about Miss Balquidder a certain dry humor essentially Scotch—neither Irish "wit" nor English "fun," but Scotch humor; a little ponderous perhaps, yet sparkling; like the sparkles from a large lump of coal, red-warm at the heart, and capable of warming a whole household. As many a time it had warmed the little household at Stowbury—for Robert Lyon had it in perfection. Like a waft as from old times, it made Hilary at once feel at home with Miss Balquidder.

Equally, Miss Balquidder might have seen something in this girl's patient, heroic, forlorn youth which reminded her of her own. Unreasoning as these sudden attractions appear, there is often a hidden something beneath which in reality makes them both natural and probable, as was the case here. In half an hour these two women were sitting talking like old friends; and Hilary had explained her present position, needs, and desires. They ended in the one cry—familiar to how many thousands more of helpless young women!—"I want work!"

Miss Balquidder listened thoughtfully. Not that it was a new story—alas! she heard it every day; but there was something new in the telling of it; such extreme directness and simplicity, such utter want of either false pride or false shame. No asking of favors, and yet no shrinking from well-meant kindness; the poor woman speaking freely to the rich one, recognizing the common womanhood of both, and never supposing for an instant that mere money or position could make any difference between them.

The story ended, both turned, as was the character of both, to the practical application of it—what it was exactly that Hilary needed, and what Miss Balquidder could supply.

The latter said, after a turn or two up and down the room, with her hands behind her—the only masculine trick she had—

"My dear, before going further, I ought to tell you one thing—I am not a lady."

Hilary looked at her in no little bewilderment.

"That is," explained Miss Balquidder, laughing, "not an educated gentlewoman like you. I made my money myself—in trade. I kept an outfitter's shop."

"You must have kept it uncommonly well," was the involuntary reply, which, in its extreme honesty and naïveté, was perhaps the best thing that Hilary could have said.

"Well, perhaps I did," and Miss Balquidder laughed her hearty laugh, betraying one of her few weaknesses—a consciousness of her own capabilities as a woman of business, and a pleasure at her own deserved success.

"Therefore, you see, I can not help you as a governess. Perhaps I would not if I could, for, so far as I see, a good clearance of one half the governesses into honest trades would be for their own benefit, and greatly to the benefit of the other half. But that's not my affair. I only meddle with things I understand. Miss Leaf, would you be ashamed of keeping a shop?"

It is no reflection upon Hilary to confess that this point-blank question startled her. Her bringing up had been strictly among the professional class; and in the provinces sharper than even in London is drawn the line between the richest tradesman who "keeps a shop," and the poorest lawyer, doctor, or clergyman who ever starved in decent gentility. It had been often a struggle for Hilary Leaf's girlish pride to have to teach A B C to little boys and girls whose parents stood behind counters; but as she grew older she grew wiser, and intercourse with Robert Lyon had taught her much. She never forgot one day, when Selina asked him something about his grandfather or great-grandfather, and he answered quickly, smiling, "Well, I suppose I had one, but I really never heard." Nevertheless it takes long to conquer entirely the class prejudices of years, nay, more, of generations. In spite of her will Hilary felt herself wince, and the color rush all over her face, at Miss Balquidder's question.

"Take time to answer, and speak out, my dear. Don't be afraid. You'll not offend me."

The kindly cheerful tone made Hilary recover her balance immediately.

"I never thought of it before; the possibility of such a thing did not occur to me; but I hope I should not be ashamed of any honest work for which I was competent. Only—to serve in a shop—to wait upon strangers—I am so horribly shy of strangers." And again the sensitive color rushed in a perfect tide over cheeks and forehead.

Miss Balquidder looked, half amused, compassionately at her.

"No, my dear, you would not make a good shop-woman, at least there are many who are better fitted for it than you; and it is my maxim that people should try to find out, and to do, only that which they are best fitted for. If they did we might not have so many cases of proud despair and ambitious failure in the world. It looks very grand and interesting sometimes to try and do what you can't do, and then tear your hair, and think the world has ill-used you—very grand, but very silly; when all the while, perhaps, there is something else you can do thoroughly well; and the world will be exceedingly obliged to you for doing it, and not doing the other thing. As doubtless the world was to me, when, instead of being a mediocre musician, as I once wished to be—it's true, my dear—I took to keeping one of the best ladies' outfitting warehouses in London."

While she talked her companion had quite recovered herself, and Miss Balquidder then went on to explain, what I will tell more briefly, if less graphically, than the good Scotchwoman, who, like all who have had a hard struggle in their youth, liked a little to dilate upon it in easy old age.

Hard as it was, however, it had ended early, for at fifty she found herself a woman of independent property, without kith or kin, still active, energetic, and capable of enjoying life. She applied her mind to find out what she could best do with herself and her money.

"I might have bought a landed estate to be inherited by—nobody; or a house in Belgravia, and an opera-box, to be shared by—nobody. We all have our pet luxuries; none of these were exactly mine."

"No," assented Hilary, somewhat abstractedly. She was thinking—if she could make a fortune, and—and give it away!—if, by any means, any honorable, upright heart could be made to understand that it did not signify, in reality, which side the money came from; that it sometimes showed deeper, the very deepest attachment, when a proud, poor man had self-respect and courage enough to say to a woman, "I love you, and I will marry you; I am not such a coward as to be afraid of your gold."

But, oh! what a ridiculous dream!—and she sat there, the penniless Hilary Leaf, listening to Miss Balquidder, the rich lady, whose life seemed so easy. For the moment, perhaps, her own appeared hard. But she had hope, and she was young. She knew nothing of the years and years that had had to be lived through before those kind eyes looked as clear and cloudless as now; before the voice had gained the sweet evenness of tone which she liked to listen to, and felt that it made her quiet and "good," almost like Johanna's.

"You see, my dear," said Miss Balquidder, "when one has no duties, one must just make them; when we have nobody to care for us, we must take to caring for every body. I suppose"—here a slight pause indicated that this life, like all women's lives, had had its tale, now long, long told—"I suppose I was not meant to be a wife; but I am quite certain I was meant to be a mother. And"—with her peculiar, bright, humorous look—"you'd be astonished, Miss Leaf, if you knew what lots of 'children' I have in all parts of the world."

Miss Balquidder then went on to explain, that finding, from her own experience, how great was the number, and how sore the trial, of young women who nowadays are obliged to work—obliged to forget that there is such a thing as the blessed privilege of being worked for—she had set herself, in her small way, to try and help them. Her pet project was to induce educated women to quit the genteel starvation of governessships for some good trade, thereby bringing higher intelligence into a class which needed, not the elevation of the work itself, which was comparatively easy and refined, but of the workers. She had therefore invested sum after sum of her capital in setting up various small shops in the environs of London, in her own former line, and others—stationers, lace-shops, etc.—trades which could be well carried on by women. Into the management of these she put as many young girls as she could find really fitted for it, or willing to learn, paying them regular salaries, large or small, according to their deserts.

"Fair work, fair pay; not one penny more or less; I never do it; it would not be honest. I overlook each business myself, and it is carried on in my name. Sometimes it brings me in a little profit; sometimes not. Of course," she added, smiling, "I would rather have profits than losses; still, I balance one against the other, and it leaves me generally a small interest for my money—two or three per cent., which is all I care about. Thus, you see, I and my young people make a fair bargain on both sides; it's no charity. I don't believe in charity."

"No," said Hilary, feeling her spirit rise. She was yet young enough, yet enough unworn by the fight to feel the deliciousness of work—honest work for honest pay. "I think I could do it," she added. "I think, with a little practice, I really could keep a shop."

"At all events, perhaps you could do what I find more difficult to get done, and well done, for it requires a far higher class of women than generally apply: you could keep the accounts of a shop; you should be the head, and it would be easy to find the hands. Let me see; there is a young lady, she has managed my stationer's business at Kensington these two years, and now she is going to be married. Are you good at figures; do you understand book-keeping?"

And suddenly changing into the woman of business, and one who was evidently quite accustomed both to arrange and command, Miss Balquidder put Hilary through a sort of extempore arithmetical catechism, from which she came off with flying colors.

"I only wish there were more like you. I wish there were more young ladies brought up like—"

"Like boys!" said Hilary, laughing, "for I always used to say that was my case."

"No, I never desire to see young women made into men." And Miss Balquidder seemed a little scandalized. "But I do wish girls were taught fewer accomplishments, and more reading, writing, and arithmetic; were made as accurate, orderly, and able to help themselves as boys are. But to business. Will you take the management of my stationer's shop?"

Hilary's breath came hard and fast. Much as she had longed for work, to get this sort of work—to keep a stationer's shop! What would her sisters say? what would he say? But she dared not think of that just now.

"How much should I be able to earn, do you think?"

Miss Balquidder considered a moment, and then said, rather shortly, for it was not exactly acting on her own principles; she knew the pay was above the work. "I will give you a hundred a year."

A hundred a year! actually certain, and over and above any other income. It seemed a fortune to poor Hilary.

"Will you give me a day or two to think about it and consult my sisters?"

She spoke quietly, but Miss Balquidder could see how agitated she was; how she evidently struggled with many feelings that would be best struggled with alone. The good old lady rose.

"Take your own time, my dear; I will keep the situation open for you for one week from this date. And now I must send you away, for I have a great deal to do."

They parted, quite like friends; and Hilary went out, walking quickly, feeling neither the wind nor the rain. Yet when she reached No. 15 she could not bring herself to enter, but took another turn or two round the Crescent, trying to be quite sure of her own mind before she opened the matter to her sisters. And there was one little battle to be fought which the sisters did not know.

It was perhaps foolish, seeing she did not belong to him in any open way, and he had no external right over her life or her actions, that she should go back and back to the question, "What would Robert Lyon say?"

He knew she earned her daily bread; sometimes this had seemed to vex and annoy him, but it must be done; and when a thing was inevitable, it was not Mr. Lyon's way to say much about it. But being a governess was an accredited and customary mode of a young lady's earning her livelihood. This was different. If he should think it too public, too unfeminine: he had such a horror of a woman's being any thing but a woman, as strong and brave as she could, but in a womanly way; doing any thing, however painful, that she was obliged to do, but never out of choice or bravado, or the excitement of stepping out of her own sphere into man's. Would Robert Lyon think less of her, Hilary, because she had to learn to take care of herself, to protect herself, and to act in so many ways for herself, contrary to the natural and right order of things? That old order—God forbid it should ever change!—which ordained that the women should be "keepers at home;" happy rulers of that happy little world, which seemed as far off as the next world from this poor Hilary.

"What if he should look down upon me? What if he should return and find me different from what he expected?" And bitter tears burned in her eyes, as she walked rapidly and passionately along the deserted street. Then a revulsion came.

"No; love is worth nothing that is not worth every thing, and to be trusted through every thing. If he could forget me—could love any one better than me—me myself, no matter what I was—ugly or pretty, old or young, rich or poor—I would not care for his love. It would not be worth my having; I'd let it go. Robert, though it broke my heart, I'd let you go."

Her eyes flashed; her poor little hand clenched itself under her shawl; and then, as a half reproach, she heard in fancy the steady loving voice—which could have calmed her wildest paroxysm of passion and pain—"You must trust me, Hilary."

Yes, he was a man to be trusted. No doubt very much like other men, and by no means such a hero to the world at large as this fond girl made him out to be; but Robert Lyon had, with all people, and under all circumstances, the character of reliability. He had also—you might read it in his face—a quality equally rare, faithfulness. Not merely sincerity, but faithfulness; the power of conceiving one clear purpose, or one strong love—in unity is strength—and of not only keeping true to it at the time, but of holding fast to it with a single-minded persistency that never even takes in the idea of voluntary change, as long as persistency is right or possible.

"Robert, Robert!" sobbed this forlorn girl, as if slowly waking up to a sense of her forlornness, and of the almost universal fickleness, not actual falseness, but fickleness, which prevails in the world and among mankind. "O Robert, be faithful! faithful to yourself—faithful to me!"

DOWN IN THE GLEN AT IDLEWILD.

THE red moon, like a golden grape,
Hangs slowly ripening in the sky,
And o'er the helmets of the hills
Like plumes the summer lightnings fly.
The solemn pine-trees stoop above
The brook, that, like a sleeping child,
Lies babbling of its simple dreams
Down in the glen at Idlewild.

The red mill in the distance sleeps—
The old mill that, when winter comes,
Wakes to a wild spasmodic life,
And through the rocky channel hums.
And starry-flowered water-plants,
With myriad eyes of moistened light,
Peep coyly from their sheltered nooks,
The shy companions of the night.

But brighter than the starry flowers
There shine a maiden's lustrous eyes;
And yellower shines her yellow hair
Than the full moon that floods the skies.
As where the waters kiss the cliff
She waits for him, the pearl of men;
And idly plucks the ivy leaves,
And listens, and then waits again.

She waits to hear the well-known call,
The echoes of the agile foot,
The bursting of the lacing boughs,
The cracking of the fragile root—
But ah! the path is steep and dark,
The jagged rocks lie far below;
And Heaven must help the wight who slips
Up where those treacherous mosses grow.

At last he comes! she hears his step—
But ah! what means that fearsome crash?
Down the steep cliff a dark shape falls—
From rock to rock she sees it dash.
Was it for this you waited long,
O loving heart! O hapless child!
Dead at her feet her lover lies
Down in the glen at Idlewild!

FITZ JAMES O'BRIEN.

THE ADVENTURES OF PHILIP.

BY W. M. THACKERAY.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

NEC PLENA CRUORIS HIRUDO.

THE reading of this precious letter filled Philip's friend with an inward indignation which it was very hard to control or disguise. It is no pleasant task to tell a gentleman that his father is a rogue. Old Firmin would have been hanged a few years earlier for practices like these. As you talk with a very great scoundrel, or with a madman, has not the respected reader sometimes reflected, with a grim self-humiliation, how the fellow is of our own kind; and homo est? Let us, dearly beloved, who are outside—I mean outside the hulks or the asylum—be thankful that we have to pay a barber for snipping our hair, and are intrusted with the choice of the cut of our own jerkins. As poor Philip read his father's letter my thought was: "And I can remember the soft white hand of that scoundrel, which has just been forging his own son's name, putting sovereigns into my own palm when I was a school-boy." I always liked that man: but the story is not de me—it regards Philip.

"You won't pay this bill?" Philip's friend indignantly said, then.

"What can I do?" says poor Phil, shaking a sad head.

"You are not worth five hundred pounds in the world," remarks the friend.

"Who ever said I was? I am worth this bill: or my credit is," answers the victim.

"If you pay this, he will draw more."

VOL. XXV.—No. 146—Q

"I dare say he will:" that Firmin admits.

"And he will continue to draw, as long as there is a drop of blood to be had out of you."

"Yes," owns poor Philip, putting a finger to his lip. He thought I might be about to speak. His artless wife and mine were conversing at that moment upon the respective merits of some sweet chintzes which they had seen at Shoolbred's, in Tottenham Court Road, and which were so cheap and pleasant, and lively to look at! Really those drawing-room curtains would cost scarcely any thing! Our Regulus, you see, before stepping into his torture-tub, was smiling on his friends, and talking upholstery with a cheerful, smirking countenance. On chintz, or some other household errand, the ladies went prattling off: but there was no care, save for husband and children, in Charlotte's poor little innocent heart just then.

"Nice to hear her talking about sweet drawing-room chintzes, isn't it?" says Philip. "Shall we try Shoolbred's, or the other shop?" And then he laughs. It was not a very lively laugh.

"You mean that you are determined, then, on—"

"On acknowledging my signature? Of course," says Philip, "if ever it is presented to me, I would own it." And having formed and announced this resolution, I knew my stubborn friend too well to think that he ever would shirk it.

The most exasperating part of the matter was, that however generously Philip's friends might be disposed toward him, they could not in this case give him a helping hand. The doctor would draw more bills, and more. As sure as Philip supplied, the parent would ask; and that devouring dragon of a doctor had stomach enough for the blood of all of us, were we inclined to give it. In fact, Philip saw as much, and owned every thing with his usual candor. "I see what is going on in your mind, old boy!" the poor fellow said, "as well as if you spoke. You mean that I am helpless and irreclaimable, and doomed to hopeless ruin. So it would seem. A man can't escape his fate, friend, and my father has made mine for me. If I manage to struggle through the payment of this bill, of course he will draw another. My only chance of escape is, that he should succeed in some of his speculations. As he is always gambling, there may be some luck for him one day or another. He won't benefit me, then. That is not his way. If he makes a coup, he will keep the money or spend it. He won't give me any. But he will not draw upon me as he does now, or send forth fancy imitations of the filial autograph. It is a blessing to have such a father, isn't it? I say, Pen, as I think from whom I am descended, and look at your spoons, I am astonished I have not put any of them in my pocket. You leave me in the room with 'em quite unprotected. I say, it is quite affecting the way in which you and your dear wife have confidence in me." And with a bitter execration at his fate, the poor fellow pauses for a moment in his lament.

His father was his fate, he seemed to think, and there were no means of averting it. "You remember that picture of Abraham and Isaac in the doctor's study in Old Parr Street?" he would say. "My patriarch has tied me up, and had the knife in me repeatedly. He does not sacrifice me at one operation; but there will be a final one some day, and I shall bleed no more. It's gay and amusing, isn't it? Especially when one has a wife and children." I, for my part, felt so indignant that I was minded to advertise in the papers that all acceptances drawn in Philip's name were forgeries; and let his father take the consequences of his own act. But the consequences would have been life imprisonment for the old man, and almost as much disgrace and ruin for the young one as were actually impending. He pointed out this clearly enough; nor could we altogether gainsay his dismal logic. It was better, at any rate, to meet this bill and give the doctor warning for the future. Well, perhaps it was; only suppose the doctor should take the warning in good part, accept the rebuke with perfect meekness, and at an early opportunity commit another forgery? To this Philip replied, that no man could resist his fate: that he had always expected his own doom through his father: that when the elder went to America he thought possibly the charm was broken; "but you see it is not," groaned Philip, "and my father's emissaries reach me, and I am still under the spell." The bearer of the bow-string, we know, was on his way, and would deliver his grim message ere long.

Having frequently succeeded in extorting money from Dr. Firmin, Mr. Tufton Hunt thought he could not do better than follow his banker across the Atlantic; and we need not describe the annoyance and rage of the doctor on finding this black care still behind his back. He had not much to give; indeed the sum which he took away with him, and of which he robbed his son and his other creditors, was but small; but Hunt was bent upon having a portion of this; and, of course, hinted that, if the doctor refused, he would carry to the New York press the particulars of Firmin's early career and latest defalcations. Mr. Hunt had been under the gallery of the House of Commons half a dozen times, and knew our public men by sight. In the course of a pretty long and disreputable career he had learned anecdotes regarding members of the aristocracy, turf-men, and the like; and he offered to sell this precious knowledge of his to more than one American paper, as other amiable exiles from our country have done. But Hunt was too old, and his stories too stale for the New York public. They dated from George IV., and the boxing and coaching times. He found but little market for his wares; and the tipsy parson reeled from tavern to bar, only the object of scorn to younger reprobates who despised his old-fashioned stories, and could top them with blackguardism of a much more modern date.

After some two years' sojourn in the United States, this worthy felt the passionate longing to revisit his native country which generous hearts often experience, and made his way from Liverpool to London; and when in London directed his steps to the house of the Little Sister, of which he expected to find Philip still an inmate. Although Hunt had been once kicked out of the premises, he felt little shame now about re-entering them. He had that in his pocket which would insure him respectful behavior from Philip. What were the circumstances under which that forged bill was obtained? Was it a speculation between Hunt and Philip's father? Did Hunt suggest that, to screen the elder Firmin from disgrace and ruin, Philip would assuredly take the bill up? That a forged signature was, in fact, a better document than a genuine acceptance? We shall never know the truth regarding this transaction now. We have but the statements of the two parties concerned; and as both of them, I grieve to say, are entirely unworthy of credit, we must remain in ignorance regarding this matter. Perhaps Hunt forged Philip's acceptance; perhaps his unhappy father wrote it: perhaps the doctor's story that the paper was extorted from him was true, perhaps false. What matters? Both the men have passed away from among us, and will write and speak no more lies.

Caroline was absent from home when Hunt paid his first visit after his return from America. Her servant described the man and his appearance. Mrs. Brandon felt sure that Hunt was her visitor, and foreboded no good to Philip from the parson's arrival. In former days we have seen how the Little Sister had found favor in the eyes of this man. The besotted creature, shunned of men, stained with crime, drink, debt, had still no little vanity in his composition, and gave himself airs in the tavern parlors which he frequented. Because he had been at the University thirty years ago, his idea was that he was superior to ordinary men who had not had the benefit of an education at Oxford or Cambridge; and that the "snobs," as he called them, respected him. He would assume grandiose airs in talking to a tradesman ever so wealthy; speak to such a man by his surname; and deem that he honored him by his patronage and conversation. The Little Sister's grammar, I have told you, was not good; her poor little h's were sadly irregular. A letter was a painful task to her. She knew how ill she performed it, and that she was forever making blunders.

She would invent a thousand funny little pleas and excuses for her faults of writing. With all the blunders of spelling, her little letters had a pathos which somehow brought tears into the eyes. The Rev. Mr. Hunt believed himself to be this woman's superior. He thought his University education gave him a claim upon her respect, and draped himself and swaggered before her and others in his dingy college gown. He had paraded his Master of Arts degree in many thousand tavern parlors, where his Greek and learning had got him a kind of respect. He patronized landlords, and strutted by hostesses' bars with a vinous leer or a tipsy solemnity. He must have been very far gone and debased indeed when he could still think that he was any living man's better; he, who ought to have waited on the waiters, and blacked boots's own shoes. When he had reached a certain stage of liquor he commonly began to brag about the University, and recite the titles of his friends of early days. Never was kicking more righteously administered than that which Philip once bestowed on this miscreant. The fellow took to the gutter as naturally as to his bed, Firmin used to say, and vowed that the washing there was a novelty which did him good.

Brandon soon found that her surmises were correct regarding her nameless visitor. Next day, as she was watering some little flowers in her window, she looked from it into the street, where she saw the shambling parson leering up at her. When she saw him he took off his greasy hat and made her a bow. At the moment she saw him she felt that he was come upon some errand hostile to Philip. She knew he meant mischief as he looked up with that sodden face, those bloodshot eyes, those unshorn, grinning lips.

She might have been inclined to faint, or disposed to scream, or to hide herself from the man, the sight of whom she loathed. She did not faint, or hide herself, or cry out: but she instantly nodded her head and smiled in the most engaging manner on that unwelcome, dingy stranger. She went to her door; she opened it (though her heart beat so that you might have heard it, as she told her friend afterward). She stood there a moment archly smiling at him, and she beckoned him into her house with a little gesture of welcome. "Law bless us" (these, I have reason to believe, were her very words)—"Law bless us, Mr. Hunt, where ever have you been this ever so long?" And a smiling face looked at him resolutely from under a neat cap and fresh ribbon. Why, I know some women can smile and look at ease when they sit down in a dentist's chair.

"Law bless me, Mr. Hunt," then says the artless creature, "who ever would have thought of seeing you, I do declare!" And she makes a nice cheery little courtesy, and looks quite gay, pleased, and pretty; and so did Judith look gay, no doubt, and smile, and prattle before Holofernes; and then of course she said, "Won't you step in?" And then Hunt swaggered up the steps of the house, and entered the little parlor, into which the kind reader has often been conducted, with its neat little ornaments, its pictures, its glistening corner cupboard, and its well-scrubbed, shining furniture.

"How is the captain?" asks the man (alone in the company of this Little Sister the fellow's own heart began to beat, and his bloodshot eyes to glisten).

He had not heard about poor Pa? "That shows how long you have been away!" Mrs. Brandon remarks, and mentions the date of her father's fatal illness. Yes: she was alone now, and had to care for herself; and straightway, I have no doubt, Mrs. Brandon asked Mr. Hunt whether he would "take" any thing. Indeed, that good little woman was forever pressing her friends to "take" something, and would have thought the laws of hospitality violated unless she had made this offer.

Hunt was never known to refuse a proposal of this sort. He would take a taste of something—of something warm. He had had fever and ague at New York, and the malady hung about him. Mrs. Brandon was straightway very much interested to hear about Mr. Hunt's complaint, and knew that a comfortable glass was very efficacious in removing threatening fever. Her nimble, neat little hands mixed him a cup. He could not but see what a trim little house-keeper she was. "Ah, Mrs. Brandon, if I had had such a kind friend watching over me, I should not be such a wreck as I am!" he sighed. He must have advanced to a second, nay, a third glass, when he sighed and became sentimental regarding his own unhappy condition; and Brandon owned to her friends afterward that she made those glasses very strong.

Having "taken something" in considerable quantities, then Hunt condescended to ask how his hostess was getting on, and how were her lodgers? How she was getting on? Brandon drew the most cheerful picture of herself and her circumstances. The apartments let well, and were never empty. Thanks to good Dr. Goodenough and other friends, she had as much professional occupation as she could desire. Since you know who has left the country, she said, her mind had been ever so much easier. As long as he was near she never felt secure. But he was gone, and bad luck go with him! said this vindictive Little Sister.

"Was his son still lodging up stairs?" asked Mr. Hunt.

On this, what does Mrs. Brandon do but begin a most angry attack upon Philip and his family. He lodge there? No, thank goodness! She had had enough of him and his wife, with her airs and graces, and the children crying all night, and the furniture spoiled, and the bills not even paid! "I wanted him to think that me and Philip was friends no longer; and Heaven forgive me for telling stories! I know this fellow means no good to Philip; and before long I will know what he means, that I will," she vowed.

For on the very day when Mr. Hunt paid her a visit, Mrs. Brandon came to see Philip's friends, and acquaint them with Hunt's arrival. We could not be sure that he was the bearer of the forged bill with which poor Philip was threatened. As yet Hunt had made no allusion to it. But, though we are far from sanctioning deceit or hypocrisy, we own that we were not very angry with the Little Sister for employing dissimulation in the present instance, and inducing Hunt to believe that she was by no means an accomplice of Philip. If Philip's wife pardoned her, ought his friends to be less forgiving? To do right, you know you must not do wrong; though I own this was one of the cases in which I am inclined not to deal very hardly with the well-meaning little criminal.

Now Charlotte had to pardon (and for this fault, if not for some others, Charlotte did most heartily pardon) our little friend, for this reason, that Brandon most wantonly maligned her. When Hunt asked what sort of wife Philip had married? Mrs. Brandon declared that Mrs. Philip was a pert, odious little thing; that she gave herself airs, neglected her children, bullied her husband, and what not; and, finally, Brandon vowed that she disliked Charlotte, and was very glad to get her out of the house: and that Philip was not the same Philip since he married her, and that he gave himself airs, and was rude, and in all things led by his wife; and to get rid of them was a good riddance.

Hunt gracefully suggested that quarrels between landladies and tenants were not unusual; that lodgers sometimes did not pay their rent punctually; at others were unreasonably anxious about the consumption of their groceries, liquors, and so forth; and little Brandon, who, rather than steal a pennyworth from her Philip, would have cut her hand off, laughed at her guest's joke, and pretended to be amused with his knowing hints that she was a rogue. There was not a word he said but she received it with a gracious acquiescence: she might shudder inwardly at the leering familiarity of the odious tipsy wretch, but she gave no outward sign of disgust or fear. She allowed him to talk as much as he would in hopes that he would come to a subject which deeply interested her. She asked about the doctor and what he was doing, and whether it was likely that he would ever be able to pay back any of that money which he had taken from his son? And she spoke with an indifferent tone, pretending to be very busy over some work at which she was stitching.

"Oh, you are still hankering after him!" says the chaplain, winking a bloodshot eye.

"Hankering after that old man! What should I care for him? As if he haven't done me harm enough already!" cries poor Caroline.

"Yes. But women don't dislike a man the worse for a little ill-usage," suggests Hunt. No doubt the fellow had made his own experiments on woman's fidelity.

"Well, I suppose," says Brandon, with a toss of her head, "women may get tired as well as men, mayn't they? I found out that man, and wearied of him years and years ago. Another little drop out of the green bottle, Mr. Hunt! It's very good for ague-fever, and keeps the cold fit off wonderful!"

And Hunt drank, and he talked a little more—much more: and he gave his opinion of the elder Firmin, and spoke of his chances of success, and of his rage for speculations, and doubted whether he would ever be able to lift his head again—though he might, he might still. He was in the country where, if ever a man could retrieve himself, he had a chance. And Philip was giving himself airs, was he? He was always an arrogant chap, that Mr. Philip. And he had left her house? and was gone ever so long? and where did he live now?

Then I am sorry to say Mrs. Brandon asked, how should she know where Philip lived now? She believed it was near Gray's Inn, or Lincoln's Inn, or somewhere; and she was for turning the conversation away from this subject altogether: and sought to do so by many lively remarks and ingenious little artifices which I can imagine, but which she only in part acknowledged to me—for you must know that as soon as her visitor took leave—to turn into the "Admiral Byng" public house, and renew acquaintance with the worthies assembled in the parlor of that tavern, Mrs. Brandon ran away to a cab, drove in it to Philip's house in Milman Street, where only Mrs. Philip was at home—and after a banale conversation with her, which puzzled Charlotte not a little, for Brandon would not say on what errand she came, and never mentioned Hunt's arrival and visit to her—the Little Sister made her way to another cab, and presently made her appearance at the house of Philip's friends in Queen Square. And here she informed me how Hunt had arrived, and how she was sure he meant no good to Philip, and how she had told certain—certain stories which were not founded in fact—to Mr. Hunt; for the telling of which fibs I am not about to endeavor to excuse her.

Though the interesting clergyman had not said one word regarding that bill of which Philip's father had warned him, we believed that the document was in Hunt's possession, and that it would be produced in due season. We happened to know where Philip dined, and sent him word to come to us.

"What can he mean?" the people asked at the table—a bachelors' table at the Temple (for Philip's good wife actually encouraged him to go abroad from time to time, and make merry with his friends). "What can this mean?" and they read out the scrap of paper which he had cast down as he was summoned away.

Philip's correspondent wrote: "Dear Philip,—I believe the BEARER OF THE BOW-STRING has arrived; and has been with the L. S. this very day."

The L. S.? the bearer of the bow-string? Not one of the bachelors dining in Parchment Buildings could read the riddle. Only after receiving the scrap of paper Philip had jumped up and left the room; and a friend of ours, a sly wag, and Don Juan of Pump Court, offered to take odds that there was a lady in the case.

At the hasty little council which was convened at our house on the receipt of the news, the Little Sister, whose instinct had not betrayed her, was made acquainted with the precise nature of the danger which menaced Philip; and exhibited a fine hearty wrath when she heard how he proposed to meet the enemy. He had a certain sum in hand. He would borrow more of his friends who knew that he was an honest man. This bill he would meet whatever might come; and avert at least this disgrace from his father.

What? Give in to those rogues? Leave his children to starve, and his poor wife to turn drudge and house-servant, who was not fit for any thing but a fine lady? (There was no love lost, you see, between these two ladies, who both loved Mr. Philip.) It was a sin and a shame! Mrs. Brandon averred, and declared she thought Philip had been a man of more spirit. Philip's friend has before stated his own private sentiments regarding the calamity which menaced Firmin. To pay this bill was to bring a dozen more down upon him. Philip might as well resist now as at a later day. Such, in fact, was the opinion given by the reader's very humble servant at command.

My wife, on the other hand, took Philip's side. She was very much moved at his announcement that he would forgive his father this once at least, and endeavor to cover his sin.

"As you hope to be forgiven yourself, dear Philip, I am sure you are doing right," Laura said; "I am sure Charlotte will think so."

"Oh, Charlotte, Charlotte!" interposes the Little Sister, rather peevishly; "of course Mrs. Philip thinks whatever her husband tells her!"

"In his own time of trial Philip has been met with wonderful succor and kindness," Laura urged. "See how one thing after another has contributed to help him! When he wanted, there were friends always at his need. If he wants again, I am sure my husband and I will share with him. (I may have made a wry face at this; for with the best feelings toward a man, and that kind of thing, you know it is not always convenient to be lending him five or six hundred pounds without security.) "My dear husband and I will share with him," goes on Mrs. Laura; "won't we, Arthur? Yes, Brandon, that we will. Be sure Charlotte and the children shall not want because Philip covers his father's wrong and hides it from the world. God bless you, dear friend!" And what does this woman do next, and before her husband's face? Actually she goes up to Philip; she takes his hand—and— Well, what took place before my own eyes I do not choose to write down.

"She's encouraging him to ruin the children for the sake of that—that wicked old brute!" cries Mrs. Brandon. "It's enough to provoke a saint, it is!" And she seizes up her bonnet from the table and claps it on her head, and walks out of our room in a little tempest of wrath.

My wife, clasping her hands, whispers a few words, which say: "Forgive us our trespasses, as we forgive them who trespass against us."

"Yes," says Philip, very much moved. "It is the Divine order. You are right, dear Laura. I have had a weary time; and a terrible gloom of doubt and sadness over my mind while I have been debating this matter, and before I had determined to do as you would have me. But a great weight is off my heart since I have been enabled to see what my conduct should be. What hundreds of struggling men as well as myself have met with losses and faced them! I will pay this bill, and I will warn the drawer to—to spare me for the future."

Now that the Little Sister had gone away in her fit of indignation, you see I was left in a minority in the council of war, and the opposition was quite too strong for me. I began to be of the majority's opinion. I dare say I am not the only gentleman who has been led round by a woman. We men of great strength of mind very frequently are. Yes: my wife convinced me with passages from her text-book, admitting of no contradiction according to her judgment, that Philip's duty was to forgive his father.

"And how lucky it was we did not buy the chintzes that day!" says Laura, with a laugh. "Do you know there were two which were so pretty that Charlotte could not make up her mind which of the two she would take?"

Philip roared out one of his laughs which made the windows shake. He was in great spirits. For a man who was going to ruin himself he was in the most enviable good-humor. Did Charlotte know about this—this claim which was impending over him? No. It might make her anxious, poor little thing! Philip had not told her. He had thought of concealing the matter from her. What need was there to disturb her rest, poor innocent child? You see, we all treated Mrs. Charlotte more or less like a child. Philip played with her. J. J., the painter, coaxed and dandled her, so to speak. The Little Sister loved her, but certainly with a love that was not respectful; and Charlotte took every body's good-will with a pleasant meekness and sweet smiling content. It was not for Laura to give advice to man and wife (as if the woman was not always giving lectures to Philip and his young wife!); but in the present instance she thought Mrs. Philip certainly ought to know what Philip's real situation was; what danger was menacing; "and how admirable, and right, and Christian—and you will have your reward for it, dear Philip!" interjects the enthusiastic lady—"your conduct has been!"

When we came, as we straightway did in a cab, to Charlotte's house, to expound the matter to her, goodness bless us! she was not shocked, or anxious, or frightened at all. Mrs. Brandon had just been with her, and told her of what was happening, and she had said, "Of course, Philip ought to help his father; and Brandon had gone away quite in a tantrum of anger, and had really been quite rude; and she should not pardon her, only she knew how dearly the Little Sister loved Philip; and of course they must help Dr. Firmin; and what dreadful, dreadful distress he must have been in to do as he did! But he had warned Philip, you know," and so forth. "And as for the chintzes, Laura, why

I suppose we must go on with the old shabby covers. You know they will do very well till next year." This was the way in which Mrs. Charlotte received the news which Philip had concealed from her, lest it should terrify her. As if a loving woman was ever very much frightened at being called upon to share her husband's misfortune!

As for the little case of forgery, I don't believe the young person could ever be got to see the heinous nature of Dr. Firmin's offense. The desperate little logician seemed rather to pity the father than the son in the business. "How dreadfully pressed he must have been when he did it, poor man!" she said. "To be sure he ought not to have done it at all; but think of his necessity! That is what I said to Brandon. Now, there's little Philip's cake in the cupboard which you brought him. Now suppose papa was very hungry, and went and took some without asking Philly, he wouldn't be so very wrong, I think, would he? A child is glad enough to give for his father, isn't he? And when I said this to Brandon, she was so rude and violent, I really have no patience with her! And she forgets that I am a lady, and" etc., etc. So it appeared the Little Sister had made a desperate attempt to bring over Charlotte to her side, was still minded to rescue Philip in spite of himself, and had gone off in wrath at her defeat.

We looked to the doctor's letters and ascertained the date of the bill. It had crossed the water, and would be at Philip's door in a very few days. Had Hunt brought it? The rascal would have it presented through some regular channel, no doubt; and Philip and all of us totted up ways and means, and strove to make the slender figures look as big as possible, as the thrifty housewife puts a patch here and a darn there, and cuts a little slice out of this old garment, so as to make the poor little frock serve for winter wear. We had so much at the banker's. A friend might help with a little advance. We would fairly ask a loan from the Review. We were in a scrape, but we would meet it. And so with resolute hearts we would prepare to receive the Bearer of the Bow-string.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

THE BEARER OF THE BOW-STRING.

THE poor Little Sister trudged away from Milman Street, exasperated with Philip, with Philip's wife, and with the determination of the pair to accept the hopeless ruin impending over them. "Three hundred and eighty-six pounds four and threepence," she thought, "to pay for that wicked old villain! It is more than poor Philip is worth, with all his savings and his little sticks of furniture. I know what he will do: he will borrow of the money-lenders, and give those bills, and renew them, and end by ruin. When he have paid this bill that old villain will forge another, and that precious wife of his will tell him to pay that, I suppose; and those little darlings will be begging for bread, unless they come and eat mine, to which—God bless them!—they are always welcome." She calculated—it was a sum not difficult to reckon—the amount of her own little store of saved ready money. To pay four hundred pounds out of such an income as Philip's, she felt, was an attempt vain and impossible. "And he mustn't have my poor little stocking now," she argued; "they will want that presently when their pride is broken down, as it will be, and my darlings are hungering for their dinner!" Revolving this dismal matter in her mind, and scarce knowing where to go for comfort and counsel, she made her way to her good friend, Dr. Goodenough, and found that worthy man, who had always a welcome for his Little Sister.

She found Goodenough alone in his great dining-room, taking a very slender meal, after visiting his hospital and his fifty patients, among whom I think there were more poor than rich: and the good sleepy doctor woke up with a vengeance when he heard his little nurse's news, and fired off a volley of angry language against Philip and his scoundrel of a father; "which it was a comfort to hear him," little Brandon told us afterward. Then Goodenough trotted out of the dining-room into the adjoining library and consulting-room, whither his old friend followed him. Then he pulled out a bunch of keys and opened a secretaire, from which he took a parchment-covered volume, on which J. Goodenough, Esq., M.D., was written in a fine legible hand—and which, in fact, was a banker's book. The inspection of the MS. volume in question must have pleased the worthy physician, for a grin came over his venerable features, and he straightway drew out of the desk a slim volume of gray paper, on each page of which were inscribed the highly respectable names of Messrs. Stumpy and Rowdy and Co., of Lombard Street, Bankers. On a slip of gray paper the doctor wrote a prescription for a draught, statim sumendus—(a draught—mark my pleasantry)—which he handed over to his little friend.

"There, you little fool!" said he. "The father is a rascal, but the boy is a fine fellow; and you, you little silly thing, I must help in this business myself, or you will go and ruin yourself, I know you will! Offer this to the fellow for his bill. Or, stay! How much money is there in the house? Perhaps the sight of notes and gold will tempt him more than a check." And the doctor emptied his pockets of all the fees which happened to be therein—I don't know how many fees of shining shillings and sovereigns, neatly wrapped up in paper; and he emptied a drawer in which there was more silver and gold; and he trotted up to his bedroom, and came panting presently down stairs with a fat little pocket-book, containing a bundle of notes, and, with one thing or another, he made up a sum of—I won't mention what; but this sum of money, I say, he thrust into the Little Sister's hand, and said, "Try the fellow with this, Little Sister, and see if you can get the bill from him. Don't say it's my money; or the scoundrel will be for having twenty shillings in the pound. Say it's yours, and there's no more where that came from; and coax him, and wheedle him, and tell him plenty of lies, my dear. It won't break your heart to do that. What an immortal scoundrel Brummell Firmin is, to be sure! Though, by-the-way, in two more cases at the hospital I have tried that—" And here the doctor went off into a professional conversation with his favorite nurse, which I could not presume to repeat to any non-medical man.

The Little Sister bade God bless Doctor Good-enough, and wiped her glistening eyes with her handkerchief, and put away the notes and gold with a trembling little hand, and trudged off with a lightsome step and a happy heart. Arrived at Tottenham Court Road, she thought, shall I go home, or shall I go to poor Mrs. Philip and take her this money? No. Their talk that very day had not been pleasant: words, very like high words, had passed between them, and our Little Sister had to own to herself that she had been rather rude in her late colloquy with Charlotte. And she was a proud Little Sister: at least she did not care for to own that she had been hasty or disrespectful in her conduct to that young woman. She had too much spirit for that. Have we ever said that our little friend was exempt from the prejudices and vanities of this wicked world? Well, to rescue Philip, to secure the fatal bill, to go with it to Charlotte, and say, "There, Mrs. Philip, there's your husband's liberty." It would be a rare triumph, that it would! And Philip would promise, on his honor, that this should be the last and only bill he would pay for that wretched old father. With these happy thoughts swelling in her little heart, Mrs. Brandon made her way to the familiar house in Thornhaugh Street, and would have a little bit of supper, so she would. And laid her own little cloth; and set forth her little forks and spoons, which were as bright as rubbing could make them; and I am authorized to state that her repast consisted of two nice little lamb-chops, which she purchased from her neighbor Mr. Chump, in Tottenham Court Road, after a pleasant little conversation with that gentleman and his good lady. And, with her bit of supper, after a day's work, our little friend would sometimes indulge in a glass—a little glass—of something comfortable. The case-bottle was in the cupboard, out of which her poor Pa had been wont to mix his tumblers for many a long day. So, having prepared it with her own hands, down she sat to her little meal, tired and happy; and as she thought of the occurrences of the day, and of the rescue which had come so opportunely to her beloved Philip and his children, I am sure she said a grace before her meat.

Her candles being lighted and her blind up, any one in the street could see that her chamber was occupied; and at about ten o'clock at night there came a heavy step clinking along the pavement, the sound of which, I have no doubt, made the Little Sister start a little. The heavy foot paused before her window, and presently clattered up the steps of her door. Then, as her bell rang, I consider it is most probable that her cheek flushed a little. She went to her hall door and opened it herself. "Lor, is it you, Mr. Hunt! Well, I never! that is, I thought you might come. Really, now"—and with the moonlight behind him, the dingy Hunt swaggered in.

"How comfortable you looked at your little table!" says Hunt, with his hat over his eye.

"Won't you step in and set down to it, and take something?" asks the smiling hostess.

Of course, Hunt would take something. And the greasy hat is taken off his head with a flourish, and he struts into the poor Little Sister's little room, pulling a wisp of grizzling hair and endeavoring to assume a careless, fashionable look. The dingy hand had seized the case-bottle in a moment. "What! you do a little in this way, do you?" he says, and winks amiably at Mrs. Brandon and the bottle. She takes ever so little, she owns; and reminds him of days which he must remember, when she had a wine-glass out of poor Pa's tumbler. A bright little kettle is singing on the fire—will not Mr. Hunt mix a glass for himself? She takes a bright beaker from the corner-cupboard, which is near her, with her keys hanging from it.

"Oh ho! that's where we keep the ginnums, is it?" says the grateful Hunt, with a laugh.

"My papa always kep it there," says Caroline, meekly. And while her back is turned to fetch a canister from the cupboard, she knows that the astute Mr. Hunt has taken the opportunity to fill a good large measure from the square bottle. "Make yourself welcome," says the Little Sister, in her gay, artless way; "there's more where that came from!" And Hunt drinks his hostess's health: and she bows to him, and smiles, and sips a little from her own glass; and the little lady looks quite pretty, and rosy, and bright. Her cheeks are like apples, her figure is trim and graceful, and always attired in the neatest-fitting gown. By the comfortable light of the candles on her sparkling tables you scarce see the silver lines in her light hair, or the marks which time has made round her eyes. Hunt's gaze on her with admiration.

"Why," says he, "I vow you look younger and prettier than when—when I saw you first."

"Ah, Mr. Hunt!" cries Mrs. Brandon, with a flush on her cheek, which becomes it, "don't recall that time, or that—that wretch who served me so cruel!"

"He was a scoundrel, Caroline, to treat as he did such a woman as you! The fellow has no principle; he was a bad one from the beginning. Why, he ruined me as well as you: got me to play; run me into debt by introducing me to his fine companions. I was a simple young fellow then, and thought it was a fine thing to live with fellow commoners and noblemen who drove their tandems and gave their grand dinners. It was he that led me astray, I tell you. I might have been Fellow of my college—had a living—married a good wife—risen to be a bishop, by George!—for I had great talents, Caroline; only I was so confounded idle, and fond of the cards and the bones."

"The bones?" cries Caroline, with a bewildered look.

"The dice, my dear! 'Seven's the main' was my ruin. 'Seven's the main' and eleven's the nick to seven. That used to be the little game!" And he made a graceful gesture with his empty wine-glass, as though he was tossing a pair of dice on the table. "The man next to me in lecture is a bishop now, and I could knock his head off in Greek iambs and Latin hexameters, too. In my second year I got the Latin declamation prize, I tell you—"

"Brandon always said you were one of the cleverest men at the college. He always said that, I remember," remarks the lady, very respectfully.

"Did he? He did say a good word for me, then? Brummell Firmin wasn't a clever man; he wasn't a reading man. Whereas I would back myself for a sapphic ode against any man in my college—against any man! Thank you. You do mix it so uncommon hot and well, there's no saying no; indeed there ain't! Though I have had enough—upon my honor, I have."

"Lor! I thought you men could drink any thing! And Mr. Brandon—Mr. Firmin you said?"

"Well, I said Brummell Firmin was a swell somehow. He had a sort of grand manner with him—"

"Yes, he had," sighed Caroline. And I dare say her thoughts wandered back to a time long, long ago, when this grand gentleman had captivated her.

"And it was trying to keep up with him that ruined me! I quarreled with my poor old governor about money, of course; grew idle, and lost my Fellowship. Then the bills came down upon me. I tell you there are some of my college ticks ain't paid now."

"College ticks? Law!" ejaculates the lady. "And—"

"Tailor's ticks, tavern ticks, livery-stable ticks—for there were famous hacks in our days, and I used to hunt with the tip-top men. I wasn't bad across country, I wasn't. But we can't keep the pace with those rich fellows. We try, and they go ahead—they ride us down. Do you think, if I hadn't been very hard up, I would have done what I did to you, Caroline? You poor little innocent suffering thing. It was a shame. It was a shame!"

"Yes, a shame it was!" cries Caroline. "And that I never gainsay. You did deal hard with a poor girl, both of you."

"It was rascally. But Firmin was the worst. He had me in his power. It was he led me wrong. It was he drove me into debt, and then abroad, and then into qu—into jail, perhaps; and then into this kind of thing." ("This kind of thing" has before been explained elegantly to signify a tumbler of hot grog.) "And my father wouldn't see me on his death-bed; and my brothers and sisters broke with me; and I owe it all to Brummell Firmin—all. Do you think, after ruining me, he oughtn't to pay me?" and again he thumps a dusky hand upon the table. It made dingy marks on the poor Little Sister's spotless table-cloth. It rubbed its owner's forehead and lank, grizzling hair.

"And me, Mr. Hunt? What do he owe me?" asks Hunt's hostess.

"Caroline!" cries Hunt, "I have made Brummell Firmin pay me a good bit back already, but I'll have more;" and he thumped his breast, and thrust his hand into his breast-pocket as he spoke, and clutched at something within.

"It is there!" thought Caroline. She might turn pale; but he did not remark her pallor. He was all intent on drink, on vanity, on revenge.

"I have him," I say. "He owes me a good bit; and he has paid me a good bit; and he shall pay me a good bit more. Do you think I am a fellow who will be ruined and insulted, and won't revenge myself? You should have seen his face when I turned up at New York at the Astor House, and said, 'Brummell, old fellow, here I am,' I said; and he turned as white—as white as this table-cloth. 'P// never leave you, my boy,' I said. 'Other fellows may go from you, but old Tom Hunt will stick to you. Let's go into the bar and have a drink!' and he was obliged to come. And I have him now in my power, I tell you. And when I say to him, 'Brummell, have a drink,' drink he must. His bald old head must go into the pail!" And Mr. Hunt laughed a laugh which I dare say was not agreeable.

After a pause he went on: "Caroline! Do you hate him, I say? or do you like a fellow who deserted you and treated you like a scoundrel? Some women do. I could tell of women who do. I could tell you of other fellows, perhaps, but I won't. Do you hate Brummell Firmin, that bald-headed Brum—hypocrite, and that—that insolent rascal who laid his hand on a clergyman, and an old man, by George, and hit me—and hit me in that street. Do you hate him, I say? Hoo! hoo! hick! I've got 'em both!—here, in my pocket—both!"

"You have got—what?" gasped Caroline.

"I have got their—hallo! stop, what's that to you what I've got?" And he sinks back in his chair, and winks, and leers, and triumphantly tosses his glass.

"Well, it ain't much to me; I—I never got any good out of either of 'em yet," says poor Caroline, with a sinking heart. "Let's talk about somebody else than them two plagues. Because you were a little merry one night—and I don't mind what a gentleman says when he has had a glass—for a great big strong man to hit an old one—"

"To strike a clergyman!" yells Hunt.

"It was a shame—a cowardly shame! And I gave it him for it, I promise you!" cries Mrs. Brandon.

"On your honor, now, do you hate 'em?" cries Hunt, starting up, and clenching his fist, and dropping again into his chair.

"Have I any reason to love 'em, Mr. Hunt? Do sit down and have a little—"

"No: you have no reason to like 'em. You hate 'em—I hate 'em. Look here. Promise—'pon your honor, now, Caroline—I've got 'em both, I tell you. Strike a clergyman, will he? What do you say to that?"

And starting from his chair once more, and supporting himself against the wall (where hung one of J. J.'s pictures of Philip), Hunt pulls out the greasy pocket-book once more, and fumbles among the greasy contents; and as the papers flutter on to the floor and the table, he pounces down on one with a dingy hand, and yells a laugh, and says, "I've cotched you! That's it. What do you say to that?—London, July 4th. —Three months after date, I promise to pay to —No you don't."

"La! Mr. Hunt, won't you let me look at it?" cries the hostess. "Whatever is it? A bill? My Pa had plenty of 'em."

"What? with candles in the room? No you don't, I say."

"What is it? Won't you tell me?"

"It's the young one's acceptance of the old man's draft," says Hunt, hissing and laughing.

"For how much?"

"Three hundred and eighty-six four three—that's all; and I guess I can get more where that came from!" says Hunt, laughing more and more cheerfully.

"What will you take for it! I'll buy it of you," cries the Little Sister. "I—I've seen plenty of my Pa's bills; and I'll—I'll discount this, if you like."

"What! are you a little discounteer? Is that the way you make your money, and the silver spoons, and the nice supper, and every thing delightful about you? A little discountess, are you—you little rogue? Little discountess, by George! How much will you give, little discountess? And the reverend gentleman laughs, and winks, and drinks, and laughs, and tears twinkle out of his tipsy old eyes as he wipes them with one hand, and again says, "How much will you give, little discountess?"

When poor Caroline went to her cupboard, and from it took the notes and the gold which she had had we know from whom, and added to these out of a cunning box a little heap of her own private savings, and with trembling hands poured the notes, and the sovereigns, and the shillings into a dish on the table, I never heard accurately how much she laid down. But she must have spread out every thing she had in the world; for she felt her pockets and emptied them; and, tapping her head, she again applied to the cupboard, and took from thence a little store of spoons and forks, and then a brooch, and then a watch; and she piled these all up in a dish, and she said, "Now, Mr. Hunt, I will give you all these for that bill." And she looked up at Philip's picture, which hung over the parson's bloodshot, satyr face. "Take these," she said, "and give me that! There's two hundred pound, I know; and there's thirty-four, and two eighteen, thirty-six eighteen, and there's the plate and watch, and I want that bill."

"What? have you got all this, you little dear?" cried Hunt, dropping back into his chair again. "Why, you're a little fortune, by Jove—a pretty little fortune, a little discountess, a little wife, a little fortune. I say, I'm a University man; I could write alcaics once as well as any man. I'm a gentleman. I say, how much have you got? Count it over again, my dear."

And again she told him the amount of the gold, and the notes, and the silver, and the number of the poor little spoons.

A thought came across the fellow's boozy brain: "If you offer so much," says he, "and you're a little discountess, the bill's worth more; that fellow must be making his fortune! Or do you know about it? I say, do you know about it? No. I'll have my bond." I'll have my bond! And he gave a tipsy imitation of Shylock, and lurched back into his chair, and laughed.

"Let's have a little more, and talk about things," said the poor Little Sister; and she daintily heaped her little treasures and arranged them in her dish, and smiled upon the parson laughing in his chair.

"Caroline," says he, after a pause, "you are still fond of that old bald-headed scoundrel! That's it! Just like you women—just like, but I won't tell. No, no, I won't tell! You are fond of that old swindler still, I say! Wherever did you get that lot of money? Look here now—with that, and this little bill in my pocket, there's enough to carry us on for ever so long.

And when this money's gone, I tell you I know who'll give us more, and who can't refuse us, I tell you. Look here, Caroline, dear Caroline! I'm an old fellow, I know; but I'm a good fellow: I'm a classical scholar: and I'm a gentleman."

The classical scholar and gentleman bleared over his words as he uttered them, and with his vinous eyes and sordid face gave a leer, which must have frightened the poor little lady to whom he proffered himself as a suitor, for she started back with a pallid face, and an aspect of such dislike and terror that even her guest remarked it.

"I said I was a scholar and gentleman," he shrieked again. "Do you doubt it? I'm as good a man as Brummell Firmin, I say. I ain't so tall. But I'll do a copy of Latin alcaics or Greek iambics against him or any man of my weight. Do you mean to insult me? Don't I know who you are? Are you better than a Master of Arts and a clergyman? He went out in medicine, Firmin did. Do you mean, when a Master of Arts and classical scholar offers you his hand and fortune, that you're above him, and refuse him, by George?"

The Little Sister was growing bewildered and frightened by the man's energy and horrid looks. "Oh, Mr. Hunt!" she cried, "see here, take this! See—there are two hundred and thirty—thirty-four pounds and all these things! Take them, and give me that paper."

"Sovereigns, and notes, and spoons, and a watch, and what I have in my pocket—and that ain't much—and Firmin's bill! Three hundred and eighty-six four three. It's a fortune, my dear, with economy! I won't have you going on being a nurse and that kind of thing. I'm a scholar and a gentleman—I am—and that place ain't fit for Mrs. Hunt. We'll first spend your money. No: we'll first spend my money—three hundred and eighty-six and—and hang the change—and when that's gone, we'll have another bill from that bald-headed old scoundrel: and his son who struck a poor cler— We will, I say, Caroline—we—"

The wretch was suiting actions to his words, and rose once more, advancing toward his hostess, who shrank back, laughing half-hysterically, and retreating as the other neared her. Behind her was that cupboard which had contained her poor little treasure and other stores, and appended to the lock of which her keys were still hanging. As the brute approached her she flung back the cupboard-door smartly upon him. The keys struck him on the head; and bleeding, and with a curse and a cry he fell back on his chair.

In the cupboard was that bottle which she had received from America not long since; and about which she had talked with Goodenough on that very day. It had been used twice or thrice by his direction, by hospital surgeons, and under her eye. She suddenly seized this bottle. As the ruffian before her uttered his imprecations of wrath, she poured out a quantity of the contents of the bottle on her handkerchief. She said, "Oh! Mr. Hunt, have I hurt you? I didn't mean it. But you shouldn't—you shouldn't frighten a lonely woman so! Here, let me bathe you! Smell this! It will—it will do you—good—it will—it will, indeed!" The handkerchief was over his face. Bewildered by drink before, the fumes of the liquor which he was absorbing served almost instantly to overcome him. He struggled for a moment or two. "Stop—stop! you'll be better in a moment," she whispered. "Oh yes! better, quite better!" She squeezed more of the liquor from the bottle on to the handkerchief. In a minute Hunt was quite inanimate.

Then the little pale woman leaned over him, and took the pocket-book out of his pocket, and from it the bill which bore Philip's name. As Hunt lay in stupor before her, she now squeezed more of the liquor over his head; and then thrust the bill into the fire, and saw it burn to ashes. Then she put back the pocket-book into Hunt's breast. She said afterward that she never should have thought about that Chloroform, but for her brief conversation with Dr. Goodenough that evening regarding a case in which she had employed the new remedy under his orders.

How long did Hunt lie in that stupor? It seemed a whole long night to Caroline. She said afterward that the thought of that act that night made her hair grow gray. Poor little head! Indeed she would have laid it down for Philip.

Hunt, I suppose, came to himself when the handkerchief was withdrawn, and the fumes of the potent liquor ceased to work on his brain. He was very much frightened and bewildered. "What was it? Where am I?" he asked, in a husky voice.

"It was the keys struck you in the cupboard-door when you—you ran against it," said pale Caroline. "Look! you are all bleeding on the head. Let me dry it."

"No; keep off!" cried the terrified man.

"Will you have a cab to go home? The poor gentleman hit himself against the cupboard-door, Mary. You remember him here before, don't you, one night?" And Caroline, with a shrug, pointed out to her maid, whom she had summoned, the great square bottle of spirits still on the table, and indicated that there lay the cause of Hunt's bewilderment.

"Are you better now? Will you—will you—take a little more refreshment?" asked Caroline.

"No!" he cried, with an oath, and with glaring, bloodshot eyes he lurched toward his hat.

"Lor, mum! what ever is it? And this smell in the room, and all this here heap of money and things on the table?"

Caroline flung open her window. "It's medicine, which Dr. Goodenough has ordered for one of his patients. I must go and see her to-night," she said. And at midnight, looking as pale as death, the Little Sister went to the doctor's house, and roused him from his bed, and told him the story here narrated. "I offered him all you gave me," she said, "and all I had in the world besides, and he wouldn't—and—" Here she broke out into a fit of hysterics. The doctor had to ring up his servants; to administer remedies to his little nurse; to put her to bed in his own house.

"By the immortal Jove," he said afterward, "I had a great mind to beg her never to leave it! But that my housekeeper would tear Caroline's eyes out, Mrs. Brandon should be welcome to stay forever. Except her h's, that woman has every virtue: constancy, gentleness, generosity, cheerfulness, and the courage of a lioness! To think of that fool, that dandified idiot, that triple ass, Firmin" (there were few men in the world for whom Goodenough entertained a greater scorn than for his late confrère, Firmin of Old Parr Street—"think of the villain having possessed such a treasure—let alone his having deceived and deserted her—of his having possessed such a treasure and flung it away! Sir, I always admired Mrs. Brandon; but I think ten thousand times more highly of her since her glorious crime and most righteous robbery. If the villain had died, dropped dead in the street—the drunken miscreant, forger, house-breaker, assassin—so that no punishment could have fallen upon poor Brandon, I think I should have respected her only the more!"

At an early hour Dr. Goodenough had thought proper to send off messengers to Philip and myself, and to make us acquainted with the strange adventure of the previous night. We both hastened to him. I myself was summoned, no doubt, in consequence of my profound legal knowledge, which might be of use in poor little Caroline's present trouble. And Philip came because she longed to see him. By some instinct she knew when he arrived. She crept down from the chamber where the doctor's housekeeper had laid her on a bed. She knocked at the doctor's study, where we were all in consultation. She came in quite pale, and tottered toward Philip, and flung herself into his arms, with a burst of tears that greatly relieved her excitement and fever. Firmin was scarcely less moved.

"You'll pardon me for what I have done, Philip?" she sobbed. "If they—if they take me up, you won't forsake me?"

"Forsake you? Pardon you? Come and live with us, and never leave us!" cried Philip.

"I don't think Mrs. Philip would like that, dear," said the little woman, sobbing on his arm; "but ever since the Greyfriars school, when you was so ill, you have been like a son to me, and somehow I couldn't help doing that last night to that villain—I couldn't."

"Serve the scoundrel right. Never deserved to come to life again, my dear," said Dr. Goodenough. "Don't you be exciting yourself, little Brandon! I must have you sent back to lie down on your bed. Take her up, Philip, to the little room next mine, and order her to lie down and be as quiet as a mouse. You are not to move till I give you leave, Brandon—mind that; and come back to us, Firmin, or we shall have the patients coming."

So Philip led away this poor Little Sister; and trembling, and clinging to his arm, she returned to the room assigned to her.

"She wants to be alone with him," the doctor said; and he spoke a brief word or two of that strange delusion under which the little woman labored, that this was her dead child come back to her.

"I know that is in her mind," Goodenough said; "she never got over that brain fever in which I found her. If I were to swear her on the book, and say, 'Brandon, don't you believe he is your son alive again?' she would not dare to say no. She will leave him every thing she has got. I only gave her so much less than that scoundrel's bill yesterday, because I knew she would like to contribute her own share. It would have offended her mortally to have been left out of the subscription. They like to sacrifice themselves. Why, there are women in India who, if not allowed to roast with their dead husbands, would die of vexation." And by this time Mr. Philip came striding back into the room again, rubbing a pair of very red eyes.

"Long ere this, no doubt, that drunken ruffian is sobered, and knows that the bill is gone. He is likely enough to accuse her of the robbery," says the doctor.

"Suppose," says Philip's other friend, "I had put a pistol to your head, and was going to shoot you, and the doctor took the pistol out of my hand and flung it into the sea? would you help me to prosecute the doctor for robbing me of the pistol?"

"You don't suppose it will be a pleasure to me to pay that bill!" said Philip. "I said if a certain bill were presented to me, purporting to be accepted by Philip Firmin, I would pay it. But if that scoundrel, Hunt, only says that he had such a bill, and has lost it, I will cheerfully take my oath that I have never signed any bill at all—and they can't find Brandon guilty of stealing a thing which never existed."

"Let us hope, then, that the bill was not in duplicate."

And to this wish all three gentlemen heartily said Amen!

And now the doctor's door-bell began to be agitated by arriving patients. His dining-room was already full of them. The Little Sister must lie still, and the discussion of her affairs must be deferred to a more convenient hour; and Philip and his friend agreed to reconnoitre the house in Thornhaugh Street, and see if any thing had happened since its mistress had left it.

Yes: something had happened. Mrs. Brandon's maid, who ushered us into her mistress's little room, told us that in the early morning that horrible man who had come over night, and been so tipsy, and behaved so ill—the very same man who had come there tipsy afore once, and whom Mr. Philip had flung into the street—had come battering at the knocker, and pulking at the bell, and swearing and cursing most dreadful, and calling for "Mrs. Brandon! Mrs. Brandon! Mrs. Brandon!" and frightening the whole street. After he had rung, he knocked and battered ever so long. Mary looked out at him from her upper window, and told him to go along home, or she would call the police. On this the man roared out that he would call the police himself if Mary did not let him in; and as he went on calling "Police!" and yelling from the door, Mary came down stairs and opened the hall-door, keeping the chain fastened, and asked him what he wanted?

Hunt, from the steps without, began to swear and rage more loudly, and to demand to be let in. He must and would see Mrs. Brandon.

Mary, from behind her chain barricade, said that her mistress was not at home, but that she had been called out that night to a patient of Dr. Goodenough's.

Hunt, with more shrieks and curses, said it was a lie; and that she was at home; and that he would see her; and that he must go into her room; and that he had left something there; that he had lost something; and that he would have it.

"Lost something here?" cried Mary. "Why here? when you reeled out of this house you couldn't scarce walk, and you almost fell into the gutter, which I have seen you there before. Get away, and go home! You are not sober yet, you horrible man!"

On this, clinging on to the area-railings, and demeaning himself like a madman, Hunt continued to call out, "Police, police! I have been robbed, I've been robbed! Police!" until astonished heads appeared at various windows in the quiet street, and a policeman actually came up.

When the policeman appeared, Hunt began to sway and pull at the door, confined by its chain: and he frantically reiterated his charge, that he had been robbed and hocusSED in that house, that night, by Mrs. Brandon.

The policeman, by a familiar expression, conveyed his utter disbelief of the statement, and told the dirty, disreputable man to move on, and go to bed. Mrs. Brandon was known and respected all round the neighborhood. She had befriended numerous poor round about, and was known for a hundred charities. She attended many respectable families. In that parish there was no woman more esteemed. And by the word "Gammon" the policeman expressed his sense of the utter absurdity of the charge against the good lady.

Hunt still continued to yell out that he had been robbed and hocusSED; and Mary from behind her door repeated to the officer (with whom she perhaps had relations not unfriendly), her statement that the beast had gone reeling away from the house the night before, and if he had lost any thing, who knows where he might not have lost it?

"It was taken out of this pocket, and out of this pocket-book," howled Hunt, clinging to the rail. "I give her in charge. I give the house in charge! It's a den of thieves!"

During this shouting and turmoil the sash of a window in Ridley's studio was thrown up. The painter was going to his morning work. He had appointed an early model. The sun could not rise too soon for Ridley; and, as soon as ever it gave its light, found him happy at his labor. He had heard from his bedroom the brawl going on about the door.

"Mr. Ridley!" says the policeman, touching the glazed hat with much respect—in fact, and out of uniform, Z 25 has figured in more than one of J. J.'s pictures—"here's a fellow disturbing the whole street, and shouting out that Mrs. Brandon have robbed and hocusSED him!"

Ridley ran down stairs in a high state of indignation. He is nervous, like men of his tribe; quick to feel, to pity, to love, to be angry. He undid the chain and ran into the street.

"I remember that fellow drunk here before," said the painter, "and lying in that very gutter."

"Drunk and disorderly! Come along!" cries Z 25; and his hand was quickly fastened on the parson's greasy collar, and under its strong grasp Hunt is forced to move on. He goes, still yelling out that he has been robbed.

"Tell that to his worship," says the incredulous Z. And this was the news which Mrs. Brandon's friends received from her maid when they called at her house.

LOIS:

THE STORY OF A MAN'S MISTAKE.

THE snow had been falling steadily all the day: it fell whitely and steadily now on the group that stood round an open grave, wherein a coffin had just been deposited, in a New England church-yard among the hills. The neighbors had withdrawn a little, and only a group of four stood bending over the grave. It was a young wife who lay there, in her last slumber. The two old people on the right were her husband's father and mother, for she had been an orphan, brotherless and sisterless, and there were none of her own kin to follow her to the church-yard. There had been no great store of love between William Comstock's young wife and his old parents, and the sorrow which sat now upon their faces was less for the loss of the dead than the grief of their living son. William was their only one, and their idol. They would have thought the noblest bride in the land none too good for him, and they had been but illy pleased when he brought Lois Gray to the old homestead. She was delicate, indeed, as a spring anemone. Her words and ways were full of a tender, flower-like sweetness and grace; but she had neither gold nor land to her dowry, and her small forefinger was pricked till it was callous with the frequent thrusts of her glancing needle—for pretty little Lois was a tailoress, and worked hard for her daily-bread, going from house to house, as the fashion then was.

There had been many hard words when William Comstock, son of the richest man in Rye-field, told his parents of the daughter he was going to bring them. Had he not been their only son doubtless there would have been yet stormier scenes; perhaps William would have been thrust forth into the world to look out for himself, and his name have been a forbidden sound thereafter at the home fireside. But he was their only son. If they had cast him off there would have been none of their name to hold their broad, rich lands after them; so they yielded to their untoward fate, and did not positively forbid the home-coming of the unwelcome bride. They spoke many scornful words of her, however—words which a stronger, more self-reliant man than William Comstock would not have borne. It would have been better had he taken his bride to another home, asking no aid of them, and remembering, while he showed them all filial duty, that it was Heaven's ordering that a man should forsake father and mother and cleave unto his wife. This would certainly have been Lois's choice. Delicate as she looked, there was force and power in her nature. She would have made her husband a true and wise helpmeet if he had but been ready to go with her to ever so humble a home of their own, and live, as every newly-married pair should, their own life apart from all the rest of the world. But William Comstock, though good and truthful and loving, was not a strong man. He would have had little courage to fight unaided his battle of life. He had been petted and fostered and indulged in his own way until his whole nature was changed, as a hardy woodland flower is changed when it is transplanted to a hot-house. It may put forth more luxuriant leaves, and fuller and softer petals, but it would shrink from the first blast. Sun and wind and shower, which it was its nature to court, would be death to it now.

Going out into the world to toil for himself and the wife of his choice would have been the last thing to suggest itself to William Comstock, and yet he loved her far too well to give her up because of his parents' displeasure. So he trusted, as many another weak man has done, to things coming right in time. He thought his father and mother would be sure to like her when all was done; and, any way, he would be good to her; and so, not without some stifled misgivings, he brought his bride home.

I think a wind blew up from the east, an ill-omened wind, when Lois crossed that threshold, and its subtle chill stole through her bridal robes to her young, innocent heart, for she was never quite the same Lois afterward.

Her father and mother in law were not rudely and openly unkind to her, for William would have seen that, and, weak as he was, it would have armed him in her defense. But there is a secret cruelty, an intangible wrong, of which one could never find words to complain, ten times more bitter and deadly than open contumely. I do not mean to represent old Simon Comstock and his wife as very much worse than the ordinary run of men and women. They did not deliberately set to work to torture their son's wife, and crush out her life; simply they did not like her, and they let her see that they did not, every hour and every moment in the day. She never retaliated, and her very inoffensiveness provoked them still more. Probably, if she had been a genuine termagant, and had fought one or two fierce battles with them, letting them see that she had her own little gifts in the rôle of Zantippe, it would have ended in their letting her alone, and finally recognizing her as of their own kind, and coming to like her very well indeed. But her silence, her courtesy, her still patience they could not comprehend, and therefore they hated her the more. It was hardest of all when her husband became in some sort her persecutor. Constant complaints of her fineladyism, her inefficiency, her incompetence to manage domestic affairs, at length irritated him, and he often spoke to her in tones of dissatisfaction and fault-finding. She did not explain that her apparent lack of domestic ability arose from necessity, not choice—because his mother jealously resented all exercise of authority on her part, and found something to condemn in every attempt she made to be useful. She was of a rare type of womanhood—one who never wasted words or complained. If love had made her husband's eyes keen to see her sufferings she would have been thankful. He did not see them: she was silent.

When they had been married a year a little girl came—a new life blossoming from her own, to which she trusted to bring back the youth and hope which already, at nineteen, seemed slipping from her hold.

William Comstock had always loved his wife, in his own way—not so deeply and fervently, perhaps, as some men love—but each tree bears its own kind of fruit, and we do not cut down the cherry bough because it can not offer us oranges. He was not a man of lofty courage or very delicate perceptions—his heart was not so strong or so noble as some hearts which have worshiped women far less akin to the divine than she; but such as the heart was, it was all hers. He thought he had never loved her so well as when he came into the still room where she lay with her baby on her breast. He bent over her and kissed the pink flushes on her cheek—the white lids that drooped over her eyes to shut out of sight the happy tears. Then he took the baby in his arms, clumsily and awkwardly, as men always do when they handle the little, frail newborn things; but with a strong pulse of love and pride throbbing in the breast against which the little helpless morsel lay—his child and hers.

Those weeks wore velvet shoon which slipped by so noiselessly before the young mother left her room. She almost wished they would never end, she was so happy. William was with her almost all the time. He read to her—he gathered flowers to lay on her pillow—he told her twenty times a day how dear she was to him, and how full of thanksgiving his soul was that her hour of peril had not been her hour of death. It was like their old lover days, she thought—like them, only so much better, for here was the baby, the wee winsome darling, who held in such tiny, dimpled fingers the unseen threads which were drawing husband and wife nearer together than they had ever been before.

Even the old father and mother were kind to her at first during those still weeks, for she had passed through such suffering as always softens the hardest heart.

But this season of peace and repose could not last forever. One day the Present touched her with rude hand, and woke her to the memory that she had not yet reached heaven—where our rest is.

Her husband had been sitting beside her, as she leaned back in her chair looking at the little flower-like creature on her knee. They had been marveling together over the perfect little fingers, the round, soft limbs, the eyes of deep violet blue, so like Lois's own. At length he had gone out, drawing the door together after him, but not latching it. Space enough was left for a discordant, disturbing voice to penetrate to the Rose-Eden. It was William Comstock's mother who spoke.

"How is your wife getting along? Are we never to see her out of that room again? Baby has been here four weeks now. Times have changed mightily since I was young. When you were a fortnight old I had you on my arm, and was going round the house overseeing the work. Not that there is any special need of Lois, for she doesn't understand managing the business of a household like this; but she will never begin to gain strength if she doesn't move round, and I suppose you wouldn't like to have her shut up there always."

"I'll tell her about it, mother, if you think she'd get well faster by stirring round more. I won't go back now, though, for she was going to get baby to sleep."

Lois heard the acquiescent reply, and her heart sank within her. She felt the old chill creeping back over her life. Oh, how she longed then for a mother, for any friend, with strong love and keen feminine discernment, to make her husband understand that all women were not alike, and that his mother's strength was no criterion for hers: his mother, with her iron constitution and sturdy Dutch build, she herself "fashioned so slenderly." She sighed as she bent over the sleeping baby, and drew it closer to her sheltering bosom; but there was a struggle for cheerfulness in her voice as she murmured—

"No more long, lazy days for us, little one! I suppose grandmamma was right, though, and we shall be all the better for a little more exertion."

That afternoon, when William came in to tea, he found his wife in the dining-room. Baby was asleep in the inner apartment, and Lois sat quietly by the window, with a piece of work in her hands. So that was the end of the still, pleasant days of convalescence! The thought came to him half sadly, but he said nothing. He threw carelessly down on the table the bunch of late wild roses which he had fastened together with a long spear of grass for Lois; he would not give them to her there, with his father and mother looking on, who so hated what they called nonsense.

And so the happy weeks ended, and Lois came back into the hard everyday life once more.

She had her baby, to be sure, and there was sweet comfort in that—at least in the rare times when she could get away, and have it quite to herself, where no cynic gaze sneered at her when she hugged it to her bosom, and covered its little face with kisses; no lip curled when she murmured all manner of unintelligible nonsense over it in true womanly fashion. But a baby is not quite enough to fill and satisfy a wife's heart. Lois felt that the vision she had cherished of the love and harmony into which this new tie was to sublime her life with her husband had been an idle fancy—he was as far from her now as ever. Perhaps it would have been well if she had realized that he was not, and never under any circumstances would have been, the hero her youthful imagination had made of him. Once convinced that he was an utterly commonplace man, and she might have borne it better; for it is in human nature, I think, to become resigned to the inevitable. The misfortune was that her exalted estimate of him did not change; so she wore herself out with vain endeavors to kindle a fire which there would have been no fuel in his being to sustain. Partly she attributed her failure to the influence which she thought it but natural that his parents' contempt for her should unconsciously have over him; partly—and this was saddest of all—to some unworthiness of her own, which night and day she vexed herself with vain strivings to discover and remedy. And all the while she grew paler and thinner, holding the world more and more loosely.

It might naturally have been thought that the little child in the house would have won its grandparents' hearts for its mother, and so brought love and harmony in place of discord and coldness. But what was singular, they did not love it. They always spoke of it as Lois's child—all Gray—not a bit of Comstock about it. If it had looked like William it might have been different, but it was simply Lois in miniature. It had her eyes, her soft, shadowy brown hair, her delicate outline of features, and fragility of organization. A bold, boisterous child, thrusting itself on their notice, might have stormed its way into their hearts; but little Nellie never sought any one's attention—she took whatever treatment she received quietly, and shrank within herself like a sensitive plant. She was perfectly well, but she seemed to have been, as it were, marked with silence. It is probable that her mother's feelings before her birth had impressed her with these characteristics, usually so foreign to childhood. She was certainly not cold of nature, for she clung to her mother with a tenacity so passionate that it seemed terrible, when one recalled the chances and changes which life has in store for these clinging, intense natures. Her father loved her, certainly, but he too would have been fonder of a child more gay and frolicsome. She felt this, not with her understanding, of course, but with a dumb, instinctive heart-knowledge which she was too young to frame into thought.

She was more than three years old when again to her mother came the fierce extremity of woman's anguish and peril. This time it was a boy who was laid upon the almost pulseless breast. Toward him, indeed, the grand-parents' hearts warmed. He looked like William—he was Comstock, not Gray. It was evident that to be idolized and spoiled, as his father had been before him, would be his destiny if he lived. From the first this was but a doubtful if. He was helpless and frail as a wreath of snow, and he seemed hour by hour to grow frailer. It was three days before he slipped quite away from the hearts and hands that would have held him back from death—three days, and then they found upon the pillow a little white, frozen image; a still, cold mouth that human breath would never more flutter through; a brow on whose awful chill the kiss of Azrael had left its seal of eternal peace.

Only the mother seemed not to mourn him. A smile full of mysterious meaning crossed her face when they told her he was dead—not a tear dimmed the blue gladness of her eyes, in which shone a strange rejoicing; and this singular indifference—hard-heartedness the old people called it—vexed them yet more, and woke a vague disquiet in the sorrowing soul of William Comstock.

That afternoon he followed Dr. Sprague from the sick-room. The Doctor had known Lois from a baby, and, without wife or child himself, had loved her, perhaps better than any living thing, for the sake of her dead mother, whom he had loved once in vain. With the quiet insight of one long practiced to observe minutely, he had noted the coldness and contempt which had been meted out to her in her widowhood home, and often had been angered almost beyond his power of self-control and silence. He felt condemned now that he had been restrained from speaking by his hesitation to intrude upon the domestic privacy of another household; and, angry with himself, he was the more ready to deal harshly with another. He turned upon William Comstock, as they stood alone together, with something stern and threatening in his eye.

"What would you have?" he said, shortly.

"Lois"—the younger man faltered—"what ails her?"

"Nothing, I think," was the curt answer.

"Has she no disease?"

"None that I know of."

"Is her mind all right, then?"

Dr. Sprague drew a long breath, and looked at Lois Comstock's husband with the fierce, pitiless gaze of one who feels no ruth and will show no mercy. He spoke with cold, incisive tones that seemed to cut the air:

"Nothing is the matter with Lois, only she is dying. Among you you have done her to death. What did you think, man, when you brought that girl, sensitive as a flower, to live here—to be crushed, and scorned, and flouted, and stood by yourself looking on, and never seeing it was killing her? Did you have it in your heart to be a murderer?"

He paused a moment, with a cruel joy to see how the thrust he had given had struck home.

Then opening the outside door, he said, coolly, "You had better keep the boy, and bury him with his mother. You will not have long to wait."

Left alone, William Comstock stood for a moment leaning against the wall. He understood it all now only too well—saw but too clearly. She had not mourned for her babe, indeed—we do not mourn for those from whom we part but for a day or an hour.

He went in at length where she lay, carrying, as he had always done, his trouble to her. The wistful, violet eyes, with the strange smile in them, met his as he dropped down on his knees beside her. He spoke abruptly—he knew what he had to say was already familiar to her thoughts—

"Dr. Sprague says you are dying, Lois."

"Yes, William. I have known it all along. It is best so. I was poorly fitted for this struggling, turbulent world."

"But, Lois, pity me. I can not bear it. What shall I do? You must not leave me alone."

The white, thin hand was cool and soft as snow that touched his lips.

"Not alone, love. Our Father will watch over you, our loving Saviour be near and comfort you, if only you will not shut the door of your heart. And then you have Nellie. I leave my image with you on earth, even as I shall carry yours with me to heaven. Your parents, too—"

"Do not speak of them," he interrupted her, with a fierce passion that seemed foreign to his easy, quiet nature. "God forgive me, but I hate them. I shall hate them to their dying day. They have killed you, my darling, and I, blind fool, stood by and never saw it!"

"What they did they did ignorantly—you must not blame them. If you would ever see me again hereafter, you must forgive them, and be at peace with them. They meant no harm; it was only that they could not like me, we were so different. The worst pang was when I thought you did not love me; feared that you were weary of me. But I know better than that now. I know that I was your beloved wife always."

"As God hears me, you were. My blessed darling! I must have been mad ever to have given you room to doubt it."

Kneeling there, he laid his head on the pillow beside hers. Strong sobs shook him; the fierce agony of manhood was upon him. He scarcely felt the hand that rested so softly on his hair, or the lips that fluttered against his cheek. There would come a time when he would barter life itself for one of those touches. She was the first to break the silence. She felt a strange lethargy creeping over her, and she knew but too surely what it portended.

"Go, William," she said, "bring me little Nellie, and call your parents."

He sprang to do her bidding. He caught the child from the chair where she sat silently by the window, the quiet, patient little thing. He did not speak to his parents, but startled by his white face and strange manner they hurried after him. Even during the moment of his absence, that change, which none can mistake who ever saw it once, had crept over Lois's face—he would have needed no one now to tell him she was dying. Simon Comstock and his wife saw it too, and wild spasms of repentance shook their hard, worldly natures to their depths. As white almost as the dying woman, they stood beside her bed, and she, patient in life, and merciful in death, whispered:

“Good-by, father and mother!”

Her husband laid little Nellie beside her, and the child crept quietly into the bosom growing chill so fast. The mother's lips moved in prayer—then they clung passionately for a moment to the white, childish brow and golden hair, and then—even as she stretched her hands toward her husband, for the last and hardest parting of all—they sank nerveless by her side, and little Nellie was motherless.

I have no words to paint the bitterness of William Comstock's agony. It blanched his hair and aged his face, but he made no moan. He said not a word, save to give the necessary directions for the funeral of his dead wife; and the murmurs of passionate tenderness and sorrow over the silent, clinging child in his arms, which no one else heard.

And so the days went on till the day came on which they left her in her still grave among the hills. She had been beautiful in life, but never had she seemed half so fair as with the last and sweetest smile of all frozen upon her face, the eyes closed gently as if in sleep, and the brow so very white, beneath the shadowing, dusky hair. In her arms, close-pressed to her bosom, lay the little babe whose life had been only three days long. Not till William Comstock's eyes should be covered with the death film would they cease to behold the awful, statue-like beauty of those two—his dead wife and the dead baby on her breast.

Plainer than ever he seemed to see it when they had shut the lid of the coffin above her, and let it down into the open grave, where the snow-flakes were falling steadily. Little Nellie in his arms clung closer still, and cried, shudderingly, that he should not let them put her mother into the ground. He clasped her to his breast with a quick, passionate gesture, and whispered something which made her silent again. And so they stood round the young wife's grave—those who had hated, and those who had loved her.

Ever since Lois's death a half-stifled remorse and a vague, shuddering fear of retribution had lain heavy at the hearts of Simon Comstock and his wife. They knew not exactly how their punishment was to come, but they read a sentence of doom in their son's implacable eye.

When the funeral was over, and they were all seated in the room whence the dead had been that day borne, with the wild courage which is born of despair the mother resolved to know and provoke the worst. So she took Lois's name upon her lips—uttered, like Job's comforters, some of the common platitudes of sorrow, and told him that time would heal the wound which ached so now.

He put Nellie down from his arms as he listened, and stood up before his mother, straight and strong.

There are men weak by nature and easily swayed—men who are not firm or self-reliant, yet with a certain vein of desperation in them, which, when once aroused, is as long-enduring, as terrible, as the sternest and most well-grounded resolves of stronger men. Such was William Comstock—such a fierce purpose glittered in his hard eye, and gave a sharp, steel-like ring to his voice.

“Not that name, mother—never dare to take that name upon your lips again. You killed her, you two—chilled, and tortured, and goaded her to death; and I—I, who loved her—stood by and never saw it. I can never forgive myself—is it likely that I shall ever forgive you? I will stay here, unless you choose that I should go—it is the fittest place for Nellie, and there is no need that the world should busy itself concerning our affairs. But I will never speak to you, save when some third party is present, or business requires it—so help me God!”

When he had said these words he took the child up again in his arms, and bore her to his own chamber. He had spoken passionately. He confirmed his words with an oath, though he did not confess his motive to himself, in order that the terror of perjury might keep him from any weak yielding. Knowing the weakness and infirmity of purpose which characterized his nature, he feared to trust himself without some outside support.

The two left behind looked at each other in blank horror.

“We are punished.” The words fell slowly after a time from the mother's ashen lips. “We have idolized him, and now he has turned from us. I can not blame him. We have sinned, and the penalty is just. I never can forget the face which Lois lifted to ours a moment before she died. It will haunt me forever.”

Simon Comstock was silent. He was a man of few words, but the blow fell on him heavily. He understood his son better, however, than his wife did; and in his heart was a vague hope that resentment so fierce, in such a nature, would sooner or later wear itself out.

But weeks and months passed on and brought no change. Never, when they were alone with their son, did one word more cross his lips than business actually required; never by any chance did his eyes meet theirs. When guests were present his manner was so courteous, so apparently unconscious of any estrangement between them, that it was almost beyond their endurance. But there was that in his face still which told even his mother that words would be wasted. She did not once appeal to him.

They did try to win Nellie's love, those two poor forsaken old souls; for their hearts yearned over the child now in this alienation from her father. They succeeded in so far that she was always dutiful to them, suffered their caresses, and often performed for them thoughtful little offices of attention. To all this her father never objected. He would not for worlds have taught the child one lesson of hatred or revenge, were it only from an undefined feeling that her mother would look on from the far place of her abode with a still human sorrow. But Nellie's heart was all his. She loved him as she had never done during her mother's lifetime, for now they were all in all to each other. He never went even to the grave of his dead young wife without her. They would sit there together hand in hand, in a silence drearier than tears or mourning.

At last the child was taken sick. Scarlet fever was in the neighborhood, but her father guarded her carefully, as he thought, from contagion. Yet in spite of all precautions, one day he saw the fatal scarlet flushing her fair child's face. From the first he felt as if she were doomed. He watched over her incessantly himself, scarcely allowing any one else to approach her. He longed then for his mother's sympathy; for she was his mother in spite of all, and a fond and loving mother to him; but he bethought himself anew of his oath and the wrongs of his dead wife, and preserved his stern silence.

At length one night he sat as usual alone watching his child. To all offers of assistance he had replied that he needed none, and so his vigil was unshared. It was midnight when he knelt, overwhelmed by the anguish of fear, and uttered a wild, passionate cry to Heaven for his darling's life. Was it his own overwrought fancy? did he hear, or only seem to hear, a voice falling through farthest space—a well-known, well-loved voice?

"You have forgotten to show mercy—how can you venture to ask it? I bade you with my dying breath to forgive—you have not forgiven. You have taken away from your parents their child, can you hope Heaven will spare yours? Defying God's law of peace and pardon, can you cry to Him for a blessing?"

That was all. It was as if, for one moment, Heaven had opened, and the voice he loved had sounded down to him through the far distance, and then the golden gates had rolled back upon their hinges, and the voice was silent for evermore until he should join her there.

In that moment he knew that his vow was not "unto the Lord;" that the sin would be in keeping, not in breaking it; and leaving his sick child lying alone in the dull stupor of fever, he went swiftly to the room where his parents always slept. He found them sitting together over the fire—it was winter again now—too anxious for slumber. They started when he entered with a shiver of agony, for the child had grown very dear to their penitent hearts, and they thought he had come to tell them she was dying.

Once more, as on that night after the burial, he stood before them, and now, as then, they listened.

"Father, mother, God is chastening me. Lois bade me, with almost her dying breath, to forgive you, and I have hardened my heart against you. I dare not ask Heaven's mercy for my child till I have made my peace with you. I have sinned, forgive me."

It is not for me to describe that hour of confession and pardon—the parents who humbled themselves in the dust, and then clung, weeping tears of joy and grief and terror, to the lost son whom they had found.

William Comstock watched no more alone. Together father, mother, and son called on God, and He heard them. Nellie lived.

Her illness, or the difference she witnessed in her father's manner of thought and life, wrought a strange change in her. When she recovered she was no longer a pensive, silent child, shutting the leaves of her heart from every eye. She became joyous, social, caressing—even naughty and exacting sometimes—thoroughly and deliciously human.

She grew up to a character and a fate far other than her mother's. Joy smiled upon her life, and to-day the hair is white above her serene forehead, and her children's children call her blessed.

IF I COULD KNOW.

HERMANN leaned back wearily from his study table, sighed, and sat in reverie for a long time.

"If I could only know that fruit would come of all this thought and effort," he said, breaking at length into the pause with speech. "If I could only know that the seed I am trying to scatter would find a lodgment in good ground."

He was silent again. Then a page in his Book of Memory was turned by an unseen hand, and he read from it this passage: "In the morning sow thy seed, and in the evening withhold not thine hand; for thou knowest not whether will prosper, either this or that, or whether they both shall be alike good."

He sighed once more, but the sigh was fainter. Then he bent to his work, writing slowly and with an intentness of thought that crowded the blood on his brain. These, among other sentences, came into existence:

"Of what did she die? The physician's certificate has it 'congestion of the brain.' But there be those who know better—those who, living in closer proximity, understand the case differently. Was the physician deceived? Possibly. Nay, certainly, for all his post-mortem examination. True, there was congestion of the brain, which, morbidly excited, took blood faster than it was able to use and return it; and this was the proximate cause of death—enough for the profession; but the real cause lay far away behind that, unrevealed to the eye of science. Of what, then, did she die? Simply of starvation!

Nay, do not look incredulous, nor reject the assertion. It is true—sadly, sorrowfully true! She died, as thousands die daily around us, of starvation.

"You reject this, and with indignation. You knew her socially and intimately, were with her frequently during her last illness, and know that she took food daily, and in sufficient quantities to sustain life. But, for all this, our sweet friend died of starvation. There are those who live not by bread alone, who must have heart-food or they can not live. Why are the cheeks of so many wives pale and wasted? The family physician, at fault, will look serious, and hint at organic derangement. He will recommend change of scene, exercise in the open air, more nutritious food—all merely professional, and not touching the case. If he could prescribe love!

"I saw, long ago, that she was failing. At first there crept over her pure face the thinnest veil of shadows. Something dreamy and pensive came into her eyes. She had a strange, earnest way of looking at her husband—tender, loving, but questioning. If she sat near him, or stood by his side, she leaned a little, as if drawn by an invisible attraction. I noticed, on his part, a cold, irresponsible manner—a self-consciousness that held him away from all just perception of her states of feeling. His thoughts were busy in a world where she was not present. All the while she was asking for love, and looking for its signs in tenderly-spoken words, in fond caresses, in kisses not coldly given, but burning with heart-fires. All the while she was hungering, and he kept back the full supply of food.

"Was he estranged from her? Had love already died? Had she failed to reach his ideal of a wife? Not so. He loved her—as such self-absorbed men love their wives; was proud of her; looked into no woman's face and thought it sweeter than hers. She was making all his life pleasant, and he felt and acknowledged it with himself. But he was undemonstrative, as they say—did not express what he felt. Ah, that word undemonstrative, how often is it made to excuse mere indifference, or downright cold-heartedness! In fact, he was not worthy of such a wife, for he could not comprehend her nature, or, it may be, would not so rise out of his mere selfishness as to get a clearer vision. Be that as it may, he starved her by withholding the food her spirit craved with a never-dying hunger; and she paled and faded in his sight, wasting to ghostliness, and receding, until she passed the vale through which none return—passed, as many wives pass year by year, killed by the same disease.

"O man, consider and be wise, ere the days of darkness come, when it will be too late! Is there a pale face in your home? Do loving eyes look at you in wistful sadness from sunken orbits? Are you in daily fear that a blast falling down suddenly will sweep to the other side the spirit-like form which, once absent from your dwelling, will leave all its chambers desolate? So far the physician has failed. Medicine does not reach the disease. Sea-bathing, mountain air, mineral springs—all have been tried, and still the white face grows whiter, the shrinking form more and more attenuate, the eyes sadder, the spirits more depressed. You have done and are still doing all in human power to save her. No—something yet remains! Try loving words and deeds. Lay your hand, as of old, tenderly on her head, smooth the hair with soft caresses; look down, with the look that blessed her years ago, into her dimming eyes, and let them take a new lustre from your own; tell her that you love her, for this will do her good; she is hungering for the words—has hungered for them, oh so long and so wearily! until faint with waiting. Give her the food for lack of which she has been dying daily for years. O man! again I say be wise, ere the days of darkness come, when it will be too late."

Hermann paused, laid down his pen, and leaned back from the table.

"If I could have said all that was in my thought; but language is so inadequate! The ideas that throng my mind lose half their clearness when I attempt to express them. Ah, if I knew that even this poor work would not die—that it would save one life failing for lack of love."

Another leaf in his Book of Memory was turned by an unseen hand, and on it was written: "Cast thy bread upon the waters; for thou shalt find it after many days."

"Let it go forth," he said, in a more cheerful voice, rising from the table. "If the seed is good it will fall into good ground somewhere. Man soweth, but with God is the increase."

It went forth; and, like all good seed cast from the sower's hand, fell by the wayside, on stony places, among thorns, and also into good ground. God knew of the increase, if Hermann did not. It was a part of his discipline to have faith and patience.

A month or a year may have passed. It matters not. Truth never dies; never loses its vitalizing force. Sitting alone, with a troubled countenance, was a man scarcely yet touching the meridian of life. A periodical which had engaged his attention lay half-closed on the table beside him. The trouble in his face was mingled with surprise, as though he had just received a painful revelation.

"Starved to death!" There was a shiver in his voice. "Is that indeed possible?"

Even as he said this, the door opened and a woman came in, with almost noiseless feet gliding slowly across the apartment. Her face had the exhaustion and pallor that long sickness leaves behind, and was veiled by a touching sadness. She did not look toward the man, but his eyes followed her as she moved about the room with an expression of deep and yearning interest. After obtaining what she sought, the woman—still without seeming to be conscious of the man's presence—retired to the door through which she had entered, and was passing out, when the man, speaking with suppressed feeling, said,

"Florence!"

There was evidence of surprise in the woman's manner as she paused and half-turned herself, now for the first time looking at him.

"Florence, you are very pale to-night." The voice was not steady.

What a strange, startled look came into the woman's face!

"Come!" He spoke tenderly, and held forth one hand in invitation. "Come, dear!"

The woman moved away from the door, crossing the room toward him, her eyes fixed searchingly on his countenance. There was a shade of doubt in her manner.

"Sit down." He moved a chair close to the one he occupied, but a little in front, so that he could look at her directly, and, taking her hand as she approached, drew her down into it. Still holding her hand after she was seated, and still gazing at her with eyes full of interest, he said:

"Are you not so well to-night, Florence? You look unusually pale."

Her cheeks found, on the instant, unwonted color. Her eyes shone with the flushing of tears. There was a motion of her lips, but no words parted them.

"It hurts me, darling, to see you drooping about in this sad, weary way. Can nothing be done? Have you pain to-night?"

The tenderness of voice was genuine. The man's heart was stirring from a long, dull sleep—and it was time.

"I have no pain." She bent forward quickly and hid her face against him, catching her breath and holding back a sob that was leaping past her throat.

With a touch that sent a thrill of joy along every awakening nerve, the man laid his hand upon her head, smoothing back the hair with soft caresses, then stooping over, he kissed her.

"What does this mean, Harvey?" The woman lifted herself all trembling, and drawing back, looked in a wild, eager way into her husband's face.

"What can it mean, Florence, but love? Are you not my pure, true-hearted wife? Oh that I could bring back the old light to your eyes, the old health to your cheeks, the old gladness to your heart! What can I do, Florence?"

"Love me as of old," she answered, passionately, flinging herself on his bosom. "Oh, my husband! I am starving for lack of love."

"Not starving, Florence! Oh, my wife! how can you say this when you are the most precious thing I have in this world? When the fear of losing you forever haunts me day and night?"

She raised herself again. As her face became visible her husband saw that it was almost radiant. The lost sweetness and beauty were restored.

"Am I awake or dreaming?" she said.

"You are awake, dear—wide awake, after a long nightmare," was answered.

"Perhaps I may sleep again." Her voice fell.

"Not if in my power to hold you away from enchanted ground. I may have seemed cold on the outside, Florence, but my heart was warm. It carries no image but yours. Trust me, for the future."

"Our lives, Harvey, touch the outside of things," she answered; "and if that be cold, how can we help feeling the chill? If there is no tenderness in the eyes and voice, if loving speech is withheld, how can we be sure that love is in the heart? There may be rain enough in the clouds, but if it fall not on the thirsty flowers they will perish. Don't forget this, Harvey; and if you love me say the sweet words often, that my soul may have assurances and joy."

If Hermann could have looked on this scene he would have known what kind of harvests ripened from seed he was scattering—in doubt and hope—broadcast among the people, wearied often, and sometimes fainting. But he could not know. And it was as well. Self-discipline and strife with doubt were needed for the perfecting of his life. The unrest, born of vague questionings as to use and duty, gave vitality to thought, quickened his mind for higher efforts, and held him to work that needed to be done. And it was a good work if such fruit as we have seen crowned many of its harvests. Faint not, Hermann! "In the morning sow thy seed, and in the evening withhold not thy hand; for thou knowest not whether will prosper, either this or that, or whether they both shall be alike good."

THE DEAD-LETTER OFFICE.

OF the governmental Departments at Washington there is none with which the whole people are so closely connected as the General Post-Office. From this great centre stretch out and ramify in every direction, up and down and across the continent, ten thousand channels of intelligence, reaching, not only the great marts of commerce and the seats of learning, but the lowliest hamlet and the humblest cabin of the backwoodsman. With the greater diffusion of learning and general intelligence there is an increased demand for greater freedom of intercourse. People do not care so much whether the tariff adds five or ten cents to the cost of each pound of coffee, for they can do without it altogether if necessary; but their messages of business or pleasure must be carried with speed and delivered with certainty, or they will make a tumult about it at once. The newspaper, too, has become a popular necessity, and the man who does not take one is considered as living just beyond the pale of modern civilization. The newspaper is "daily bread" to the minds of the million, and if flood or tempest should delay its coming any amount of hard thoughts and open abuse is heaped upon postmasters and mail carriers.

The present Postmaster-General has won the just plaudits of the people and the press for the ability and efficiency with which he has managed and improved the complicated machinery of this Department. Soon after he assumed control of the postal affairs of the country the whole system was interrupted or temporarily destroyed by the rebellion, in all the territory of the seceded States and portions of the border States. This necessarily imposed some heavy losses upon the Department, and caused considerable embarrassment for a time. The wisdom and energy of the Postmaster-General, however, have already relieved the system from these difficulties. Among other efforts to increase the efficiency and general usefulness of the Department under the present Administration, is the plan to lessen the number of "dead-letters" by returning them, as far as practicable, to the writers.

An hour's visit to the Dead-Letter Office under the courteous guidance and instruction of the "Third Assistant Postmaster-General," will show us why letters become "dead," and how they are brought to life again. The room where the first operation is performed upon the defunct missives is occupied by some twelve or fifteen clerks, and the appearance is strongly suggestive of an old-fashioned husking match. Huge piles of letters, that have come from every point of the compass and almost every country in the world, are lying upon the tables, and the operatives are very busy inspecting and classifying them according to their character or value. Each clerk makes five classes of the letters as he opens them.

First, and most valuable, are the "money letters," containing bank-notes or coin to the amount of one dollar or more. Whenever a letter of this description is opened, the contents are examined and immediately returned to the envelope, upon which the clerk indorses the amount and kind of money within, subscribing his own name or initials. A careful record is made up of all such letters, and they are then passed into the hands of a chief clerk, whose business it is to return them to the writers with proper instructions to the deputy postmasters to deliver the money and take receipts for it. The greatest care and vigilance is exercised in this branch of the business, and there is scarcely a possibility that a valuable letter which has once reached the Dead-Letter Office should fail of getting back, either to the writer or to the person originally addressed, provided that either of them can be found or heard of at the address given in the letter. The daily average of money now found is about two hundred dollars. Last year more than fifty thousand dollars was returned to the owners through this office. Sometimes money is inclosed in an envelope without any letter accompanying it, or, what is just as bad, without any proper signature. In such cases another effort is made to reach the person to whom it was addressed, and failing in this the money is deposited at the Department to be delivered to the rightful owner whenever he shall come forward and establish his claim.

The second class of letters made by the clerks are technically called "minors," and contain notes of hand, drafts, checks, bills of exchange, deeds, mortgages, insurance policies, and other papers that are or may become representatives of money value; and besides these a great variety of articles of more or less value, including jewelry, pictures, etc. All letters of this class are re-enveloped and indorsed by the clerks who open them, and, after being carefully registered, are sent to another office to be returned to the owners.

Many letters are received at the Department making anxious inquiries for money or valuables sent through the mail and known to have failed in reaching the persons addressed. These letters can not expedite their return. The lost letter must remain two months advertised at the local office before it is sent to Washington, and then it must be found before it can be returned to the owner. Formerly there was quite a collection of curiosities at the Department, composed of articles found in dead-letters without any one to claim them. This has been dispensed with, and every letter containing any thing of value is returned to the owner if it is at all practicable.

The third class of letters consists of such as contain stamps, coin in less sums than one dollar, receipts for money or property, legal documents, etc. These, being of less value, are not formally registered with a description of their contents, but a special clerk devotes his time to returning them to the owners.

Last, but not least in number of the preserved letters, are those which contain no valuable inclosure, but are so dated and signed that it is possible to return them to the writers. The Department is now acting upon the conviction that persons would rather pay postage to get back their lost letters, though of little importance, and thus know that they were not received by the persons addressed, than to have them destroyed. As these letters pass twice through the mail, coming to and returning from the Dead-Letter Office, a law of Congress authorizes double postage upon them. These letters constitute about one half of all the dead-letters returned to the General Post-Office. The other half of this great multitude of stray epistles is composed of such as are not dated at any post-town or office (the post-mark itself being frequently illegible), and have no proper signature. These, and some others of an utterly worthless class, are first torn to shreds by a machine, to render them illegible, and then sold to the paper-makers. There are now about thirty clerks engaged in opening and returning dead-letters. They dispose of from ten to twelve thousand a day, amounting to several millions in the course of a year.

It is pertinent to ask the question, why do so many letters fail to reach the persons to whom they are addressed? It is evidently no fault of the mail-carriers, for each dead-letter has been to the office to which it was directed, and remained there several months. Is it because our people are so migratory in their habits that they can not remain stationary long enough to have a letter delivered through the mail? This principle accounts for it in part, but there are many other causes. Thousands of letters are directed to the wrong post-office by the writer, who merely guesses that he is sending it to the right one. Other thousands have the name of the party addressed so imperfectly written that the owner of the letter himself could not tell that it belonged to him. Others have the name of the State so imperfectly written that the letters are quite as likely to go in the wrong direction as the right. It is better generally to avoid abbreviations and write the name of a State in full, thus preventing the possibility of going in the wrong direction. We have seven States—Maine, Massachusetts, Maryland, Michigan, Minnesota, Missouri, and Mississippi—beginning with M. The abbreviations of these States imperfectly written will frequently send a letter two or three thousand miles in the wrong direction.

But one of the most active causes in the production of dead-letters at present is the existence of the war. The Union army, of more than half a million of men, is composed, to a large extent, of those who have left homes, fathers, mothers, wives, or sweet-hearts to fight the battles of the Republic. Most of these men can and do write letters at short intervals to friends and relatives, and, owing to the changes that are constantly going on in society, many of them fail to reach the desired destination, and after a few months turn up in the dead-letter office to be consigned to the paper-mill. The confusion and changes of residence in the Border States contribute to the same result. Every effort which administrative ability can suggest is being made to lessen the number of "dead-letters;" and with the return of peace and the restoration of the Union, their number will be reduced to a very small per-centage upon the countless millions that are sent through the mail.

If you wish your letter to reach its destination, or, failing to find the person to whom it is sent, to be returned, you can secure this, almost beyond the possibility of failure, by observing the following directions:

1. Direct the letter legibly, writing the name of the person to whom it is sent, his town, county, if possible, and State, upon the envelope. It is well also to repeat this either at the head or foot of the letter itself. If he is to be found there, the letter will reach him almost without fail.

2. At the head of the letter write your own address—town, county, and State in full. It is not enough to give the town merely, for there are so many places of the same name in different counties and States that this alone gives no sufficient clew to the one in question. If your letter is dated merely "Jackson," how can the office know which of the 150 "Jacksons" in the country has the honor of being your residence? Then sign your name clearly at the end. If you indulge in a fancy signature, which only yourself and the teller of the bank where you keep your funds can read, do not use it. The Office has not the pleasure of your personal acquaintance, and has no means of identifying your cabalistic signature. Write your name in full. It is not sufficient to sign "Your affectionate brother Bob," or "your own loving Maggie." For all the office can know there are in your town a score of "Bobs" and "Maggies" just as "affectionate" and "loving" as you are. If you observe these directions, and the letter fails to reach the person for whom it was intended, you will, in due time, receive it through the Dead-Letter Office, provided always that you have not in the mean while changed your residence.

Monthly Record of Current Events.

UNITED STATES.

THE capture of New Orleans proves to have been one of the most brilliant exploits of modern warfare. The brief mention made of it in our last Record was drawn wholly from Southern sources, our own official reports not having come to hand. We are now able to furnish a resumé of the whole series of operations. Our fleet, the largest ever assembled under the American flag, consisted of 8 steamships, 16 gun-boats, and 21 mortar schooners, 45 sail in all, carrying 286 guns. The whole fleet was commanded by Flag-officer D. S. Farragut; the mortar-vessels being under the special command of Commodore David D. Porter. This fleet entered the Mississippi, and ascending about 25 miles reached Forts Jackson and St. Philip, on opposite sides of the river, about 75 miles below the city. Here a chain had been thrown across the river; this, with the forts, the steam-rams, and gun-boats, had been supposed, as afterward appeared, to be quite sufficient to protect New Orleans from any possibility of attack. Yet it had been announced that the whole course of the river above the forts was guarded by batteries and intrenchments. The bombardment of these forts was opened on the 18th of April. This continued for six days. As afterward appeared great damage was done to the forts, although the vigor of their fire was not sensibly diminished. Fire-rafts were sent down in hopes to destroy our fleet. These were found to be useless. They were quietly taken in hand, towed ashore, and suffered to burn out. At length Commodore Farragut determined to pass the forts and proceed to the attack of New Orleans. At two o'clock on the morning of the 24th the steamers and gun-boats destined for the expedition received the signal to advance. They were formed into two columns; that on the right under Commodore Farragut, that on the left under Captain Theodorus Bailey. There were in all 16 steamers and gun-boats, two of the latter, however, did not succeed in passing the forts. They were soon discovered, and a furious fire was opened upon them from the forts, which was replied to with vigor, the vessels, meanwhile, pressing on. The Varuna, Captain Charles S. Boggs, having passed the forts, found itself the leading vessel and surrounded by a squadron of hostile steamers; to each of them in passing a broadside was given; four of these were thus driven on shore and left in flames. The Varuna was badly cut up in this combat, but thus far no one on board had been injured. The Varuna then engaged a vessel of the enemy iron-clad about the bow, so that shot were of no use against that part. The rebel attempted to butt the Varuna, which in turn endeavored to reach his vulnerable points. The rebel succeeded in his effort; but in so doing exposed his side, receiving a broadside which crippled his engine and set him on fire. The Varuna was also set on fire and the flames were with difficulty extinguished. At this moment another iron-clad steamer bore down upon the doomed Varuna, struck her heavily, and backed off for another blow. Seeing destruction inevitable, Captain Boggs so manœuvred that when the second blow was received, the unprotected side of the enemy was exposed. The blow crushed in the side of the Varuna leaving her in a sinking condition; but her fire, the last of which was delivered as her decks went under water, drove her enemy on shore in flames. The sinking Varuna was run on shore, her wounded safely landed, and her crew taken off by boats from the squadron. In this sharp fight she had destroyed six of the vessels of the enemy.—Meanwhile the steamer Brooklyn, Captain Craven, had lost sight of the remainder of the fleet in the darkness, and while under the fire of Fort Jackson found herself butted by the Confederate ram Manassas, which had been relied upon to sweep our fleet from the river. No great damage was done, and the ram soon disappeared to meet its fate from another vessel. A few minutes later the Brooklyn was attacked by a large steamer, which was disposed of by a single broadside. Immediately after she found herself abreast of Fort St. Philip; pouring in a volley the guns of the fort were silenced, and the steamer passed on and encountered several gun-boats of the enemy, flinging into them broadsides of grape with terrible effect. The Brooklyn, fighting alone, was under fire an hour and a half and suffered severely, losing 8 men killed and 26 wounded.—The Hartford, Commodore Farragut's flag-ship, had a narrow escape. A fire-raft came down upon her accompanied by the ram Manassas. The rigging of the Hartford caught fire, and the steamer grounded at the same time. The ram was at this moment engaged by another vessel, and hauled off; the fire was extinguished, and the Hartford was got afloat, having been badly cut up.—The steamer Mississippi had the honor of having given the finishing blow to the Manassas, a little further up the river, chasing her on shore where she was deserted by her crew, and drifted down the river on fire and fast sinking.

The forts being passed and the Confederate fleet destroyed, there was no serious obstacle in the way of approaching New Orleans. Two works known as the Chalmette batteries opened fire, but they were speedily silenced. As the fleet approached the city the vessels loaded with cotton were set on fire, and the sugar in the city was destroyed by order of General Lovell: the amount of property thus destroyed is estimated at eight or ten millions of dollars. Coming in front of the city, a demand was made for its surrender, which was sullenly complied with, as noted in our last Record. A detachment was sent to take possession of the defenses above the city, erected to prevent our approach down the river. At Carrollton, eight miles above New Orleans, a formidable work was found. A portion of the fleet was then sent up the river, capturing Baton Rouge on the way. Our intelligence from this comes wholly through Southern sources. At the latest dates it had reached Vicksburg, 400 miles above New Orleans, had demanded the surrender of the city, under pain of bombardment if this demand was not complied with.

Meanwhile forts Jackson and St. Philip had been passed, but not captured, by Commodore Farragut's expedition. Commodore Porter, in command of the mortar fleet, demanded the surrender of these forts immediately after the passage of the fleet. They were rendered of no use to the enemy after the capture of New Orleans, and on the 28th of April the commander decided to comply with the summons. The garrisons had made a brave defense, and the honors of war were accorded to them, the officers being allowed to retain their side-arms, and the men were released on parole. The surrender included that of the three remaining steamers and a formidable iron battery which had been sent down from New Orleans in an unfinished condition. While the articles of capitulation were being drawn up, this battery was towed out into the stream, set fire to, and sent adrift toward our vessels. She blew up in the stream, doing no harm beyond wounding one of their own men in Fort St. Philip, though had the explosion taken place near our vessels, they would have all been destroyed. Possession having been taken of the forts, the remaining steamers of the Confederate fleet were taken in hand. They surrendered on demand, unconditionally, and as a punishment for the treacherous attempt to blow up our fleet while negotiations for surrender were going on under a flag of truce, the crews were put in close confinement. Fort Jackson was found to be a total ruin from the severe fire to which it had been exposed.—Our loss in the whole series of operations resulting in the capture of New Orleans was only 36 killed and 123 wounded. That of the enemy was very severe, the boats which were sunk carrying down with them their entire crews. It is estimated that they lost from 1000 to 1500 men, besides several hundred prisoners.

General Butler, after the surrender of the forts, went up the river to New Orleans, and took formal possession of the city, which was, on the 1st of May, placed under martial law; the circulation of Confederate notes was prohibited; women who publicly insult our troops were ordered to be sent to the calaboose as loose characters; the newspapers were placed under strict surveillance; and, finally, the functions of the local government were vested in the military authorities.

While the lower course of the Mississippi was thus wrested from the Confederates, important operations were going on in its upper waters. After the abandonment of Island No. 10, the next strong point of the enemy was Fort Wright (known also as Fort Pillow), about 50 miles above Memphis, the only remaining place of any importance above New Orleans. This point had been watched rather than formally attacked by our gun-boats, under command of Captain Davis, who had succeeded to the command of our flotilla, temporarily vacated by Commodore Foote, who was disabled by a severe wound received in a previous engagement. Here also were gathered the entire Confederate gun-boats and rams on the Mississippi, except those at New Orleans. On the 8th of May the Confederate flotilla came up the river and made a violent attack upon our vessels—eight of their gun-boats, four being provided with rams, assaulting our fleet. After a sharp conflict of an hour they retired, losing three of their boats, blown up and sunk. The siege of the fort was continued until the 31st, when it was discovered that it had been abandoned, the guns being carried off, and all supplies and munitions destroyed. Our fleet then dropped down toward Memphis, which was reached on the evening of June 5. The entire Confederate flotilla, consisting of eight rams and gun-boats, was concentrated in front of the city, prepared to meet our fleet. Early on the morning of the 6th the fight commenced. The action lasted an hour and a half. The result was that seven of the eight Confederate boats were taken or destroyed, only one escaping by superior speed. This was a conflict of vessels, in which ours were manifestly superior. The only casualty on our side was the wounding of Colonel Ellet, commander of the ram fleet, by a pistol-shot early in the action. One of our rams was disabled in the fight. Immediately after the battle Commodore Davis dispatched a message to the Mayor of Memphis, saying, "I have respectfully to request that you will surrender the city of Memphis to the authority of the United States." To this request the Mayor replied that the civil authorities had no means of defense, and that the city was in the hands of the Union forces. Memphis and New Orleans having thus been captured, it may safely be assumed that, as we write, the whole Mississippi, from its source to its mouth, is in the hands of the National Government.

Corinth, the Confederate strong-hold of the West, has been evacuated almost without a struggle. For nearly two months after the great battle of Shiloh General Halleck had been advancing upon the enemy, slowly but surely, fortifying each step in advance, and making ready roads for retreat in case of reverse. At the close of May our lines were close to the enemy's works; but on the 30th of the month, when every thing was in readiness for an assault in force, it was discovered that Corinth had been evacuated. The movement had evidently been going on for some days, for every thing of value had been carried away or destroyed. At the distance of a fortnight we have no entirely reliable accounts of the direction of the retreat of the great army of General Beauregard. It is conjectured by some that the movement has been going on for some time, and that a considerable part of his troops had been sent to strengthen the Confederate army at Richmond. This, however, rests upon mere conjecture. On the 4th of June General Halleck telegraphed that General Pope, with 40,000 men, was thirty miles south of Corinth, pressing the enemy hard, and that he had taken 10,000 prisoners and deserters, with 15,000 stand of arms; and a week later he announced that the enemy had fallen back to Tusilla, 50 miles from Corinth by railroad, General Beauregard being at Okelona; their loss from casualties, desertions, and captures was estimated at from 20,000 to 30,000. These, however, are mere reports, which still remain to be verified.

The evacuation of Yorktown was followed by the surrender of Norfolk to a small force sent from Fortress Monroe under General Wool. This took place on the 10th of May; the Confederate troops under General Huger abandoning the place on the previous day, after having destroyed the navy-yard, formerly the largest in the United States. The Union forces, before reaching the city, were met by the Mayor and other officials, with whom articles of capitulation were agreed upon. Immediately after the surrender of Norfolk came the abandonment of the Confederate works at Craney Island, and the destruction of the famous steamer Merrimac, or Virginia. After her encounter with the Monitor she had been taken to Norfolk, repaired, and provided with heavier ordnance. She subsequently had been stationed at the mouth of the river, guarding it, and threatening our vessels in Hampton Roads, without, however, making any attack. It is now apparent that there was something defective about her. After Norfolk was taken she had no place of refuge. According to the report of Commodore Tatnall, who had been placed in command of her, the James River pilots assured him that if she were lightened she might be taken up to Richmond; but when her armament had been thrown overboard, and she was no longer in fighting condition, they said that she still drew too much water to ascend the river. There was then no alternative but to destroy her to prevent her from falling into our hands. So on the 12th of May she was abandoned and set on fire, and shortly after blew up.

Our forces, meanwhile, have experienced two severe reverses. A naval expedition, consisting of the Monitor, Galena, Naugatuck, and some other vessels, were sent up the James River to operate against Richmond. Approaching within a few miles of the city, the river was found barricaded, and defended by Fort Darling, situated on a high bluff, from which a plunging fire was poured upon our vessels. The Galena, which was plated with about two and a half inches of iron, suffered severely, and the 100-pound gun of the Naugatuck burst early in the fight; the Monitor, though repeatedly struck, was wholly uninjured. But none of our vessels were able to elevate their guns so as to bear upon the works on the bluff. The fleet was forced to withdraw. This took place on the 15th of May.

Of much more apparent consequence was the defeat of our division, under General Banks, in the Valley of the Shenandoah. Banks had advanced for 100 miles up this valley, driving the enemy before him beyond Strasburg. At this point the greater part of his troops were withdrawn from him in order to strengthen other divisions, particularly that of M'Dowell, so that he had left barely 5000 men. The Confederate General Jackson had collected a force, estimated at more than 20,000 men, with which he fell unexpectedly upon the division of Banks thus weakened. The first attack was made, May 23, upon the advance, consisting mainly of a Maryland regiment, under Colonel Kenly, stationed at Front Royal, numbering about 900 men. This body, after a sharp resistance, was overpowered, the greater portion being either killed or captured. Jackson then advanced upon Strasburg, where the main body under Banks was stationed. Banks retreated, being hotly pursued, and attacked at Middletown and Winchester, but finally succeeded in reaching the Potomac, which he crossed on the 25th, having marched 53 miles, 35 in one day, subject to constant attacks on front, rear, and flanks, by which he suffered considerable loss. The retreat was skillfully conducted, and of the whole train, consisting of nearly 500 wagons, all but about 50 were saved. This sudden movement of Jackson, whose force was greatly exaggerated, produced great alarm in Washington. It was surmised that a large part of the Confederate army at Richmond had been secretly dispatched to the Shenandoah, with the design of attacking the capital and carrying the war into the Free States. Telegraphic dispatches were sent to Pennsylvania,

New York, and New England, demanding additional regiments at once. These orders were complied with on the spot. The order reached New York at 11 o'clock on Sunday night, and at 9 on Monday morning the New York Seventh started for Washington, followed almost immediately by other regiments. Jackson, however, advanced only as far as the Potomac, and immediately began to fall back. In the mean time Frémont set out from the westward, by forced marches through the mountains, with the hope of cutting off the retreat. In this he was unsuccessful, but succeeded in coming up with the rear of the enemy at Strasburg on the 1st of June; Jackson hurried on in his retreat. He was overtaken on 8th at Cross Keys, near Harrisonburg, drawn up in line of battle, and strongly posted. Here a sharply contested action took place, in which Jackson was worsted. Our loss is estimated at 125 killed and 500 wounded. That of the enemy was much greater. General Frémont reports, on the following day, that 500 of their dead and many wounded were found on the battle-field. Jackson continued his retreat to Port Republic on the Shenandoah. Here a detachment from General Shields's corps had just reached; this was attacked by Jackson, and forced back upon the main body, when the enemy in turn fell back, and continued his retreat, apparently upon Charlottesville. Banks in the mean time recrossed the Potomac, and advanced to his former position.

In the Southern Department important measures are in progress. Pensacola has been evacuated, and Galveston, Mobile, Savannah, and Charleston, are threatened with attack.—General Hunter, who commands this Department, on the 9th of May issued an order stating that the States of Georgia, Florida, and South Carolina, having been placed under martial law, and "slavery and martial law in a free country being altogether incompatible, the persons in these three States heretofore held as slaves are therefore declared forever free."—President Lincoln thereupon issued a proclamation that this order of General Hunter was unauthorized by the Government; that no officer has authority to issue an order freeing the slaves in any State; and that this order of General Hunter was void.—Hon. Edward Stanley, formerly of North Carolina, has been appointed Military Governor of that State. He announced his purpose to carry into effect the laws of the State, among which is one forbidding the instruction of negroes; he consequently ordered the schools which had been opened for contrabands to be discontinued.

The main interest of the month has been directed toward our grand army under General M'Clellan, which has steadily advanced upon Richmond. In our last Record we noted the evacuation of Yorktown on the 4th of May, and the sharp action at Williamsburg on the 6th. The enemy retreated in good order upon Richmond, carrying nearly all of their arms and munitions, our army slowly following. By the 20th of May they had mainly reached the Chickahominy, a small river flowing through a swampy tract, at a distance of from 6 to 15 miles from Richmond, on the opposite side of which, covering the city, the enemy seem resolved to make a stand for the defense of their capital, which they declare is to be held to the last extremity. Our forces have been mainly delayed on the eastern side, owing to the necessity of constructing roads and bridges to cross the river and swamps. Continual skirmishing, amounting in some cases to battles of considerable importance, have taken place. The most important of these during the month of May took place at Hanover Court House, 16 miles north of Richmond, on the 27th. A detachment from General Porter's army corps was sent here to cut off the communications with the city by the Fredericksburg Railroad. This was successfully accomplished, after a sharp fight, in which our loss, in killed, wounded, and missing, is stated to have been 53 killed and 326 wounded and missing. That of the enemy is represented to have been 1000, including some 500 prisoners. We buried 100 of their dead upon the field.—In the mean time portions of our army had crossed the Chickahominy, and at the close of the month the extreme advance was within about five miles of Richmond. This position, which was near a place henceforth to be known as Fair Oaks, was held on the 31st of May by about 6000 men under General Casey. At this time a furious storm arose, which swelled the Chickahominy and flooded the swamps, apparently cutting off the connection between our forces on the two sides of the stream. Taking advantage of this, the enemy made an attack in force. Casey's force was driven back in considerable confusion, losing their guns and baggage. The retreat was checked by Heintzelman and Kearney, who were on that side of the river; at the same time Sumner succeeded in bringing across Sedgwick's and Richardson's divisions, who drove back the enemy at the point of the bayonet, and recovered all the ground that had been lost. On the following morning the enemy attempted to renew the conflict, but were every where repulsed, and fell back within their lines. Our loss in this action—which is next after that of Shiloh, the most destructive thus far during the war—is stated in the official report to have been 890 killed, 3627 wounded, 1222 missing—a total of 5739. General M'Clellan claims this as a very decided victory. The attack was made in great force, with every favoring circumstance, by the flower of the Confederate troops. Jefferson Davis was present during a part of the engagement, and Joseph Johnston, the senior General of the army, who was wounded on the first day. Davis, on the 2d of June, issued an order complimenting his troops for the gallantry which they displayed.—As we close our Record, on the 13th of June, the two great armies lie opposite to each other, face to face, almost within cannon-shot of the Confederate capital, for the possession of which a fierce struggle is daily anticipated. Of the comparative strength of the armies no positive account can be given; although it is supposed that the enemy outnumber us, while we are presumed to have the advantage in respect to condition, discipline, and equipments; they however having the counterbalancing advantage of a position chosen by themselves and strongly fortified.

MEXICO.

The French troops which, after the withdrawal of the Spanish and British forces, had been supposed to be pushing without danger of serious opposition upon the capital, appear to have suffered a severe defeat near Puebla, on 5th of May. The reports of the Mexican commanders must be received with caution; but according to them, General Lorenz with 4000 men attacked the Mexicans, and were totally defeated with the loss of half of their number, the Mexicans losing comparatively few. This is hardly credible, since the same account says that a renewed attack was anticipated on the following day; which, however, did not take place, the French taking up the retreat followed by the Mexicans. It appears to be sure, however, that the French have met with a repulse.

EUROPE.

American affairs still continue to engross the greater share of public attention. The distress in Great Britain, France, and in a less degree on the Continent, arising from the scarcity of cotton and the diminished demand for manufactures, is great and increasing. The British and French press, which is mainly hostile to the United States, teems with articles underrating our successes, prophesying the utter impossibility of putting down the insurrection, and reiterating the statement that the French Emperor is about to interfere on the side of the South, and that the British Government will join in the interference.—The recent visit to Richmond of M. Mercier, the French Minister at Washington, has given rise to an abundance of surmise in Europe as well as in this country; but nothing authentic as to its object has been made public. The fact, however, that it was made with the assent of our Government, and that the Minister on his return was greeted by the President and Secretary of State, seems to be a satisfactory assurance that it had no purport hostile to us.—If any purpose existed on the part of the Governments of Europe to interfere, or even to acknowledge the independence of the Southern Confederacy, as a matter of fact, it must have been formed since the close of March, or at least have been wholly unexpected by the Commissioners sent to Europe to endeavor to effect this very object. On the 21st of March, Mr. Rost, one of these Commissioners, addressed a report from Madrid to the Government at Richmond, giving a full account of the results of the Commission. This document fell into our hands, and has been published by the authority of the Secretary of State. The main points as narrated by Mr. Rost are, that the interviews between Messrs. Mason and Slidell and M. Thouvenel, the French Minister, had “led to no result. The Emperor Napoleon considered the disruption of the American Union and of its rising navy as a great misfortune to France, and was of late inclined to hope that it might be reconstructed, and further, that he would under no circumstances incur the enmity of the North by taking the lead in recognizing the Southern Confederacy.” The prospect as to Great Britain was, according to Mr. Rost, still less favorable. “The present Administration was to a great extent composed of Abolitionists, and wanted the support of the Abolition faction for its maintenance in power, deluding itself at the same time with the vain hope that if the civil war was protracted, and the cultivation of cotton ceased, in whole or in part, the monopoly of that staple would pass from the Confederate States to India, as a compensation for the present sufferings of the British manufacturing population.”—Mr. Rost’s special mission was to Spain, and in an interview with Señor Calderon Collantes, the Minister for Foreign Affairs, he endeavored to secure the recognition of the Confederacy by Spain, independent of the other Powers. He argued that it was “for her interest that North America should be possessed by two great powers, who should balance each other;” that the South, from similarity of institutions and habits, was the natural ally of Spain; that her independence secured, she with Spain and Brazil, all slaveholding powers, “would have the monopoly of the system of labor which alone could make inter-tropical America and the regions adjoining to it available for the uses of man. Nothing could give an idea of the career of prosperity which would thus be opened.”—Señor Collantes, according to Mr. Rost, was quite assured that on the question of secession the right was wholly with the South; and he believed that she would succeed “provided the people could stand the privations which a protracted contest would bring upon them;” but the question was one of fact “whether the South had the power to maintain herself against the efforts of her opponent, and thus far she had not made that proof, and further time must elapse before the Queen’s Government could recognize her.” He then alluded to the fact that all the expeditions against Cuba had sailed from Southern ports, and intimated that in case the South became a strong power her first attempt at conquest would be made upon that island. Mr. Rost endeavored to convince him that formerly both the North and the South had wanted Cuba; the first for the profits of its trade, the second in order to make of it three new slave States, which “would for a time have equalized the power of the free and slaveholding States in the United States Senate. That with the reconstruction of the Union the motive of the South would necessarily revive, but it does not now, and never will again exist, provided that the independence of the Confederate States is recognized and securely established.”—These arguments of Mr. Rost were unavailing. He could gain no satisfaction from the Spanish Minister, and in conclusion gives it as his opinion that Spain “would not act separately from France and England; and that nothing was to be expected from any of them until the Northern Government is ready to treat with us as an independent Power.” Such being his view of the state of affairs, Mr. Rost suggests that it is not “consistent with the dignity of the Confederate Government to keep abroad commissioners who are under no circumstances to be received or listened to.”

The London Exhibition opened on the 1st of May. Its success thus far seems to have fallen short of what was anticipated.—The reconstruction of the navy, by sheathing vessels with heavy iron is pushed rapidly forward. Three-deckers are being cut down to batteries, with turrets for the guns, according to the plans of Captain Coles. Immense ships like the Warrior seem to be tacitly acknowledged to be an expensive failure.—Meanwhile the Defense Commission, while recognizing the importance of iron-cased ships and batteries, have unanimously reported that fortifications must continue to form an essential feature of the defenses of the country.—For a general resumé of the affairs of Italy and other parts of Europe, we refer to the Editor’s Foreign Bureau, on subsequent pages of this Magazine.

North America. By ANTHONY TROLLOPE. Mr. Trollope needs no introduction to the American public. One of the half-dozen clever living novelists, he has shown the possession of the power of keen perception of character; a traveler for years over all those parts of the world sufficiently civilized to be covered by the net-work of the British Post-office, he has got rid of the thoroughly insular prejudice which measures every thing by its conformity to or disagreement with English habits and manners. To be sure, he thinks an Englishman of middle age, sound digestion, comfortable income, and fair position—like himself—the luckiest and best man on earth. But as all men can not have all these blessings, he is quite ready to see what else the world has to offer to them. So when he proposed to write a book on the United States, it would have been quite safe to prophesy that it would have been a good one. Now that it has been written, we may pronounce it the best which has been produced by any foreigner upon us, saving always the philosophical work of De Tocqueville, which has become a classic in three languages. He visited us, and tells plainly what he thought of us. New York, for instance, he rather dislikes: there is nothing to see, and no means of seeing it. There are no Hansom cabs, but an abundance of street cars and omnibuses, which are apt to be overcrowded by a species of the softer sex, whom he describes as spicily and spitefully as his mother could have done, who wrote the famous book which, thirty years ago, made us all so angry. The worst of it is that his picture is a true one. We all know the woman who comes flaunting into the cars, swinging her crinoline, accepting every courtesy as though it were a covert insult; we know her in the streets, sweeping along as though the world owed her a vast debt for exhibiting her wardrobe to the public eye; we know her and her daughter at the hotel table, with her fantastic wriggle. If we see her, and are annoyed by her constant presence, how much more must this be the case with the foreigner, who meets her every where, while it is only by chance that he encounters the true American woman! We ought to be greatly obliged to Mr. Trollope, who faithfully daguerreotypes the species. New York, as we have said, does not greatly please Mr. Trollope, though he is warm in his praises of our philanthropic institutions, and especially of our public schools. Boston pleases him far more, and in praise of this city he breaks out into rather un-English enthusiasm. For the Western man he has a hearty love. He is a man, living manlike, and conscious of his manhood. It is quite noticeable throughout his book that wherever a comparison is introduced between the condition of the people of America and those of England, it is in nine cases out of ten wholly in our favor. The Hiberno-American is far superior to his cousins at home; the factory-girl at Lowell hardly belongs to the same race with the female operative at Manchester; the pupil at a New York free-school is a different person, and altogether better and better off than one in London. In a word, Mr. Trollope asserts that, leaving out of view the lucky one in ten to whom fortune and his parents have been bountiful, "nine-tenths of the people would have had a better life as Americans than they can have in their spheres as Englishmen." This comparison extends also to the British colonies in America. In going from the United States to Canada, he says that "an Englishman is struck by the feeling that he is going from a richer country into one that is poorer, and from a greater country into one that is less."

Writing primarily for the English public, Mr. Trollope enters somewhat largely into the question of the present war, discussing at length questions which we consider settled, and sometimes advancing views which our larger knowledge warrants us in pronouncing erroneous. We can not quarrel with him, as an Englishman, for believing that the British Government has acted in a wholly friendly manner toward the United States in the matter of the Great Rebellion; nor can we ask him to appreciate the justice of the intense feeling of hostility toward England which will surely govern our policy hereafter. Nor can we blame the somewhat superficial view which he takes of the bearings of the question of Secession. To him the close-knit American Union is nothing more than the loosely-constructed British Empire. Great Britain was better and better off for the separation from the American colonies, and may likely be the gainer from being separated politically from Canada and Australia: therefore, he argues that the republic of the North will gain rather than lose by the South cutting loose. Neither can we indorse his views as to the means by which the insurrection might have been avoided, or the characters of some of the men who have borne a part in it. Mr. Buchanan, for instance, he regards as a deliberate traitor; while we look upon him as merely a weak man anxious only to have the great struggle come after his time. We can hardly wonder that Mr. Trollope, writing some months ago, concludes that a dissolution of the Union is inevitable; that the Gulf States, at least, will form a separate Confederacy. But we commend to the careful consideration of Southern readers—some thousands of whom will, thanks to the opening of the ports, be able to learn something of the world outside—the picture which he draws of the future of the Southern Confederacy. It will be, he thinks, a low and debased nation; or, more likely, many low and debased nations, standing in the world something higher than Mexico or the Republics of Southern America; with wasted wealth and ruined industry; with no material for future greatness on which to found itself or to flourish.—For ourselves, we trust that a happier fate awaits the South. In any case we commend Mr. Trollope's book to the perusal of the American people. If we can not wholly agree with some of its political speculations, we can do justice to its sharp sketches of life and character, and recognize the tone of thorough honesty which pervades it. We may profit by its censures; and if we could persuade ourselves that the whole of its praise was our due we should deserve to stand high in our own estimation. (Published by Harper and Brothers.)

Sketches of the Rise, Progress, and Decline of Secession, by W. G. BROWNLOW. (George W. Childs.) If a man was ever thoroughly in earnest, that man is "Parson Brownlow." He has written a book, the title of which would lead one who knew nothing of the man to expect a didactic essay. Nothing further than this can be conceived from the real purport of the fiery Parson. Secession to him is no abstraction: it is a veritable monster, which he knows as a living thing; which he has fought, from which he and his have suffered. We must know, too, who he is, what he has done, and how he came to do it. He, "Parson Brownlow," was born in Virginia in 1805. Left an orphan, he was apprenticed to a carpenter, and mastered the trade. Then he thought that his vocation was something other than building houses, so he went to school, learned what he might, and entered the Methodist traveling ministry. The Parson is determined that we shall know him. With amusing naïveté he tells us all about himself: he is six feet high, has weighed 175 pounds; has a capital constitution, never smoked a cigar or chewed tobacco; never drank a dram of liquor except when prescribed as a medicine; never swore an oath; never played a game at cards; or courted a woman but one, whom he married. "I have had," he goes on to say, "as strong a voice as any man in East Tennessee, where I have resided for the last thirty years, and have a family of seven children. I have been speaking all the time; and for the last twenty-five years I have edited and published a Whig newspaper having a larger circulation than any political paper in the State, and even larger than all the papers in East Tennessee put together. I have taken part in all the religious and political controversies of my day and time." Such is the Parson himself—a most notable man in many respects; and his history ought to have furnished the materials for a much better book than he has given. Perhaps the most notable portions are his replies to sundry persons who wrote to him criticising his course and offering various suggestions. Thus one Mr. Jordan Clark, of Camden, Arkansas, is vastly pleased to hear that Parson Brownlow has made up his mind to join the Democratic party. The Parson assures him in reply he will never do this "So long as there are sects in churches, weeds in gardens, fleas in hog-pens, dirt in victuals, disputes in families, wars with nations, water in the ocean, bad men in America, or base women in France"—a very emphatic way of saying never, which one would suppose quite sufficient; but Mr. Brownlow goes on to heap up impossibilities: "When I join the Democracy the Pope of Rome will join the Methodist Church. When Jordan Clark, of Arkansas, is President of the Republic of Great Britain, by the universal suffrage of a contented people; when Queen Victoria consents to be divorced from Prince Albert by a county court in Kansas; when Congress obliges by law James Buchanan to marry a European princess; when good men cease to go to heaven and bad men to hell," etc., etc., "then will I change my political faith, and come out on the side of Democracy." We submit that this may pass for very smart writing for a newspaper; but it is hardly worth reproducing in a book. The opponents of Mr. Brownlow are characterized with much more force than elegance. A newspaper in Knoxville is "edited by a scoundrel, debauchee, and coward, selected by more unprincipled men than himself, because of his adaptation to the dirty work he is employed to do."—The story of the sufferings of Mr. Brownlow and the other Union men in Tennessee is one of deep interest. We can almost pardon the fierce manner in which it is told. There is, moreover, a spice of grim humor here and there; as, for example, in the closing paragraph of a letter written from Knoxville Jail to the Hon. J. P. Benjamin, Secretary of War at Richmond, Mr. Brownlow says: "You are reported to have said to a gentleman in Richmond that I am a bad man, dangerous to the Confederacy, and that you desire me out of it. Just give me my passports, and I will do for your Confederacy more than the Devil has ever done—I will quit the country." While we honor the indomitable courage of Mr. Brownlow, and acknowledge a high respect for him, we can not help wishing that his book had been more connected in manner; and, above all, that the tone of bitter feeling which runs through it had been softened down. He himself appears, on a review of his printed pages, to have suspected as much, for he says, in conclusion: "I have spoken plainly, vehemently—perhaps bitterly: but I could not do otherwise in so dear a concernment as my country's good. I feel that I may appropriate the prophet's language: the 'word was in mine heart as a burning fire shut up in my bones; I was weary with forbearing, and could not stay.' . . . God grant that the people may now raise their eyes and lift their hands to the eternal and propitious Throne, in fervent supplication that the Father of Mercies will compose the distraction of our suffering land, and eclipse the splendor of our annals in the past by the future renown, for ages to come, of the Re-United States."

Olive Blake's Good Work, by J. CORDY JEAFFRESON, is the latest addition (No. 188) to "Harper's Library of Select Novels." Olive Blake is the wealthy daughter of a London banker, of the great house of Petersham and Blake. She has married, at the desire of her father, whose ambition is that the "House" shall be perpetuated, the son of his partner. She finds out in time that she is not the legal wife of her husband, for he had previously run away with the beautiful daughter of a country clergyman; and her "Good Work" consists in her determined effort to restore the good name of this woman by discovering legal evidence that she was duly married to Mr. Petersham. The story is told in succession by three of the persons who bear prominent parts in it; and these separate narratives are dovetailed into each other in a manner which will compare not unfavorably with the admirably constructed tales of Mr. Wilkie Collins.

Christian Worship: Services for the Church; with Order of Vespers and Hymns. The initials ("S. O." and "F. A. F.") appended to the admirably-written preface, indicate that this volume is the joint production of two of the most esteemed clergymen of the Unitarian denomination, and that it is specially designed for the use of that order. Its object is to "give a regular morning and evening service which shall duly combine freedom and order, or the variety which is the spice with the constancy which is the bread of life, and save us from the monotony of a wholly set ritual and the distraction of a wholly variable choice." While the volume is designed especially for the service of a particular Church, it is in nowise dogmatic or controversial. The time-hallowed treasures of ancient devotion have been freely used, but with the chants and prayers of former ages are intermingled the stirring lyrics which have sprung from the religious life of the new time. The collection of hymns is made up of the choicest examples of sacred lyrics, new and old. One of these, by William Cullen Bryant, "Lord, who ordainest for mankind," will, we trust, find its way from this volume into all future collections of poetry for public worship. (Published by James Miller.)

Children's Picture Book of the Sagacity of Animals. (Harper and Brothers.) This volume, with its sixty illustrations by HARRISON WIER, is one which will be a favorite with all children, whether of larger or smaller growth. Dogs and horses, elephants and lions, monkeys and cats, eagles and parrots, birds and beasts of all kinds, contribute their share of entertainment and instruction. It is a capital book, in spirit, design, execution, and illustration.

MR. GEORGE ADLARD's monogram upon the Sutton-Dudleys of England and the Dudleys of Massachusetts is an excellent specimen of a kind of work which it is to be desired might be more frequently undertaken by gentlemen of means and leisure. Such minute genealogical and biographical researches not unfrequently throw much light upon general history, and are gladly welcomed by students. Mr. Adlard has brought to light some curious documents, among which is Cotton Mather's "More Particular Account of the Life of Mr. Thomas Dudley, several times Governor of Massachusetts Colony in New England." Editor's Table.

VICTORY.—Life itself is, and always has been, a battle; and every battle must end in victory or defeat. Down deep in the strata of the earth, as well as upon its surface, we find the marks of the great conflicts that have always been waging; and the little polyp of the primary geological age began that struggle for life with the elements of nature or with hostile tribes of animated being which Man, the lord of creation, is now continuing on a scale of destructiveness commensurate with his exalted powers. He impresses into his military service all elements and forces beneath him, and tries to win to his side the merciful ear and the almighty arm of Heaven. His weapons are forged from the mine, and his projectiles are hurled by explosive substances that are dug from the earth; so that he summons almost hell itself to be his ally against his foes. Gold supplies the men and munitions, and fire and water lend the speed, and iron makes the arms that are now deciding who are to be masters of the globe; and just at this time our own hitherto peaceful continent, and even our own peace-loving country, is the main arena of struggle. We are all compelled, in spite of ourselves, to confess that war is one of the necessities of civil society; or, at least, as long as man is man, and not an angel of God, there will be times in which nations must assert their independence by the strong arm or else cease to exist.

Nor is the struggle confined by any means to warfare. Every department of business is a field of intense competition; and if we could only hear the cries of the wounded and the shouts of the victors in the great fight for fortune or fame, our ears would be stunned by the din or pierced by the shrieks. Every day, nay, every hour, some field is lost or won within our sight; and this great mart of traffic is a Waterloo whose strife can never cease. Not only do individuals strive with each other, but streets and neighborhoods have their feuds; and any one who watches the course of business or society will see at once that a constant contest is going on as to which quarter shall win the purse in trade or wear the feather in fashion. An observing man might write a most instructive history of the war of sections and neighborhoods in our great city, and trace the rise or wreck of private fortunes to the issue of strifes for the supremacy. Every line of business, too, has its conflicts, and that same struggle between the central power and sectional privileges which makes up so much of the history of nations goes on in every branch of traffic; and certain great corporations or leading firms are constantly accused of threatening to swallow up or at least to domineer over the smaller establishments. In fact, nothing seems to be wholly at peace; and the holy Church itself not only rings with the war-cries of polemic theology, but is obliged to fight for its very standing-places with the world of business; and many a lofty spire in this metropolis has already been compelled to bow its head to the victorious forces of the bank and the warehouse, and remove the head-quarters of Faith to make room for the inexorable staff of Mammon and his advancing legions.

Perhaps it is this very fact, that the whole life is such a struggle, that leads us to take so intense an interest in war, and hang our hearts as well as our fortunes upon the issue of battles. If war were wholly unlike our usual life it would be far less exciting, and too foreign from our feelings and habits to command our thought. It would not come home to us as it does were it not that it is a mirror of our own life, and like an eventful drama it holds before us what we are all going through. The combatants bring into clearer consciousness the militant powers of our own nature; and as we watch Murat's charge or Nelson's broadside we too are in the strife, and are quite sure that there is something of the soldier and the sailor under our peaceful broadcloth. So, too, we read anew in the struggle the crisis of our own life, and the strife before us in the page of history brings into clearer interpretation the conflict that we are always waging, more or less earnestly, with stubborn circumstances or unkind man. One cause, undoubtedly, of the intense interest felt in battles lies in the openness and immediate decisiveness of the result. Our own life-struggles may drag on for years, and never come to a decided point; but when two great armies meet one or the other must conquer, and very speedily too. So that never in the course of human affairs do such immense interests turn upon the events of a day as in the noted pitched battles that decide the fate of so many thousand men, and often control the future of nations for ages. Not only is the total issue thus significant in its decisiveness, but its significance generally appears in some signal point of the conflict; and what the charmed hero does at the momentous hour holds all beholders breathless with its august consequence, and thrills all future readers by its valor or presence of mind. In nothing under the sun do so many and so momentous elements combine in a single point as in a great victory. It is as if the life of the two armies—nay, of the whole conflicting nations—met together in two metallic points, as in the wires of a galvanic battery, and that one flash decides upon which side fortune and the future are to dwell.

Yet, with all the flaming rhetoric of battle and the romantic fascination of warfare, there is no subject that more calls for and rewards the closest study and reasoning. The Science of War is one of the most exact order of the sciences, and there is no business capable of being carried on more strictly with the help of pure mathematics than that of the military engineer. The construction of a fortification and the range of a projectile are matters of the severest calculation; and strength and valor, without science, could not hold their ground for a day against a skillful enemy—and the engineer is as essential as the sutler to the very existence of an army. In order to lay his plans wisely, and to take such measures as shall meet not only the present hour but control future results, the strategist must be something of a statesman as well as a general, and his battles must be great acts of policy as well as of valor and generalship. He must make large account of the elements of time and character in his combinations and movements, and—to say nothing of the claims of humanity, but speaking only the language of military science—we call him a blunderer, and little less than a murderer, who exposes his own men or even slaughters the enemy in a battle that has no decisive consequence and wins no lasting good. Perhaps it is too much, however, to ask any man to judge of all the results of a campaign, or even of a victory; and it needs the calm and far-seeing eye of the historian to tell what consequences hang often upon a single conflict. Borrowing the historian's light, we may give our thoughts a profitable turn by considering, as well as we are able, the true standard by which to measure victories in general, and the victories which we as a nation have gained or hope to gain in particular.

We must not refuse to value duly the most obvious standard of measurement, because it is so often overestimated—we mean the number of men and the amount of munitions of war that depend upon the victory. It is a great thing to defeat fifty or a hundred thousand men, and take their arms and material. When the struggle is at first uncertain, from equality of numbers and means, a moderate victory on our part becomes of immense importance, by taking away a portion of the enemy's strength and adding it to our own; so that they who before seemed about equally matched are no longer so either in numbers, means, or spirit. The enemy's loss must be doubled in order to be duly estimated, so far as available munitions are concerned. Thus if both parties carry into the field fifty cannon, and we capture twenty from the enemy, our gain is far more than the number twenty at first signifies, and the ratio changes from fifty and fifty to seventy and thirty. When the more commanding muniments of warfare are taken—such as cannon of the most improved construction, or fortifications that are the keys of great territories—the victory is far more decisive; and sometimes a whole campaign may hang upon the capture of a battery, or a whole war may be decided before a single fort.

In measuring the extent of a victory, our advanced civilization thinks far less of the number of men slain or captured in battle, and counts mainly upon the value of the position won. The fight turns between skillful generals upon the possession of the keys of the domain—either of the strong-holds that command the territory, or of the seats of government that represent the honor of the nation. The slaughter of men is in itself to be regarded as an evil; and he is no general, but a coarse butcher, who gains his point by the loss of a thousand lives when, with patience and skill, his victory might have been wholly or nearly bloodless. Upon the same principle, almost any amount of sacrifice is justifiable when the whole future of a nation depends upon a single struggle; and wherever a pass like Thermopylæ can be defended against a host of virtual barbarians, like the Persians under Xerxes, it is not only high heroism, but military prudence, in any Leonidas to risk his own life and that of all his Spartans to save the land and civilization of Greece from being overrun by the barbaric horde. In the wars of the present and future it is clear that the results of victory will be measured more by consequences than by numbers, and the effort will look more and more toward mastering the keys of the situation. The campaign of the Crimea was a signal illustration of this fact, and the three most powerful nations of Christendom, instead of trying to overrun the whole of the territories at stake, confined the war virtually to a single point, knowing that the issue there must be decisive of the whole struggle; and that if Russia could not hold Sebastopol, it was idle to think of her seizing Constantinople. If the war on the part of the Allied Powers had been in order to make aggressions upon Russia, instead of resisting her aggressions upon the balance of power in Europe, the policy would have been very different, and at all available points the domain of the Czar would have been threatened or overrun, and the victory at the Crimea would have been not the end, but the beginning of the strife.

In our present war for the defense of our national life our course is not so easy, and we but began our work when we defended our capital from invasion. Our citadels are in the territory of those who have made themselves our enemies, and self-defense must needs appear to take the form of aggression. Still the question presents itself, and is most earnestly asked—How shall the ends of victory be won by the least sacrifice, not only on our part, but on the part of our enemies? and evidently the whole question of future power is to be settled by deciding the mastery of a few strong-holds or commanding positions. Savage warfare would begin by indiscriminate massacre, and the ravages of fire and sword would start at our frontier and go on with the advance of our armies; but not only our humane feeling but our military usage stigmatizes as murder every assault upon life that is not called for by military necessity, and each armed enemy is tenderly cared for the moment he ceases to be dangerous by ceasing to be a combatant. When viewed thus, in relation to the importance of a few strong-holds or commanding positions, our national victories have a momentous significance. The defense of our capital, the capture of the great forts on the Tennessee, Cumberland, Ohio, and Mississippi rivers, and on the sea-coast, have consequences immensely beyond all estimates of life lost, or wounds inflicted, or arms taken. No victories in modern times and in civilized countries have so much importance as commanding such vast domains. The armies in the field are indeed vast; yet, thus far, their effect has been more demonstrative than destructive, and the whole loss of life, thus far, has not equaled that in any one of Napoleon's great battles in Europe. The reason undoubtedly why we have lost so little life is in the fact that we had so many lives to lose; and the half million of men who rose at the call of the nation have served quite as much as a peace establishment as a war establishment, and have kept an imperious enemy from invading our soil and shedding our blood. The magnitude of our army gives extent and permanence to the victories already won, and every life that has been lost in the frontier struggle has won for us a tenfold good from the assurance given to the enemy that the ground won will be kept by the thousand men who stand ready when called to take the place of the one slain in battle. So then, viewed in respect to the magnitude of its consequences, our great armament conquers when it least sheds blood, and gives manifold power to every blow struck in the face of the enemy. It gives moral prestige, too, to military conquest, by being unequivocal proof that we are a powerful nation, and have a patriotism that is willing to meet the dangers and costs of war, because it is determined to secure the blessings and powers of peace.

We will not attempt to make an estimate of the amount of material results that depend upon the victory of our national arms in this war for self-preservation, for our arithmetic and our rhetoric both alike would fail us in the effort. It is clear, however, that the destiny of a whole continent and of the wealth and welfare of thirty and perhaps a hundred millions of people depend upon the issue of the contest. The nation as a nation, under its Constitution and laws, and with its historic and associate and continuous life, virtually ceases to exist if defeated, and little more than the inglorious memory of lost greatness would be our heritage if we tamely consented to the surrender of our capital and the sundering of the tie that binds the members to the head or the States to the Government. Not only our Government would be destroyed by the loss of its constituent obligation, but the land itself would be mutilated as well as curtailed by division. What would be left to us of the territory would be like an amputated limb or a severed artery, and the very completeness of our present domain would aggravate the mischiefs of its mutilation. To have the upper part of the Mississippi without the lower, or to possess the Susquehanna River without commanding Chesapeake Bay, would be owning the right of Tantalus to the goods that he can see and feel but not taste, and would be exaggerating the fact of poverty by the show of opulence.

When we come to the moral results of national victory, or the quality of our trophies, the issue appears still more momentous; for with governments, as with individuals, character is the most important part of capital, as man is greater than circumstance. It can not be denied that victory itself is essential to our keeping our character as a nation, and if we fail to suppress the present insurrection we lose our caste as well as our cash, and our spirit as well as our reputation falls. It by no means follows that defeat is always degradation, for greatness itself has its misfortunes, and nations of undoubted valor have sometimes been compelled to yield to superior strength. But in our case defeat is degradation, because it implies that we do not care enough about our country to defend it, and the humiliation of being conquered must combine the mortification of cowardice with the bitterness of misfortune. There is, indeed, in all defeat a great trial of self-respect, and he is a true hero who can hold up his head as proudly before as after the battle has gone against him. His enemies, however, acquiesce in his judgment if it is clear that he has done his best in face of great odds, and not valor but fortune has failed him. But we can have no such solace if we fail, and we shall have and deserve the contempt of the civilized world for surrendering our nationality to inferior numbers, intelligence, and worth. Our enemies would not be likely to comfort us in our humiliation by any peculiar tenderness or magnanimity. The insurgents are worshipers of power, and their insurrection has sprung more from anger at the check put upon their domineering will than from serious conviction that wrong has been done to their constitutional rights. If they get the better of us we shall never hear the last of it, and we must be content to sit down under the perpetual shower of contumely or be stung to some future warfare to avenge the intolerable insult of the former defeat. We pity the coarse pugilist who allows himself to be hammered into a mass of jelly in the determination to prove that he is the better man than his antagonist; yet he has some justification for his feeling in our frail human nature, and he who is once fairly whipped can hardly help having the feeling of being whipped as long as he lives. With the pugilist the defeat implies mainly inferiority of muscle and skill in boxing; but with us, in the present contest, defeat would put the taint of inferiority upon our whole character and civilization. Our civilization, whose corner-stone is liberty, would bow the knee to a virtual despotism, whose corner-stone is bondage; and we not only degrade ourselves, but are false to the sacred rights of man and progressive order of society, which are confided to our care by the Providence of God and the august leaders of the human race.

In estimating the moral value of a victory over men we go astray unless we take into account the character and condition of the men who are conquered, and the use made of the victory by the conquerors. Mere victory of itself has no moral quality when it implies merely superior physical force without any positive moral aims, and a nation degrades itself by invading a weaker community merely to enslave, or rob, or debauch its people. Thus the moral worth of the conquest of Algiers by France, or of India by Great Britain, must depend chiefly upon the degree to which the natives of those countries are made to partake of the civilization of the victors; for the conquest of itself, under circumstances of such positive superiority in arts and arms, gives little glory. In fact, we are compelled to affirm as a sober political truth the high principle of religion that commands us to overcome evil with good, and therefore bids us measure the worth of a victory by the amount of positive good that the victor does to the vanquished. It was thus that the Gospel won its great triumphs, and exalted all whom it subdued to its cross. With all their worldly ambition, we can not deny that the great monarchs of Christendom have done a great deal to civilize, and refine, and elevate the barbaric nations whom they have subdued; and Christian institutions, with their peaceful temper and spiritual powers, have followed in the wake of the army, and healed the wounds made by the sword with the unction of the Gospel. In our present warfare we are imperatively bound by this law of charity, and the dignity of our conquest depends mainly upon the amount and kind of good that we mean to do to our enemies. We must overcome them with good by urging upon them a good Government, firm and free in its policy, and friendly to all the liberty, intelligence, industry, virtue, and religion that constitute the best welfare of a people. Instead of regarding this view of our duty as at all Quixotic, we look upon it as eminently practical—in fact, as the dictate of the most obvious policy as well as of the best principle. Whether we regard the nation's victory either as acting upon character or upon institutions, we can not but regard it as in the end a blessing to the whole people.

Consider first the influence of our victory upon character, and note its power in shaping the mind and purpose of the nation at large. Evidently, if we yield the national life to the baleful assaults of secession, we cease to be a people, and have no national character. If we vindicate the national life, we vindicate it for all who now or hereafter may take its name and enjoy its protection. We do as much by this second rising of the people to confirm our nationality as the first rising in the War of Independence did to establish it, so that if the first war was our baptism, and gave us our name, this second war is our confirmation, and proves that we can maintain and make good our name. In the first case we were pressed together by the force of a foreign foe, and in the second case we hold together in opposition to internal sedition, and thus doing we perform a sterner duty and submit to a more thoroughgoing civil discipline than when we rushed to arms in common passion and policy against foreign oppression. Vindicating thus a second time the American name, we vindicate it for all Americans; and the day is not far distant when they who are now in arms against us will be proud of professing and bequeathing to their children the very name which they have done so much and so vainly to disparage and destroy. The national name, confirmed by victory over the insurrection, will carry with it a national idea, and purpose, and association, and will be a living power as well as a thrilling word.

It is not easy to define precisely what this power is, for it is felt more easily than defined, and every time we look upon the dear old Stars and Stripes after we have won any success over sedition, there is something that thrills our pulses and mounts to our head that tells more what our nationality means than any learned disquisitions upon the value of the Union or the authority of the Constitution. It shows that nationality is a life, not a mere opinion; and that, like all life, it is an essence, and not a composition—a soul in our body, and not a fermentation in a heap of miscellanies. The nation, as such, must have a mind of its own, and can speak it to the world with a voice of authority when vindicated by valor; and can speak it not only in courts and camps and fleets, but in markets and journals and poetry and orations, in senates, schools, and pulpits, as never before. The nation, too, thus has a will of its own—a majestic public will, that not merely makes itself heard in treaties and manifestoes, but which passes into the common life of the people, and makes every man and woman, boy and girl, strong by union with the great organic life that dwells within the whole body politic, and makes the peace of the whole body the strength of each member. This national mind and will must form a mighty public spirit, as full of comfort as of might, and sometimes, in its most sacred and humane offices, rising into the dignity of that religious fellowship which enjoys the breath of God's own spirit. We are already feeling something of this regeneration of national life, and we are to feel it still more as the great heart of the people beats more deeply and calmly with the glow of patriotism, and ceases to be distracted with the passions and anxieties of war.

Now how can such national life be secured without being the blessing of the whole nation, and what man is so churlish as to wish to shut any loyal citizen out of its privilege? It is impossible even now to limit its worth or validity within any territorial lines, and there are men in Nashville and in New Orleans, nay, even in demented Charleston, who are proud of our national name; and as the secession power is gradually hemmed in and trampled under foot, even those who repent at the eleventh hour of their sin may be none the less earnest to enter the vineyard and resume the name that is worth more than silver and gold, whether in one penny or in many pounds. Allow, indeed, that for a time a taint will rest upon all the districts that have been infected with the virus of treason, that very fact may make their people more eager to purify themselves by putting away all malignant characters, and giving solid proof of loyalty. How summarily all malignants are dealt with who may persist after our positive victory in embroiling the country in feuds we do not care, and the sooner the rope is about their necks the better for their neighbors and the whole world. But surely nothing but madness itself can persist in feeding the sources of treason by cutting off any sections who wish to be loyal to the Government from the rights and duties of citizenship. We have no fear that any such policy of subjugation will be adopted as will perpetuate secession by such concision. In the very nature of things, with the triumph of the Government the universality of its citizenship will be secured; and rapidly increasing numbers, by migration, civil appointment, and otherwise, in places of power and wealth in the States that have been most misguided, will overpower the sectional temper by the national spirit, and the weak or erratic members will be animated anew with the glow of healthy public life.

We know very well where the hardest pinch is, and that the difference in modes of industry compels a certain difference of views and feelings, that tend to make geographical lines lines of civil animosity, and threaten to make the triumph of the national Government the ruin, if not the annihilation, of great local interests. But what is more clear than that the triumph of the nation, with its industry, intelligence, and liberty, must be in the end the triumph of the whole people, and the means of universal prosperity? Take for example the power of free labor and unfettered enterprise: are not the Southern people already accepting the very Northern principles which they have professed so to dread? and in their tremendous efforts to cut themselves away from the Union are they not striking harder blows at their own pride of caste, and doing more to elevate mechanical ingenuity and intelligent labor than had ever been done by the fiercest advocates of emancipation? It is beyond all question that the full establishment of the authority of the nation over the districts will tend to carry every where the progressive elements of the national life, and South as well as North and West will see as never before the evolution of the ideas and powers that have given us heretofore our name as a people. The laboring class, both black and white, must have education and motive as never before, and not only produce, but consume, more than ever, and thus not only enlarge the products of the soil, but increase and improve the manufactures and traffic of the whole country. It is a miserable sophism in political economy that regards the cheapest labor and the most degraded laborer as the most profitable. He works best for his master who puts mind into his work, and he best uses his wages who not only fills his master's purse and his own belly, but creates a demand for good food, furniture, and manufactures, and so helps civilize society and educate industry while he tills the soil.

In this country there can be no fear of our long degrading any one section of our country by the triumph of the national arms, so far as the white race are concerned; for the facilities of communication, the interchanges of residence, the ties of business and blood and affinity are such as very soon to break down any sectional barriers, so long as commerce is free and communication is open. The negro race is the great stumbling-block in the way of the nation, and it is to many a most perplexing question how we are to meet it in the day of our victory, without either abandoning our principles of freedom or sacrificing our interests and pride by rash emancipation and degrading equality. The nearer we come to the issue the clearer it is that this problem is solving itself; and all we have to do is to wait the decrees of God's Providence. The National Government is responsible for the negro only so far as he is under its constitutional authority, and the Proclamation of our President that offers aid to States desirous to secure to themselves the removal of slavery affirms the limit, while it accepts the fact of responsibility. By aid of the Government, and also by the inevitable action of our armies in the Slave States, it is clear that this war will not leave slavery where it found it; and henceforth freedom is to be national, and whatever is not free is to be local, not national. But why fear that the freedom of the white race is to be endangered or lost by any amelioration of the negro's lot? If the negro is really the white man's equal, both gain by the fullest and freest competition and alliance. If, on the other hand, as our people generally seem to believe, the negro is inferior to the white man in constitutional perfection, and especially in the higher forms of intellectual power, and must always hold a comparatively subordinate position, no change of national policy can alter the nature of things, and make white to be black or black to be white. The negro is among us at the North wholly free, yet he is left to find his own level, and we are not forced, and do not mean to be forced, to associate with him as an equal, when he is not such by constitution, taste, or culture. Liberty is lost at once the very moment that we deny the right of men to associate together according to their elective affinities, and the convictions of the nation are most emphatically committed to this liberty, and our soldiers as they advance Southward show not the first signs of any disposition to adopt or enforce any sentimental notions of identity of relation between races that God has so obviously separated. The very thought of amalgamation is nauseous to our people at large; and our national victory, instead of bringing it on tends rather to keep it off, by securing the preponderance of Northern ideas over Southern manners. The law of liberty, indeed, is that the career should be open to all talent, and association should be left free to the play of elective affinities. If this law is thought to subject the white race to the black, he who thinks so already confesses the subjection begun, and betrays his cause in the very effort to advocate it?

In one respect our national victory will assist the South in dealing with its terrible burden, by making the whole nation see, as never before, how heavily it rests upon all, and, whether bond or free, the negro is virtually intrusted to us all. Hasty and violent emancipation would flood us with a tide of vagrancy and pauperism, or make of the South a barbaric wilderness that we could hardly call our own. Evidently the whole nation must seriously consider the status of the negro; and the nation is no more willing than the South to ruin itself by any precipitate philanthropy that might aggravate the ill which it would cure. The nation will be cautious and conservative, as well as liberal and humane; and ere long the true principle and policy will be developed that shall secure to the negro his just amount of liberty and privilege without tempting him to license and indolence. Positive victory will be more merciful to the master than continued warfare, and they who now justly may forfeit all right of property as the penalty of treason, may find in the nation a protector as soon as allegiance is certain and peace secure.

So far as the mind of the revolted States is concerned, we do not despair of winning them to reason, so many seem to do. A sound drubbing will do them good in many ways, but chiefly by convincing their leaders of the hopelessness of their struggle, and moving them to use their great influence in procuring the best terms of pacification. We do not believe that, if our troops conquer the great armies of the insurgents, the insurrection will long go on in guerrilla raids; for the war did not begin with the people but with the leaders, and as it began so it will be likely to end. The rebellion is madness of the most monstrous kind, but there is method in the madness; and the method can work both ways, and calm as well as raise the tempest. The conspirators, with all their insane passion for power, have ever held forth a certain doctrine of State rights, and thus have not wholly cut themselves off from the appeals of conscience and the laws of nations. A sound drubbing may open their eyes to another kind of right, or at least compel them to make a virtue of necessity, and look out for some ground of principle on which to legitimate the surrender which must soon be made to the National Government of the unlimited sovereignty of the States. There need be little fear that when victory is sure to our arms the contest will be prolonged on our part by unwarranted aggression. We have pens as well as swords, and our enemies are even more keen in council than brave in battle. Undisputed victory will at once open the arena of negotiation, where the best minds of the whole country will meet, and not in vain; and the solid advantages of the contest will be secured to the nation without needless harshness or degrading oppression. We as yet do not hate the rebels with personal malignity, and victory will not be likely to make us hate them more. They seem to hate us pretty soundly, but may be a little calmed and sweetened in temper by being convinced beyond all question that they are thoroughly beaten, and their only dignity as well as safety hereafter consists in being loyal sections of a great nation, instead of centres of a presumptuous usurpation.

How near we are to the decisive victory of our national arms we can not say, and perhaps no contemporary judgment of the consequences of a great battle can be final. It is somewhat comforting, however, to run our eye over the sad catalogue of wars and see that, instead of being interminable, they have their decisive crises, and some nine or ten battles have settled the future of modern nations. Thus, at Hastings, in 1066, it was decided that the Norman should master the Saxon, and with him build up the great edifice of English greatness. So too at Orleans, in 1429, it was settled that England should not swallow up France, nor tread upon her as a vassal instead of being animated by her as a rival. In 1588 the pride of the whole Papal empire as well as of the Spanish crown was broken in the defeat of the great Armada, and Protestantism kept its place in the front of the nations. At Blenheim, in 1704, the imperialism of Louis XIV. met its final check, and English liberty vindicated itself against French centralization. At Lützen, under Gustavus Adolphus, in 1632, or at Prague, under Königsmark, in 1648, the aggressions of Papal Austria were checked, and the peace of Westphalia was secured after the Thirty Years' War. At Pultowa, in 1709, Russia conquered from Sweden her place as the great power of the North. At Saratoga, in 1777, or at Yorktown, in 1781, our America struck the blow that secured her independence. Soon after, at Valmy, in 1792, the French people proved their power to sustain themselves against the old aristocracies of Europe, and the nation of the French was born, for a while to be democratic; and afterward, with less change of principle than of name, to be imperial. In 1815 Waterloo gave the quietus to the schemes of the first Napoleon, and perhaps gave the sting that may provoke the vengeance of France against England under the third Napoleon. Within ten years great battles have occurred that may claim a first-class place in history; but the issue of the Crimea and of Solferino has less significance than that now to be decided in this great republic. If we lose, we not only are ruined ourselves, but the cause of republican government itself is lost. If we gain, our victory is not only our own, but that of civilization and liberty, intelligence, industry, humanity, and religion. It is wrong to speak with any doubt of the issue. The nation has virtually conquered. Our flag now floats in every one of the revolted sections, and soon the final blow must be struck at secession which will trample the foul treason under foot, whence it will never dare to lift its arm against the national life. What is true up to the limit must be true within the limit; and if the nation, unwarmed and unprepared, has been able to overcome disunion in its best estate, and backed up with such aids from home conspirators and foreign abettors, what will the nation do when its integrity is restored, its power consolidated, its army and navy perfected, its loyalty sacred in its traditions and in its faith, and its flag the symbol of its twofold triumph over foreign oppression and domestic treason?

THE name of Henry Thoreau is known to very few persons beyond those who personally knew him; but it will be known long and well in our literature, and can not fade from the memories of all who ever saw him. He was a plain New England man, who sighed neither for old England nor for Greece and Rome. In the woods and pastures of a region in no way remarkable for its natural beauty or for cultivation he found all the company he cared for, and believed that the birds and beasts and flowers he knew were certainly as good, and the men and women perhaps even better, than he could have found in any other place at any other time.

The story of his life is perfectly simple. He had an aptitude for study, graduated at Cambridge, returned to his home in Concord, Massachusetts, and worked as a land-surveyor, while he studied as his inclinations led; built a shanty or cottage by the side of a pretty pond, where he lived quite alone at an expense of about seventy dollars a year; was as faithful a student of nature as he was of Greek literature and Hindoo philosophy; was a most accurate observer, and became known to naturalists and valued by them; had a shrewd mother-wit; but upon the whole he seemed to think that civilization had gone astray; that much fine wisdom had perished with the Indians, and had not been replaced; that the Stoics were the true heroes, and the Hindoo Vedas and Norse Eddas the most interesting religious legends.

He was a man of singular rectitude, independence, and sagacity. Mr. Emerson says of him that no one was so entirely uninfluenced by the ordinary motives of human action. He wished neither riches, nor fame, nor influence. He cared to be himself only, and he held the world and modern times successfully at bay. But he was entirely unobtrusive. Once or twice only, by the urgent request of others, he spoke in public, but without especial success, for he was in no degree magnetic or impassioned, and his intellectual habit was solitary and severe. He was truly at home in the woods or on the water, and yet he was so much more than a naturalist merely, like Cotton or any of the amiable observers of birds and animals, that he is to be thought of as a naturalist only in the largest sense. He was quite as much thinker as he was observer, and he was familiar with the best literature. His chapter on Reading, in his "Walden, or Life in the Woods," is as good as any thing ever written upon the subject.

"No wonder," he says, "that Alexander carried the Iliad with him on his expeditions in a precious casket. A written word is the choicest of relics. It is something at once more intimate with us and more universal than any other work of art. It is the work of art nearest to life itself. It may be translated into every language, and not only be read, but actually breathed from all human lips—not be represented on canvas or in marble only, but be carved out of the breath of life itself. The symbol of an ancient man's thought becomes a modern man's speech. Two thousand summers have imparted to the monuments of Grecian literature, as to her marbles, only a maturer golden and autumnal tint, for they have carried their own serene and cheerful atmosphere into all lands, to protect them against the corrosion of time. Most men have learned to read to serve a paltry convenience, as they have learned to cipher in order to keep accounts, and not be cheated in trade; but of reading as a noble intellectual exercise they know little or nothing; yet this only is reading, in a high sense, not that which lulls us as a luxury, and suffers the nobler faculties to sleep the while, but what we have to stand on tip-toe to read, and devote our most alert and wakeful hours to."

This book, the record of his residence, his thoughts, and observations during the time he lived in the woods upon the shore of Walden Pond, in Concord, Massachusetts, is of the very best of its kind in any literature. He lived in his cottage about two years. For the rest of his life his home was in the village. "I found," he says, "that by working about six weeks in a year I could meet all the expenses of living. The whole of my winters, as well as most of my summers, I had free and clear for study." The cheerful humor with which he details his woodland experience is racy and delightful. "Many a traveler came out of his way to see me and the inside of my house, and, as an excuse for calling, asked for a glass of water. I told them that I drank at the pond, and pointed thither, offering to lend them a dipper." "Restless committed men, whose time was all taken up in getting a living or keeping it; ministers who spoke of God as if they enjoyed a monopoly of the subject, who could not bear all kinds of opinions; doctors, lawyers, uneasy housekeepers, who pried into my cupboard and bed when I was out—how came Mrs. — to know that my sheets were not as clean as hers?—young men who had ceased to be young, and had concluded that it was safest to follow the beaten track of the professions—all these generally said that it was not possible to do so much good in my position. Ay! there was the rub. The old and infirm and the timid, of whatever age or sex, thought most of sickness, and sudden accident, and death; to them life seemed full of danger—what danger is there if you don't think of any?—and they thought that a prudent man would carefully select the safest position, where Dr. B— might be on hand at a moment's warning. To them the village was literally a com-munit-y, a league for mutual defense; and you would suppose that they would not go a huckleberrying without a medicine-chest. The amount of it is, if a man is alive there is always danger that he may die, though the danger must be allowed to be less in proportion as he is dead-and-alive to begin with. A man sits as many risks as he runs."

Thoreau was a Stoic, but he was in no sense a cynic. His neighbors in the village thought him odd and whimsical, but his practical skill as a surveyor and in wood-craft was known to them. No man was his enemy, and some of the best men were his fastest friends. But his life was essentially solitary and reserved. Careless of appearances in later days, when his hair and beard were long, if you had seen him in the woods you might have fancied Orson passing by; but had you stopped to talk with him, you would have felt that you had seen the shepherd of Admetus's flock, or chatted with a wiser Jaques. For some time past he had been sinking under a consumption. He made a journey to the West a year ago, but in vain; and returned to die quietly at home.

It was my good fortune to see him again, last November, when he came into the library of a friend to borrow a volume of Pliny's letters. He was much wasted, and his doom was clear. But he talked in the old strain of wise gravity without either sentiment or sadness. His conversation fell upon the Indians of this country, of our obligations to them, and our ingratitude. It was by far the best talk about Indians I have ever heard or read; and somewhere among his papers, it is to be hoped, some monument of his knowledge of them and regard for them survives.

Mr. Thoreau was the neighbor and intimate friend of Mr. Emerson, who read a discourse at his funeral. "Referring to the Alpine flower Adelweiss, or nobility, which the young Switzers sometimes lose their lives in plucking from its perilous heights, he said: 'Could we pierce to where he is, we should see him wearing profuse chaplets of it, for it belonged to him.' Where there is knowledge, where there is virtue, where there is beauty, where there is progress, there is now his home." In a poem called "Woodnotes," published nearly twenty years ago, Mr. Emerson had already said what he doubtless felt of this valued and faithful friend. The lines will be new to many of our readers to whom the author is not known as a poet, although few men have written such true poetry:

"The water-courses were my guide;
I traveled grateful by their side,
Or through their channel dry;
They led me through the thicket damp,
Through brake and fern, the beavers' camp,
Through beds of granite cut my road,
And their resistless friendship showed;
The falling waters led me,
The foodful waters fed me,
And brought me to the lowest land,
Unerring to the ocean sand.
The moss upon the forest bark
Was pole-star when the night was dark;
The purple berries in the wood
Supplied me necessary food;
For Nature ever faithful is
To such as trust her faithfulness.
When the forest shall mislead me,
When the night and morning lie,
When sea and land refuse to feed me,
'Twill be time enough to die;
Then will yet my mother yield
A pillow in her greenest field,
Nor the June flowers scorn to cover
The clay of their departed lover."

OUR national anniversary recurs under circumstances more remarkable than ever before. It closes a year which has demonstrated two things: one, that in a free popular government, at its bitterest moment of party strife, patriotism is yet stronger than party; and the other, that a purely popular government is the strongest in the world. The profound wisdom of the fathers has been vindicated in a manner no man could have desired, but which is clear and final.

Let us, then, have our short Fourth of July oration, not in the Bombastes vein, but in that quiet and grave strain which the times impose.

The fundamental and essential difference between our own and all other systems of government is this, that we hold all men to have certain rights inherent in their nature which society is bound to protect, and which can be taken away only for cause; while other systems hold that society grants those rights and may revoke them at pleasure. And that is the safeguard against the tyranny of a majority, which is the deepest danger that can threaten a popular system. For by that system no majority can justly deprive any man of his natural rights, except for crime, or in case of extreme public peril to secure the public safety. Our system is the perpetual plea of right against power. It limits the exercise of power. For instance, it denies that any number of people can arbitrarily, or by their mere will, deprive any smaller number of life, which is a natural right of every man. Of course it does not deny that the greater number have physical force adequate to take the lives of the smaller; but by establishing as the basis of all social action the principle of the inviolability of life, except for cause, the whole society condemns in advance the exercise of the power.

In the same way the American system does not, and never did, justify a revolution by its success. Success in any action depending upon force only certifies a superiority of force. It was not the success of our own revolution that justified it, nor did we ever claim so foolish a thing. Persecution of any kind is always successful if it be only strong enough. All the early resistances to the Romish Church were suppressed, Savonarola, the Albigenses, the Lollards, the Hussites; but the success of Rome did not justify Rome any more than our success, ninety years ago, justified our action. If we had thought so, our cause would have been defeated by stating it.

The right of revolution is always conditional. If a tax-payer in the city of New York thinks the tax too high, has he a right to refuse to pay it and to shoot the officer who tries to collect it? And yet this is gravely declared by many to be the principle upon which we achieved our independence. On the contrary, our fathers acted upon certain general fundamental principles long before they articulated them; and the power of the Declaration of Independence lay greatly in the fact that it adequately expressed the common conviction which had only manifested itself in separate acts. The Declaration is our body of abstract, fundamental political faith. It declared that there were certain rights common to all men, of which the final proof lay in human consciousness, that when those rights were threatened the order of society and the welfare of mankind required a resort to peaceful redress; that when that peaceful redress failed, or when it did not exist, and the sufferers were solemnly persuaded that the wrong endured was greater than the possible injury accruing from seeking forcibly to right themselves, then, appealing to God and the universal conscience of mankind, they might properly fight to secure either redress or freedom from the oppressor.

This was the right of revolution reluctantly invoked by our fathers, and they never asserted any other. And fully knowing, by experience, how desperate a remedy it was, and even when most fortunate how necessarily sad in its operation, the first great act of their separation from Britain was to es-establish a system of government which should destroy, as far as possible, the necessity and possibility of justly appealing to revolution. Against lawlessness and rebellion no ruler or nation can effectually provide any more than against crime; but they can, and our fathers did, take from armed and organized resistance to law all pretense of necessity except in the un-supposable case that the majority should attempt to subvert the very original rights which the government, from which they derived all their authority, was expressly formed to protect. Nor, in such a case, could that right be invoked until every appeal to peaceable and lawful redress had failed. The case is not supposable, because to assume it is to assume a mental and moral condition which makes a popular system impossible.

The right of revolution is thus the right of forcible self-defense in the last extremity, and when its necessarily deplorable incidents are less to be dreaded than the more deplorable results of not resorting to it. To this conclusion our fathers slowly came. They did not ask to control the government, they asked only to have a fair voice in it. They did not refuse to pay the taxes, provided they were honestly represented in the government which imposed them. Bancroft cites the words of Washington, of Adams, and of the other illustrious patriots, showing how reluctantly they relinquished the hope of peaceful settlement. Even Thomas Paine, the most "radical" of all the revolutionary leaders, said in his "Common Sense," the pamphlet which had so great an influence in deciding the popular mind for separation: "No man was a warmer wisher for a reconciliation than myself before the fatal nineteenth of April, 1775."

And, again, the right of revolution is not the right of doing just what you please, provided only that you are able; which seems to be a very general interpretation of the doctrine. That is simply anarchy. Yet that is what the English perpetually declare the right to be, sneeringly asserting that, upon our principle, if a town wants to set up for itself, you have no right to prevent it. The English sneer at the right of revolution, but their Government proceeds in constant deference to it. In his essay upon the French Revolution of 1848, a crushing reply to Lord Brougham's letter to the Marquis of Lansdowne, John Stuart Mill says: "Lord Brougham boasts through many pages of the feat performed by Lord Grey's ministry in effecting a great change in the Constitution (the first such change in history which was so accomplished) without an insurrection. But was it without the fear of an insurrection? If there had been no chance of a rising would the House of Lords have waived their opposition, or the Duke of Wellington have thrown up the game in despair? If, in England, the mere demonstration of popular force sufficed to effect what elsewhere required its actual exertion, it was because the majority of even the unreformed House of Commons was elected by constituencies sufficiently large for a really powerful and unanimous popular determination to reach it, and because the political usages and long-standing liberties of England allowed of popular meetings and political unions without limit or stint."

The passage of the Reform Bill was simply a peaceful revolution. But it was not a whim of the nation. It seriously wanted a truer representation, and it would have taken up arms to secure it had not the Government yielded. In this country, happily, it can never be the nation that opposes the Government, because the Government is the majority of the nation. Such a movement must always spring from a faction who prefer a special to the common interest, and who would willingly sacrifice every thing to their own advantage. That is the difference between rebellion and revolution. He who, appealing to God and man, at last strikes in defense of the rights which God gave every man, and which have no other possible defense, strikes as Washington and our fathers struck. He who, disappointed and condemned, for his own aggrandizement and the welfare of his companions, strikes at the commonwealth strikes as Catiline and his confederates struck. The human heart is just. It reveres the one as a hero and a friend of man. It denounces the other as the enemy of the human race.

JOHN STUART MILL, who is most favorably known in this country for his admirable article upon our troubles, reprinted in a late number of this Magazine, is the author of the treatise upon Representative Government lately republished by the Harpers. It is a very timely book, by one of the leaders of modern thought, of whom a few words of biography will be welcome.

He gets his name from Sir John Stuart, a Scottish gentleman who sent his father, James Mill, to the Edinburgh University, and who came to London in 1800. He is known in English literature as the first editor of the Westminster Review, established by Jeremy Bentham, and more generally by his "History of British India," which was "the beginning of sound thinking upon the subject," and led to his employment by the East India Company. He published also a work upon Political Economy, and one upon the Phenomena of the Human Mind.

His son, John Stuart, was born in 1806, and so thorough was his education that it was said of him that he was the most elaborated mind of our age. He was first known as a botanist, but thinking and writing upon morals and politics it was supposed that he would be a more illustrious Bentham. But his career, if not that of the head of a school, has placed him among the leaders of thought. He is a man of universal sympathies, of the widest learning, and the most trenchant thought. His published works are upon Political Economy, Logic, "On Liberty," "Thoughts on Parliamentary Reform," "Considerations on Representative Government," and a large collection of admirable and delightful Dissertations and Discussions, and he is well known to the scholars and thinkers of other lands than his own. His papers upon Bentham and Coleridge are celebrated. He is the perfect master of all his accomplishments, and his style is noble for its simplicity, raciness, clearness, and decision.

His essay "On Liberty" is the most significant of all his writings. Its wisdom and wit are equally delightful. Its calmness and heroism are refreshing. The argument is as follows: "This, then, is the appropriate region of human liberty. It comprises, first, the inward domain of consciousness: demanding liberty of conscience in the most comprehensive sense; liberty of thought and feeling; absolute freedom of opinion and sentiment on all subjects, practical or speculative, scientific, moral, or theological. The liberty of expressing or publishing opinions may seem to fall under a different principle, since it belongs to that part of the conduct of an individual which concerns other people; but being almost of as much importance as the liberty of thought itself, and resting in great part on the same reasons, is practically inseparable from it. Secondly, the principle requires liberty of tastes and pursuits: of framing the plan of our life to suit our own character; of doing as we like, subject to such consequences as may follow, without impediment from our fellow-creatures so long as what we do does not harm them, even though they should think our conduct foolish, perverse, or wrong. Thirdly, from this liberty of each individual follows the liberty, within the same limits, of combinations among individuals: freedom to unite for any purpose not involving harm to others, the persons combining being supposed to be of full age, and not forced or deceived."

The "Essays and Reviews" that have made such a clatter in ecclesiastical England are merely the mildest application of this principle in certain directions. A few clergymen of the English Church state what they believe the Church teaches—certainly a very gentle heresy. A crowd of other English clergymen and some of the laity immediately put out their "Replies," which, whatever any one chooses to call them, are simply what they believe the Church teaches.

There is no living author better worth studying than John Stuart Mill.

THE visit of Parson Brownlow to the city was one of the memorable events of the month. His name had been so long familiar to the public, and was surrounded with such various and peculiar associations, that the interest in him was universal and profound. It was easy enough to foretell that his public reception at the Academy would be what is popularly called "an ovation." But it was much more than a spectacle. There was a tragic reality in what he said, and in the impression he personally produced.

If you enter the great opera-house by the stage door on Fourteenth Street you find yourself at once upon the stage, behind the scenes. The huge "wings" stretch up into the dim space toward the roof, and you move about in a murky twilight, smelling of varnish, and rather musty for want of ventilation. The murmur from the front of the house, and the light that streams in at the cracks and fissures of the scenery, draw you at once to some convenient aperture through which to survey the house. It is a curious spectacle that of five or six thousand gayly-dressed people sitting and standing expectant in the brilliant hall, rising tier upon tier in the white and gold balconies and galleries. To a Methodist preacher from the mountains of Eastern Tennessee it must have been dazzling and imposing.

The Green Room was full of clergymen and politicians and noted men, the invited guests. There was a general loud buzz of conversation, and a current and crowd toward the side of the room. Thither the eye instinctively turned to see the hero of the hour. Now certainly most men who have heard of "Parson Brownlow," who have read his speeches and marked his career, must have expected to see a thick, coarse figure, with a corresponding face, which would not surprise if it should seem vulgar. If a man had described his expectation would he not have probably said—A swearing, swaggering parson—a hard customer?

Well, the pictures and the descriptions are not faithful. There stood a tall, rather spare man, with marked but delicate features, careworn, perfectly pale, but both sad and intellectual. If there were any thing like a smile upon his face at any moment it was but a transitory gleam. The expression was calm, firm, sweet, but pensive. He received every body with great simplicity, shaking hands and conversing easily and pleasantly with men of all parties and ages, but whose cause was his cause—the cause in which he had so faithfully fought and so sadly suffered.

A loud burst of music from the band playing the Star-spangled Banner and the clapping of hands in the house announced that the hour had come; and putting on his hat, drawing it over his brow, and following the gentlemen who had him immediately in charge, Parson Brownlow walked in upon the stage, followed by the crowd of notables, and advanced to the front toward the audience. They cheered, and clapped, and stamped, and waved hats and handkerchiefs, and his welcome was such as the loyal city was sure to give to so loyal and tried a friend. A letter was read from the Governor, who regretted that he could not be present to preside. Then Mr. Evarts spoke a few words, wisely brief, and, as chairman, introduced Parson Brownlow. The applause was immense and long-continued. The speaker stood calmly, looking round from side to side, and quietly acknowledging the splendid welcome; and when there was perfect silence he began to speak.

As was natural for such a man in such a presence, he deprecated his want of eloquence and his inability to command the "polished diction" that charms and enchains. But no speech ever delivered in New York produced a more profound and marvelous effect. Perhaps it was not eloquent—it is not yet settled how eloquence should be defined—but it held every hearer fast, and with the most various emotion; and except for the fact that the civilization of Liberty makes even excited crowds of intelligent men, still humane, it is clear that at one point of the speech the safety of any man who should have been pointed out as a secessionist would not have been secure. But as it was, no conceivable eloquence could have swept that audience to an inhuman act. It was the witness of the spirit which moulds a society of freemen.

The speaker, on his side, was an equal illustration of the spirit of the society in which he was born and bred. His speech was a personal narration. He unfolded scene after scene of cruelty and horror at which the heart ached. Wild savages in their orgies of blood are not more devilish than the men whose actions he described. Calmly, standing erect, with the pale, sad face turning from side to side, he told the tale in a sustained, unvarying voice; while the audience audibly sympathized, murmured, cried "Shame!" and wiped their eyes, until, stepping a little backward, raising one denouncing arm, he cried, in a hard, shrill voice, "And this is the spirit of secession: a spirit of murder, of assassination, of hell! And yet"—he added, more intensely, and in a lower tone—"and yet you have men among you who excuse it, who sympathize with it, who sustain it!" and the audience shouted in indignation. "They have had their turn of shooting, and hanging, and stabbing; ours is to come!"

The earnest vindictiveness, the deep, calm bitterness with which it was said, was a tragic revelation of the kind and extent of crime that the spirit of a society familiar with injustice promotes, and of the qualities of character that it produces. Here was a preacher and patriot who had known something of martyrdom; it was perhaps not surprising, but it was terrible to see that his heart's hope was revenge, and that his way of peace was sudden and bloody extermination of the enemy. Every one who listened felt that he had a juster idea of the spirit which has plunged the nation into a fearful war. Not a man who heard could suppose or hope that peace would come except over absolute and tremendous victory. As yet we know but half: the interior history of the war is to be told hereafter.

The same unrelenting earnestness which Parson Brownlow throws into his loyalty animates his enemies. It is that which will sustain them long after they are defeated. A kind of barbaric tenacity and fierceness, glozed with the forms of civilization, inevitably perplexes civilized intelligence and skill. This war is revealing every part of the country to every other; and the strongest civilization must necessarily establish itself as paramount.

SEVERAL months ago the Easy Chair was speaking of the Turkish bath, which had been lately introduced into England, and of which the most amusing and excellent accounts were published in the magazines and papers. It is now established as one of the "institutions;" and in a London paper under my eye there are the advertisements of three of them.

The Turkish bath, as all travelers in the East or readers of Eastern travel know, is a perspirative. It is a forced perspiration. It absolutely cleanses the pores, and the subject feels as "the aerated bread" looks as if it felt. The warm air seems to circulate through you, and you thrill with conscious oxygenization. The sense of purity is indescribable. After his first bath in Grand Cairo the Easy Chair felt as if he should float up among the lattices of the bazar and dissolve in the sunset.

The experience of Dr. Wilson and others in England merely confirms that of every body who has enjoyed the bath in the East; and a company has been formed in London with half a million of dollars capital, and Mr. Urquhart has been to Constantinople, that nothing may be wanting, and that Englishmen may at last be made as clean as Turks.

Some years ago there was a sign in Broadway near Niblo's which announced Turkish baths. Whether they were so, or whether it was a place for steam-scouring the body only, this Easy Chair never ascertained. But the sign, and probably the substance, have long since disappeared, and a bathing-house, apart from the hotels, is now a curiosity in the city. This want it is proposed to meet by the formation of the Turkish Bath Company, whereby we are all to be made clean. There is no doubt of the great value and luxury of such a bath, and there can be no reason for not having it except public indifference. And it is supposed this will be corrected by the conspicuous merits of the bath.

Mr. Oscanyan, who is the Manager, has interested several of the most noted citizens as Directors: Mr. Bryant, President King, Dr. Mott, Mr., late Surrogate, Bradford, Professor Dwight, Mr. Gunther, Mr. Tiemann, and others. A capital of $30,000 is proposed to be raised by shares at $25 each; and in a delightful prospectus all the details of advantage and profit are set forth. The subscribers are to have dividends, and one share of the stock will be entitled to one free ticket.

Nothing is more reasonable, nothing should be more feasible than this plan; and as if to have the ripe fruit actually drop into our mouths, "an Oriental civil engineer who is thoroughly conversant with all its details, having built one of the best baths in Constantinople, is now in New York." The only thing that New York does not furnish is the tellak, or manipulator, and he can be readily obtained from Turkey.

There is no country in the world in which money is made so easily and spent so profusely as in this; and if some rich man who is building a house with picture-galleries, billiard-rooms, and libraries, should add a Calidarium and Tepidarium, as many English gentlemen have, he would have a luxury so positive and unique that every body would hasten to imitate him.

If New York knows the value of a new and exquisite sensation it will have the Turkish bath.

THE Central Park is already a part of the city. The old question of the friends who came from abroad—"What shall I see in the city?"—no longer puzzles. "Go to the Park, which is only just beginning; but Versailles and the Cascine, Munich and the Thiergarten, in all their glory, are not so beautiful as this."

The impression of perfect thoroughness and honesty in every part of the Park is as charming as it is new in a public work. The stately elm avenue, the picturesque terraces, the romantic shores of the lake, the winding walks of the Ramble, the broad sweep of greensward, the cricket-ground, the endless glimpses of graceful bridges, the exquisite care in details, shrubs, trees, plants, flowers, all in their proper places, are beautiful even now; but we must needs look at them with the imagined eyes of our posterity if we would see their full glory and impression when clouds of evergreen groves dip upon the sunny lawns, and branching elms "high over-arched embower," and that fine mellow tone touches every thing which belongs to works of fine art in landscape as well as in every other material.

What pure bits of ornament in nature swans and peacocks are! Does Nature discriminate men as subtly as she does swans? Does not that peacock in the Ramble surpass the "magnificent magnificences of the Magnificoes" in Venice? to use Sir Philip Sidney's gay expression. No goose can be a man, but may not every man be a gentleman? Orders and ranks and castes, then, may belong to an inferior animal development.

Within a high wire paling there are some deer, and, dearest of all, a delicate Venezuelan doe. They browse happily upon the green grass. No vagabonds with sticks can poke them, nor with orange-peel and tobacco-quids work them woe. It does not seem to occur to the deer that they are not sheltered by Adirondack woods, nor, in this burning weather, to the doe that she is not pasturing upon the equator.

Morning and evening the Park is alive with visitors. The steady riders who come for the constitutional jog go pounding solemnly along. The younger ones try to disguise it under an airy aspect of frolic. They would have us staring pedestrians believe that they are not, as it were, taking their bottles of Congress water, their Seidlitz powders, their Peruvian sirup. Oh no! not they! They have come bounding out "to meet the sun upon the upland lawn."

But the old cherrybouncers have no such artifice. They pound quietly round, careless if the whole world sees that they mean to outwit dyspepsia. And we staring pedestrians wonder as they jog by, whether, since they make this life such a business, they will make all lives so, and pound round the circuit of the planets as they do of the Park.

But the graceful carriages and the pretty wagons—some of the light trotting wagons so gayly painted that they flash along like sunbeams on cobwebs, a "line of light" on a shadowy pair of circles—these are the special glory of the promenade. Riding is not yet universal with us; but driving is a passion.

On a pleasant day the scene is an undress carnival. The liveries are happily few, nor is there that familiar acquaintance among the mass of the company that it has a lively social aspect, like the Cascade by the Casino or the Park in London. But there is no back-ground of poverty and misery behind it all. It is honestly earned enjoyment. Those who drive in the gay carriages to-day are the children of those who walked yesterday; and we trudging pedestrians, as we look, and admire, and cry, "Hi, hi!" and "God-speed!" are seeing those in whose seats our children may be to-morrow.

Our Foreign Bureau.

SINCE our last writing the two great events of European history have been the formal opening of the Great Exhibition of London and the triumphal progress of King Victor Emanuel through his new provinces of the South. In Naples the King's bonhomie and easy familiarity have done more to conquer the Bourbon brigandage than the Piedmontese soldiers have accomplished in all the winter.

A day of fête and sunshine, added to a royal smile, have made Naples and its southern impressible hearts crazy with their joyous welcome. Naples is never a dull city to a man who can feed on natural beauties. There is always the wondrous bay and always the smoking mountain. Sunshine is golden along the sands, and golden on the orange leaves, and golden on the walls of the yellow palaces. Smoky blue islands lie in a clear blue sea, and a soft blue sky hangs over them. A belt of gray cloud, which is the smoke from Vesuvius, is always present, and always flings a purple zone of shadow around the flank of the panting mountain. A bugle-note from the Caserne, a fisherman's halloo, the rattle of a corricolo over the lava pavement—these are the sounds that greet the ear. Red oranges flame at every street corner; companies of friars slip by in their serge and sandals; the lazaroni lie doubled-up and dozing upon the church steps. This is the dreamy Naples which travelers knew before the clarion of the new nationality had waked it into life.

When the King came French and British war-ships lay in the harbor—doubled to their sky-sail spars and their tiniest cordage in the water. The balconies on every street were covered with tapestries, and every where the tricolored flags were fluttering. The shops were shut, the women were all in gala dress, and every house-top that commanded a view of the harbor was thronged. A launch with green awnings was appointed to bring the King to shore, and feluccas and fishing craft of every size and shape made a crowded convoy. A gun from the castle announced the approach of the royal vessel, and ten thousand cheering voices greeted her as she rounded the Point of Pausilippo. The war-ships belched their salutation of fire and smoke, and the hurrahs of the seamen on all the yards reached to land.

As the launch upon which the King had disembarked drew near to shore vociferous cheering ran along the whole line of the bay; and as he landed and entered the gay pavilion which had been erected for his reception by the civic authorities, there was such a tempest of enthusiastic greeting as must at once have extinguished the hopes of the Bourbons. Nothing could have been freer or more hearty. And at night the streets glowed with such illumination as had never before been known in Naples. A personal observer gives us this graphic account: "Every quarter had its band and Bengal lights to amuse and divide the masses. The Church of Carminie was a thing of light, and its picturesque tower glowed and glittered from afar; but when I entered the Palace-yard I thought I had never witnessed such a fairy scene. The church and cupola and the colonnades of San Francisco Paolo were lighted up as at St. Peter's on Easter Monday. The three royal palaces were crowded with the élite of the country; the King was in the centre of his balcony, and a regular storm of congratulations greeted his appearance. Below was an amphitheatre of seats in which were 450 musicians, and the serenade was about to begin. 'How are we to get to the Foresteria?' said my friend, for the people were packed like anchovies, and a dense mass of carriages was beneath the royal salon; but a strong will and courage overcome any difficulties, and so, plowing through the crowd, we shortly found ourselves in our desired places. The Piazza was now almost in darkness, and the serenade began. Immediately after the first piece it was evident that the temporary darkness had been arranged for the sake of contrast, for directly after its conclusion there was a burst of light from the top of the colonnades of the Church of San Francisco which was almost blinding. Fountains of fire-works played all over the roof, tricolored rockets shot into the air, studding the heavens with brighter constellations than already glittered there, and then comparative darkness closed around us again, and the soft music from below stole upon our ears. The effect was magical! As every piece of music wakened up the memories or touched the affections of the people there were bursts of applause; and so these interchanges of music and light—gorgeous and characteristic light—continued until half past ten o'clock. I must notice particularly the late part of the spectacle, which was peculiarly brilliant. Round the summit of the colonnades were suspended festoons of evergreen by day, with circular garlands on each point of the festoons; while in the centre of the cupola was an immense garland with a gigantic V. E. in the middle. In a moment these decorations were a blaze of tricolored lights, changing from time to time, the form exquisitely preserved, and every leaf and flower being accurately defined. A shower of rockets shot up again in all directions, and then darkness fell upon the delighted and loyal masses, who will long remember the splendors of this right royal reception of the King of Italy."

Thus Naples votes once more with hearty and noisy plebiscite for Victor Emanuel; and from that vote we shall see no appeal in our day.

Upon the King's arrival in Sicily the same enthusiastic greeting met him. Those southern Italians love royalty as they love idleness, and cheer, and sunshine. Mazzini, with his promise of rights and severe democratic logic, would weary them to death.

So much for the great political event of the South.

FROM the sunniness of Naples to the sooty brick of London the change is not inspiring. The great Exhibition itself, whose opening is every where talked of, does not carry under its iron domes, thus far, any atmosphere of cheer or hope.

The gloom of a great death hangs under it. Even in the details of the official opening there has been a confusion and distrust, attributable very largely to the absence of that princely hand which was snatched away in the middle of the work. The other Commissioners, though capable men, have their political aims, their private business, which secure their chiefest care; but with Prince Albert there was that degree of devotion to this plan of the Industrial show which could alone insure successful administration and brilliant results.

The opening was perhaps a success, but certainly not a triumph. First of all, the building, as we hinted last month, is unsightly. It is not the architectural miracle of 1851, to pique the wonder: its proportions are inharmonious: even its size does not cheat one into awe. There are special features which are admirable, contrasted with others which are detestable; altogether, it may be written down (architecturally speaking) a grand and solid blunder.

It is in the arrangement of the details of the great Exhibition that the presiding judgment and good taste of the late Prince Royal have been most missed. The tradesmen of London have gained, from the present board of Commissioners, the permission to erect what they call "trophies" of their merchandise along either side of the nave. The shop-keepers have entered upon these designs with great spirit and ambition, but the result has been an amorphous and most incongruous series of architectural advertisements; very stupendous and brilliant in the eyes of boys and country visitors, but without grace or simplicity or any elegance that a cultivated eye can recognize. They belittle the grandeur of a great Exhibition of Art to the dimensions of an ambitious huckster's show. They crowd and bewilder the view without enchaining it or gratifying. Many of them, it is true, have been ordered away since the opening; others, by special command, have been reduced in their proportions. The shopmen have been offended, and harmony of arrangement has by no means been restored.

The grandest show of the Exhibition, as contributing most to human progress, and as marking mechanical growth since 1851, is undoubtedly the machinery. The most ponderous of beams and levers ply their movements with the dainty regularity and noiselessness of Geneva watches. Immense aisles of enginery bewilder the vision with their complicated play, and the only sound is here and there the labored sigh of some iron giant.

The jewels are richer than the world ever saw before; no art imitations have taken the charm away from the emeralds and the diamonds. Settings of ivory and shell introduce us to a new phase of ornamentation. Historic gems of old and noble families, that have romantic interest attaching, blaze out in the fairy work of modern goldsmiths.

Sèvres and Dresden contend for the palm in porcelain. The Wedgwood of England repeats the most exquisite forms of Rome.

Mr. Story has contributed certain pieces of sculpture upon which America may safely stake its reputation for art; the excellence not lying (as with Powers's Greek Slave) in the manipulation and grace, but in the essential poetry of their conception.

For the Albert memorial some £50,000 have been raised by voluntary subscription. The original intention was that the sum contributed should be expended in the erection of a monolithic obelisk of huge dimensions, and rivaling the great Egyptian types which are now in Rome. The Duke of Argyle made offer of a stone (granite), said to be lying in the rough, but of natural cleavage, in his Scotch quarries of Mull. A large sum was expended by the committee in clearing space about the monster spar of granite, for the purpose of accurate observation and measurement. This observation brought to light considerable undulations in the surface of the stone which forbade perfect working up to the desired size. The consequence has been a retirement of the original plan of an obelisk, and the architectural character of the memorial is open to new discussion. Her Majesty had expressed a wish that the intended memorial should show sculpture in the form of bas-reliefs, or statuary, at the hands of the best of English artists. It was difficult for the committee of execution to reconcile this wish with the severity of an obelisk; besides which, it has been found, after full consideration of the estimates presented by contractors, that a single stone, of the dimensions essential to proper effectiveness, would involve expenditure of all the moneys at present subscribed.

The English are not happy or ready in monumental devices. The Pre-Raphaelite tendencies of their arts of design, in which they certainly excel, are essentially imitative. But the Art monumental involves apprehension and conquest of the Ideal. Thorwaldsen's Lion, in the cliff at Lucerne, is a more grand and poetic tribute to the heroism (false or true) which it commemorates than British wealth has ever yet commanded.

THE Irish murders continue to illustrate British civilization: this time a Gustave Thiebault, a landowner and manager for his brother, is the sufferer. He found occasion to eject a tenant for non-payment of rent; received the usual threats; was honored with certain paper missives through the mails, illustrated with daggers, coffins, etc.; and finally, on a pleasant May evening at dusk, was beaten down with a pitchfork upon the high-road, his skull crushed effectively, and the body, weltering in blood, left in the ditch, as a cheerful Irish reminder to landed proprietors that they must not push their tenants.

The singularity of this murder is the fact that the victim is of a Papist family and of French origin: the blow of the pitchfork had then no religious, anti-Protestant fervor in it. It was simply a warm Irish protest against the present legal relations of landlord and tenant.

THE Ionian Assembly is again vociferous against the tyrannous protectorate of England, and, in the name of justice and of her Greek nationality, demands Independence. The august Hellenic Assembly unitedly declares that it is unchangeable in its resolution to become a portion of Free Greece, and will employ every legal means to give it effect. Unfortunately for them in their dependency, the only legal means in their possession is an humble petition to her Britannic Majesty—to give up control, remove her Commissioner and tax-gatherers, and order the guard-ships to Malta. This restive and persistent Hellenism of the Ionians is a constant thorn in the side of England. "This people is convinced," says the Ionian Parliament, "that Christian Europe, yielding to the claims of justice, stands ready to co-operate in every effort which, not only the inhabitants of the Seven Islands, but of all the Greek countries, may make to secure their national independence and their political unity. They believe it the only remedy for all those evils and sufferings which, in the eyes of the civilized world, that race has endured, which itself inaugurated European civilization, and to which it desires to contribute with all the force of national integrity."

To all which the British Governor says: England can not give up her rights of conquest. The Queen and her Government beg the Ionians to be quiet, to busy themselves with municipal regulations and their crops. They are Greeks, it is true, having a faith and language and habits and aspirations totally different from the British Governors and British army, who preserve order. Yet the station is an important military one—so important that the kind Queen's ear must not be vexed with their appeals to any sense of justice or to civilized Europe.

These Ionian Greeks, it must be specially noted, are by no means the friends of King Otho, or of his Bavarian court: their sympathies lie wholly with the insurrectionists, who have just now been compelled to surrender Nauplia; and their indignation against the British authorities is coupled with another and livelier indignation against the supine cowardice of their brother Greeks of Attica, in not rising to aid the beleaguered liberals at Nauplia.

A VERY singular will-case has just now come to decision in the Paris courts, involving property to the amount of a million of francs. The maker of the will was a certain Madame Lamotte, whose maiden name was Morin, and who was a native of the province of Champagne. Her parents dying soon after she came of age, left her a handsome fortune. This she managed with singular prudence, but in other affairs showed an imprudence which amounted almost to mania. She came to Paris and took lodgings in a furnished hotel of the Passage des Petits Peres—not a very eligible locality for an heiress of Champagne. Here she fell in with a gay Lothario in the person of a boarding-school master, who taught the children of her landlord. The acquaintance ended in a marriage, to which she gave reluctant consent, as the last refuge for dishonor. She, however, conceived so great an antipathy to her husband that she refused to see him after marriage—so great a disgust for the world that she refused to see any one, and became a voluntary prisoner in her chamber for over twenty years. During all this time she communicated with her servants only by writing, her letters being thrust under the door of her rooms. Her meals were served in an ante-chamber, which she never entered until satisfied that the attendants had passed out.

By engagements entered into with M. Lamotte previous to her marriage, both parties had made wills bequeathing all their property to the survivor. In the year 1851 the husband died; but the widow still obstinately maintained her isolation, refusing to see even the officers of justice who came upon business connected with the estate of the deceased. Her wishes and commands were all communicated as before. Her country property was under the management of a notary, M. Costel, and the Paris estate in charge of M. Peureau, who was by marriage intimately connected with Alphonse Lamotte, a brother of her deceased husband.

In early April of 1861, the servant remarked that, after the usual time had elapsed, her breakfast had not been eaten. She sent word to M. Peureau, who immediately went to her chamber, burst open the door, which had not given place to a visitor for twenty years, and found her dying upon the floor. An empty laudanum vial was near her. A paper was fastened in a conspicuous place to the wall, on which the suicide had written, "Let me be buried in the sheet I have laid ready on the chair. I am afflicted with an incurable disease, and am determined to see the end." Her room was littered with paper scraps to the depth of six inches, the accumulated débris of twenty years.

By a holograph will, dated only the year previous, it was found the deceased hypochondriac had left the bulk of her fortune to M. Alphonse Lamotte, the brother of her deceased husband; a handsome legacy to the daughter of her country manager, M. Costel; and another of similar amount to a daughter of M. Peureau.

An action was brought to invalidate the will by Madame Draut, a cousin and heir-at-law, on the ground of the incompetency of the testatrix; and in proof of her unsound mind all the facts were brought to light which we have detailed. On the other hand, however, her letters upon business produced in court showed great judgment and perspicacity, and the Court held that the will must stand.

AMONG the new things in Paris which just now attract a large share of the attention of visitors must be named the new Musée Campana, placed in the Palace of Industry upon the Champs Elysées. The extraordinary circumstances which have placed this admirable collection at one coup in the hands of the Government are also worthy of record. The Signor Campana was the manager of the Mont de Piété at Rome, and at the same time a collector, of rare accomplishments and of crazy enthusiasm. In the course of his collections he found it necessary to avail himself of the funds which he held in trust to the amount of some four or five millions of francs. It is true that he regarded this personal advance as a loan for which he offered in guarantee his entire collection, which had only been brought together at an expenditure largely exceeding the funds he had withdrawn from the institution of which he was in charge.

Even under Roman officials so extensive an appropriation of moneys belonging to a public institution could not pass without discovery. The security indeed was ample; and the friends of M. Campana urged a simple discharge of the official whose antiquarian zeal had betrayed him into difficulty, and a sale of so many of the objects of virtu as should meet his indebtedness.

But the Papal Government, with sterner action, condemned the poor man to a long imprisonment and confiscated all his effects.

A portion were sold to the Emperor Alexander; but the bulk was secured by an offer of the French Consul, acting for the Imperial Government; and something over four millions of francs was paid for the museum now offered freely to public inspection in the Palace of Industry.

Its paintings are of more value historically than as works of art; extending back as they do to the earliest periods of Italian painting, and offering a chronologic series of all the distinguished Masters of Italy. In gems and medallions it is also specially rich; but in porcelain and earthenware, it is said to be the most perfect and beautiful in existence.

It is still undetermined if it shall be distributed among the established galleries of the Louvre, or remain an integral collection, the last probably of the gigantic spoils which up to this time Northern and Western Europe has drawn from Italy. Henceforth it is to be hoped the Government of Victor Emanuel will be strong enough to retain its art-treasures at home.

WE spoke last month of the "Miserables" of Victor Hugo; half of the reading world has entered on its perusal—not all achieving its first installment. It lacks the youthful élan and rapidity of story which made every page of "Nôtre Dame" brimful of interest; you can lay it down more easily; it is doubtful if you can forget it so soon. It takes broader and deeper hold of the great riddle of Life. As a work of art, judging from the initial part, it will not bear comparison with the "Nôtre Dame;" but as a work of thought, of conscience, of deliberation in fathoming human motives, and in probing the wounds that society inflicts on itself, it is incomparably worthier.

However much he may dislike the Third Napoleon and his dynasty, you can not forbear the conviction that he wishes well to France and to the race. No prose of his can break down the poet—not so much in style as style of thought. The poet shines in his religion, in his politics, in his crimes, in his philosophy even. You see that he abounds in charity; yet you know that he would be the most incompetent almoner in the world. You see that his faith is exuberant; yet he would be unfit for a parish priest. There is a large liberalism in all his political sentiments; yet he could not be trusted with the editing of a state paper. There may come a day when the poetic sensibilities and perceptions of such a man as Hugo may have their reckoning upon the current of everyday, practical life; but it is not yet.

He does not lack, as do most romancers, a vital earnestness of intention; but the earnestness is so wrought upon and sublimated by the afflatus of the poet that the larger part of the world lose trail and quest.

We compared the "Miserables"—far as we may—with the "Nôtre Dame;" such comparisons are always unsafe and unfair; yet we can hardly err in saying that the latest work of the author gives us a much larger conception of his force and thought, while the earlier one will be always most coveted of readers.

The Madonna Della Sedia is perhaps the gem of Raphael (if it be not the Dresden one); but neither of them give any thing like that conception of his abounding grace and fertility which impresses one who lingers hour after hour by his frescoes of the Vatican.

MADAME MARIE DE GRANDFORT, who wrote some years since a very impertinent and untruthful book about America, has recently published, in connection with an appealingly pretty portrait of herself, a romance called "Ryno."

Romance and portrait are both excessively décolletés. No greater attraction belongs to the book.

A RECENT volume of an Academician, M. Le Comte Armand de Pontmartin, entitled, "Thursdays of Madame Charbonneau," has excited considerable remark for its saucy and impudent mention of very many notable French littérateurs.

The Count has won his honors notwithstanding the embarrassing hindrance of high birth, wealth, and a dogged devotion to Legitimacy and the Church. He has wit, learning, a great stock of bitterness, no little jealousy, and the hardihood to give expression to his animosities in the most offensive and polished of styles. The current abuse of him revives a reputation that was built upon the journalism of twenty years since, and which was well-nigh forgotten.

It is over twenty years now since Americans saw the shaggy head of the famous Dr. Wolff wagging in American pulpits. He had almost come to outlive his reputation as a traveler, a man of erudition, and a missionary, of which we are reminded by the recent announcement of his death. He was the son of a Rabbi, and was born in the year 1795. Being early converted to Christianity, he attended theological lectures at Vienna, where he enjoyed the friendship of Professor Jahn, Frederic Von Schlegel, and the poet Werner. Among other friends of his youth were Zschokke and Pestalozzi in Switzerland. In the years 1817 and 1818, being at Rome, he broke away from the Papal harness and ultimately abjured Romanism altogether. From the year 1820 to 1826 he journeyed through Egypt, Palestine, Persia, Mesopotamia, and the Crimea, preaching to Bedouins, Jews, Persians, Greeks, and Russians. In the year 1827 he married the Lady Georgiana Mary Walpole. Leaving her ladyship at Malta from 1831 to 1834, he went upon the search of the Ten Lost Tribes. His adventures were most varied, and his escapes oftentimes marvelous. At Khorassan he was made a slave, tied to a horse's tail, and ransomed by Abbas Mirza. Of all these trials and wanderings he gave brief and graphic recital from the American pulpits about the year 1837. We can recall now a vision of the shaggy head, all embrowned with the fierce suns of Palestine, dropping thenceforth out of mind, till now the mention of his death brings all back again—the harsh, swift voice; the crackling tones; the ferret eyes; the story of scourgings and fastings; the limpid roll of Arabic names; the Hebraic accent; the gorgeous Persian pictures; the "elephants with castles;" the hands lifted in prayer.

In its time we spoke of the dissolution of the Prussian Parliamentary Assembly, and the order for a new election. The old Assembly did not sustain the Ministry, and the King in a fit of obstinacy refused to accept the resignation of the Ministers, believing that an appeal to his liege subjects would confirm the pretensions of royalty. The result has disappointed him. Prussia has declared very effectively its disposition to share the King's divine right of governing. At our present writing it is not known how the King will meet the new Chambers, or how the new Chambers will meet the King.

Not only has the liberal party obtained an immense majority in the recent elections, but that particular wing of it which the Ministry had undertaken to stigmatize as "democratic" has gained beyond all anticipations. The organs of the reactionary party utter vague threats of a possible coup d'état, but it is only the delirious utterance of unexpected defeat.

THAT Mirés case, about which we have in late records said much, is at length the subject of a new phase. Appeal having been taken from the Paris court (which condemned him as a felon) to the imperial court at Douai, he has at length been acquitted, the decision of the inferior court reversed, and the financier is restored to liberty and favor. At the rendering of the judgment there was applause; his counsel embraced the banker; lady friends crowded about him bringing tributary flowers, and the much-suffering delinquent made a prettily-turned speech—forgiving his persecutors, glorifying tardy justice, and promising that the old town of Douai should have permanent memorial of his acquittal. The next day, on the Paris Exchange, the Caisse Mirés rose from forty-five francs to one hundred and sixty-seven!

A crowd of earnest sympathizers attended his departure from the station of Douai, whence he was accompanied by Madame Mirés and by the Princess de Polignac (his daughter). Another ovation was in readiness for him at his house in the Rue Neuvedes-Mathurins, at Paris. The triumph of justice may be real, but the triumph of gold is noisy.

WE have touched upon Italy only to show how the new royalty is planting itself firmly in the Southern hearts. All the North stands fast and true, save only where the Pope waves still his cross-key banner and invites the conspirators against the peace of Italy. He has gone wearily through his Holy Week, and with a narrowed echo his blessing urbi et orbi has fallen from the balcon of St. Peter's.

The Emperor Francis is rallying Austrian loyalty (much as he can) by swift journeys through the provinces.

The Greek Revolution is shivering under the bayonets of Otho, and Nauplia has surrendered; but disaffection is by no means crushed. The Herzegovine war drags wearily, and wasted homesteads and desolated fields mark its tedious progress.

Russia has placed her new loan with an ease and promptitude that give token of a brightening career.

Meantime on all the west countries of Europe, without exception, the shadow of the American war is hanging like a cloud.

Intervention—whatever it may have done once—can not now dissipate or lift it. Not in any country of the civilized world can so much blood be spent but the reek of it shall reach every where. The penalties of so great a war all Christendom must suffer.

THE visit of M. Mercier has of course startled all the quidnuncs of Paris. It is an affair which you perceive by the statement of Mr. Layard in the British Parliament is officially ignored. But though officially ignored, no one supposes the Emperor to have been ignorant of its aim and result. Suppose, for instance, that a letter of this purport comes some day to the French representative at Washington:

"To M. Mercier, etc., etc.:

"MONSIEUR,—The Emperor is exceedingly desirous of possessing himself of more definite information with regard to the condition and purposes of the Confederates than are now within his reach. It would be agreeable to him to know from a capable personal observer how far the Confederates are determined, and united in their determination, to resist to the last. Is there a hope that a decisive victory by McClellan or Halleck, or both, would virtually end the contest?

"Would the matériel in the hands of the South enable them to continue resistance for say two or three years to come?

"Is the opposition to Mr. Davis within his own Government of such a character as to warrant the belief that any considerable number of prominent Southern men would, in the event of a defeat, rally to the Union cause?

"On these points His Majesty is exceedingly desirous of such information as could be gained only by a personal observer at the Confederate capital.

"Allow me to suggest, Monsieur, that if, without offending the sensibilities of the American Government, an informal visit to Richmond could be made by some competent member of your legation (if your own absence from Washington for a few days should be inadvisable), such visit would probably furnish the information which the Emperor specially desires.

"Please to forward the result of any observations it may be in your power to make to me personally, for transmission to the Emperor.

"I am respectfully yours, etc."

There have been worse canards than this.

Editor's Drawer.

WONDERFUL are the workings of a good conscience and a good digestion. So many letters are written to the Drawer in praise of its effects on the health of its readers, that we have thought seriously (we do sometimes think seriously) of offering it to the Sanitary Commissions as one of the best agents to circulate among the camps and hospitals. One writer sends us a quotation:

"The man that laughs is a doctor without a diploma. His face does more good in a sick-room than a bushel of powders or a gallon of bitter draughts. People are always glad to see him. Their hands instinctively go half-way out to meet his grasp, while they turn involuntarily from the clammy touch of the dyspeptic who speaks in the groaning key. He laughs you out of your faults, while you never dream of being offended with him; and you never know what a pleasant world you are living in until he points out the sunny streak on its pathway."

BUT it seems that the original Joe Miller, the patron saint of the Drawer, was a serious individual, innocent of all jests, or even of tendency to levity, whose very gravity provoked the greatest joke of the age, being neither more nor less than making him, the solemn old sobersides, the father of all the jokes that were going. Mr. Mathews (father of Charles Mathews), in his celebrated monopolylogue entitled "Mathews's Dream; or, Theatrical Gallery," gives the following curious anecdote of the far-famed Joe Miller, for the veracity of which he pledges himself:

"It is a fact not generally known that Joe Miller, who has fathered all our jests for the last half-century, never uttered a jest in his life. Though an excellent comic actor, he was the most taciturn and saturnine man breathing. He was in the daily habit of spending his afternoons at the Black Jack, a well-known public-house in Portugal Street, Clare Market, which was at that time frequented by most of the respectable tradesmen in the neighborhood, who, from Joe's imperturbable gravity, whenever any risible saying was recounted, derisively ascribed it to him. After his death, having left his family unprovided for, advantage was taken of this badinage. A Mr. Motley, a well-known dramatist of that day, was employed to collect all the stray jests then current in town. Joe Miller's name was prefixed to them, and from that day to this the man who never uttered a jest has been the reputed author of every jest past, present, and to come."

A SURGEON in our Army of the West sends to us from the "Field of Shiloh" some anecdotes of his colored servant:

"Dan is a slave owned by a gentleman in Lexington, Kentucky, who kindly permits him to go at large and obtain employment wherever it suits him. He is as faithful a fellow as ever lived, and has been in the employ of your correspondent in the army over six months. He is a black but intelligent negro, and is as proud as was Hawkeye of having 'no cross in his blood.' 'Nuffin yaller 'bout me,' says Dan; 'Ise de pure nigger.'

"Dan is an aristocrat. Having once enjoyed the high office of porter at the Galt House, he considers himself a 'first-class hotel nigger.' One day he came to my tent, and, with a long face, notified me that he thought he should be compelled to leave me. I asked why, if he were not satisfied with his wages, etc. He expressed himself satisfied with every thing except the 'society.' Said he:

"De Gen'l is a gen'lman as isn't 'quainted wid culled people. He is from de Norf, whar dar isn't no niggers as knows how to behave theirselves, and he doesn't 'preciate de difference 'tween culled people. Now here's all dese counterbine niggers—(we have several contrabands in camp)—'and de officers don't know nuffin 'bout de value of dem. Dere's Captain——'s nigger—he doesn't know 'nuff to keep hisself clean; and dere's Israel—why, Israel is de laziest nigger in de camp, all de time a gittin' hisself drunk; and dat ar Gilbert is de biggest fool—why, any body would know dat nigger had been run by de houns! Den dar's Charley—he 'fesses to be a cook. I axed him if he was a genuine cook, or jes made up since de war broke out. I can't 'sociate wid dat nigger—he use to drive a coal cart. He tole John'—(John is a first-class free negro, and was formerly steward upon a steamboat)—'he tole John dat he was a steamboat nigger, and John jes axed him if he knew any ting about dese yere stern-wheel coal-boats. De fac is, Doctor, Ise tired of bein' classed wid dese yere cheap niggers that's a tryin' to steal theirselves.'

"I pacified Dan by assuring him that all the officers understood that he and John belonged to an entirely different class of niggers.

"DAN is more rigid in his ideas of military discipline than many of our officers, and he always obeys orders to the letter. As there are always hangers-on around the camps, I had instructed Dan not to permit any one to take any thing from my tent without my order.

"General——, who is well known as a most rigid disciplinarian and one who is never thwarted in any thing he undertakes, had admired some bitters which had been prepared by your correspondent as a prophylactic. One morning while riding out I happened to meet this officer with his staff. He stated that he should pass by our head-quarters, and desired some of my bitters. Said I, 'Very good, General; there are two canteens filled in my tent, just take one of them.' Upon my return Dan met me at my tent-door, and asked,

"'Doctor, did you tell Gen'l—— to take a canteen of dose bitters?'

"'Certainly,' said I; 'you gave them to him, of course.'

"Dan drew himself up, and very firmly but respectfully remarked, 'No, Sah; I tole de Gen'l dat I had no orders.'

"WHEN the fight of 6th April commenced at Pittsburg Landing our division was nearly twenty-five miles distant. We hurried forward as rapidly as possible, and did good service in the fight of Monday. I had instructed Dan to remain with my baggage, which was to follow. He came with it, and I, being very busy, had no time to look after him for two days after the battle. I then found him in the rear of the battle-field, where he had been for two days and nights faithfully watching my baggage. He was half-starved, and was completely soaked by the heavy rains of the two previous nights. I asked him why he had not got something to eat, and he pointed to the stragglers all around, and replied, through his chattering teeth,

"'Tink I'd leave de tings for dese yere cowards to steal? Dey's been skulkin' roun' heah all de time, stealin' every ting dey could lay dere hands on.'

"Of course I approved his conduct, and gave him something to eat and drink. I then asked him if he was afraid on the day of the battle.

"'No, Sah,' said he, with the utmost gravity and with much pride; 'I isn't 'fraid of nuffin; I doesn't care nuffin 'bout myself'; but den, you see, Ise missus's fav'rite, and I know she hasn't slep a night since I've been to de wars, for fear I'd get shot.'

PATRICK CONWAY is a private in Company E, Sixth Regiment Iowa Volunteers, from Monroe County. While stationed at Sedalia, Missouri, a peddler came into camp with the usual cry, "Pins, combs, thread, buttons!" etc., etc., and threw down his "baggage" close to Pat's tent. Pat eyed him a moment, arose to his feet, and addressed him with, "What ye doin' here with ould trumpery? Lave here, or by the howly mither of Moses I'll be after kicking ye out of the camp! Lave, dom ye!" The peddler thought that discretion was the better part of valor, and left. After he had gone one of the boys said, "Pat, why did you drive that fellow off? I wished to buy some of his goods." Pat answered, "And what the divil do I care? Didn't Captain Henry Saunders order me from Albia to St. Louis, and from St. Louis to Springfield, and thin back to Sedalia; and haven't I been ordered about for the last six months, and during all that time haven't had the pleasure of ordering a single man before? And d'ye s'pose I am goin' to lit sich a chance as this pass without ordering the spalpeen away? By the howly St. Patrick, no!"

At the village hotel in—— there is a club of young fellows who delight in "selling" one another. It is their custom when one is "sold" to have a trial, with all the forms of law, the accused pleading his own case; and if the party accusing succeed in proving the sell, the accused has to pay for a supper for the whole party. One evening one of the party was on trial for a misdemeanor, but pleaded "not guilty." The accuser was called upon to state what he knew of the circumstance.

"Well," said he, "as I was going up to my room last night, about quarter past twelve, I seen Jim about half-way up the stairs with a candlestick in which there was a lighted candle in one hand, while the left arm was lovingly clasped around the baluster. I went up to him and asked, 'Jim, what is the matter with you?' He replied—holding the candle on a level with, and but a short distance from his eyes, gazing intently at it—'The matter with me?—nothing the matter with me; but I am trying to think how the boy managed to get two candles in that candlestick!'"

A "MINISTER'S DAUGHTER" sends several pleasant stories:

"John Jenkins, of Long Island, had been sparking Susan Jones, and having managed with her help to pop the question, others naturally arose—as when, where, and how they could be married? Many difficulties presented themselves; however, 'when there is a will there is a way,' and as soon as the signs came right the ingenious pair were seen riding into the village of Jamaica on top of a famous load of hay. The next thing was to bargain the load for the marriage ceremony, which was speedily accomplished, for the good dominie to whom the first application was made was not the man to keep them long on the anxious seat, and they soon went on their way rejoicing in their empty hay-rack.

"REV. MR. F— rode twenty-five miles, in the most furious storm imaginable, to marry a wealthy young farmer; and received a seven-and-sixpenny piece for his fee.

"DR. W— on one occasion received no fee for marrying a parsimonious couple, and meeting them several months after at a social gathering, took up their baby, and exclaimed, 'I believe I have a mortgage on this child!' Baby's papa, rather than have an explanation before the company, quietly handed over a V."

AN Ohio correspondent asks, "Do you think it always dangerous to give advice unasked?" Most certainly not, we reply, when the advice is as sensible as that which follows:

"If not, please advise parents, if they would do a good thing for their children, to get for them Willson's Series of 'School and Family Readers.' They are so interesting, so beautiful, so instructive, and so happy in their adaptation to our educational wants, that no school or family can afford to do without them."

But whether a family can "afford" to do without them depends upon circumstances. We can hardly afford to have them in our house; for our several-years-olders (none of whose smart sayings have appeared in the Drawer) have suddenly become so popular, since they have come into possession of these, that we can hardly enter the house without finding two or three of their mates busily engaged in poring over these Readers. Among them they have already worn out three sets, besides as many more which they have disposed of among their friends, who think them "so nice, and wish they had them:" backing up the hint by sundry presents in the "Juvenile Story-Book" way. "And we gave them the Readers, for we mustn't be mean," add our young ones. All these must be replaced if we want peace at home. So we find the series a rather costly possession; and the question with us is, whether we can afford to have them in our family.

FROM the Frankfort Conversationsblatt we clipped a paragraph concerning one of our favorite contributors. A young lady happening just then to call upon us with a proposal to make translations from German and French, we gave her this slip by way of trial. By diligent use of our "Hilpert," in the course of an hour she produced the following, which we certify to be perfectly literal:

Frankfort, 27 March. — Yesterday evening delivered Herr John Ross Browne of California in a public, of Ladies and Gentlemen consisting meeting of the "English Circle," in the great hall of the "Hof von Holland," a, by many large wall-pictures illustrated lecture, upon "The Whale, its history, anatomy and habits; and the perils and characteristics of the American whale fishery." Especially were the parts of the discourse most highly original and entertaining which themselves upon the own experience of the speaker grounded. Herr Browne had to wit, a year and a half long in an American Whalefish expedition part taken, and therein manifold adventures and afflictions through-lived. At present time travels he in Europe in commission of several of the most-read American journals, as Harper's Magazine, Harper's Weekly, Sacramento Union, etc., and furnishes the same most highly interesting, gladly-read travel-letters à la Bayard Taylor. Especially contains the last number of the Union an attention-worthy and most highly original article on Frankfort on the Maine. Herr Browne has in view, as it is said, still a discourse on the present circumstances in America to deliver, which naturally of still higher, since more general interest will be.

"AN intelligent contraband," of tender years, has been lately going the round of the stores down town with a paper containing the following:

"The friends and acquaintances of Mrs. Mary Ann Brown departed this life April 27th, aged 98 years. You are requested to bestow upon her your charity, as she has not means enough to bury herself with."

FROM Kentucky a friend writes to the Drawer: "Every body has heard of the genial Judge Nuttall, of this State, who adjourned Court to see the elephant swim the river, and who is so cautious in dealing rigid justice that he often takes the will of the house upon knotty cases, and enters judgment by a vote of majority. Two attorneys, Lindsay and Harlan, had plead a cause before him, and verdict was given in favor of the latter's client, when L. remonstrated, to the Judge's surprise, who silenced him by saying, that he had given two decisions in his favor that day, and only one to Harlan—that he was quite too hard to satisfy!"

"THE Judge was canvassing the district in opposition to Pryor, who had presented his claims in a telling speech replete with legal lore, which he hoped would favorably contrast with the learning of his competitor, and carry the election. Nuttall replied by an honest confession to the simple yeomanry that he had read but two books in his life—one the Bible and the other Walker's Life of Jackson, and that he could find law enough in those two books to decide any case that might come before him. It is hardly necessary to observe that his eminent fitness was appreciated, and he chosen by a hearty majority over his defeated but accomplished rival."

GOVERNOR CURTIN, of Pennsylvania, while canvassing before his election, was speaking to an audience in the town of Milton, where, in former days, he had gone to school. In his speech he mentioned the fact of "his having gamboled among the hills of this place in his youthful days, with some of the men that now stood before him." An honest member of the party broke out: "Well, I never know'd that Mr. Curtin gambled. I sha'n't vote for any man that gambles." So the Governor lost a vote, but he was elected nevertheless.

THE following is from a Galveston friend:

"Heavy duties were laid upon liquors by the republic in its Lone Star days, and the lovers of whiskey were put to grief thereby. At the annexation this was terminated, and 'red eye' was imported from the States duty free.

"Standing in his store-door one day soon after the annexation, my friend observed a 'natyve' coming down the strand gloriously drunk, swinging his hat and hallooing in the most uproarious manner.

Giving vent to his joy in a loud, long laugh, he yelled at the top of his voice, 'Whoopee! Whisky only twenty-five cents a gallon! Some chance for a poor man now. Hooray!'

A GOOD one is told in Kentucky on General Garfield—the Colonel Garfield who developed Tom Marshall's running ability so handsomely.

Garfield was a Methodist minister, and was once preaching in a rough neighborhood in the mountains, where ministers were always insulted and interrupted, and sometimes driven away. In the midst of the exercises one of these "lewd fellows of the baser sort" came in and commenced a disturbance. Garfield took no notice of him, and proceeded with his discourse; but the fellow grew outrageous, and Garfield stopped; his patience had been gradually departing, and was now clean gone. "Brethren," said he, "I think if old Job was here he would certainly thrash that fellow, and thrash him soundly; but inasmuch as he is not here I am going to do it myself;" and he jumped into the chap before he knew what was coming, and beat him until he "hollered." Then, taking him by the shoulders, he jammed him into a seat, with "There, sit there, you scoundrel, until I get through!" and he marched back into the pulpit and finished his sermon in quiet. The story is good enough to be true, and very likely it is, for the General has not gotten over that sort of thing to this day.

SOUTHERN hospitality, slightly overdone, is thus set forth by a gentleman who experienced it:

"I was invited by a planter back of Natchez to visit him, and I accepted. He was a man of large wealth and lavish notions. Immediately on my arrival he detailed a servant to wait on me, who was indefatigable in his attentions, and tormented me nearly to death. He followed me on the lawn, through the garden, over the grounds, stuck to me in my room, and slept on the rug at my door. To hand a glass of water, reach my hat, untie my shoes, he was always present. I half awoke after my first night's rest and lay in a dreamy, delicious state, soothed by the stillness and the fresh odors that came in at the window. I did not open my eyes, but was somehow conscious of a presence. I turned my face to the pillow for another doze, but soon fully aroused myself, and there, at my bed-side, three-fourths asleep, with his woolly head bobbing and nodding, stood the darkey, with his hands out holding my pants, all opened and spread ready for me to put my legs into! My implied helplessness was a great insult, but the absurdity of the posture and the line of service were too much for my gravity. Nevertheless, having once learned a proverb about the Romans, I put out my feet and let the pants be drawn up over them, just as my mother used to do when I was a baby."

"A FEW days since the Sacramento (California) Daily Union mentioned the fact that a telegram had been received in San Francisco from Boston by Mr. —, stating that his father had died exactly at 11 A.M. of that date. The dispatch was received at '10.45' A.M., thus beating time a quarter of an hour. I was reading the paragraph to an Irish friend as an evidence of the wonderful speed that could be accomplished with so long a line. In a few minutes after I heard him repeating the news in his own language thus: 'A man died in Boston the other morning, and his son, in San Francisco, received the news by telegraph just fifteen minutes before he was dead.'"

WHOSOEVER has been in Vicksburg has stopped at the Washington, and whosoever has stopped there remembers mine host—a pleasant, well-fed man, who puts his hand familiarly on your shoulder and calls you "Colonel" before you have been five minutes his guest. At the head of his table he shines conspicuous. Departing from the beaten track, he stands up and calls his bill of fare—calls it out loud and strong. "Here's some elegant roast-beef; roast-beef rare, roast-beef done to a turn! Boiled mutton just arrived! Bring along that leg of veal! Mashed potatoes, mashed turnips!—how about that lettuce?" and so on, morning, noon, and night.

He says the custom originated with him in Jackson, the capital of the State, where he once went to keep a fashionable hotel. Many of the "Members" boarded with him, and managed to make some use of such innovations as napkins and silver forks, but a printed bill of fare was "too many" for them—they could not read; and so he stood up and read it himself. It proved to be a "good thing," and he has stuck to it ever since.

AN old contributor writes to the Drawer: At the time the Welland Canal was about to be enlarged I found myself in St. Catherine, Canada West, and, in company with a large number of contractors from all parts of the country, stopped at the St. Catherine Hotel. One evening quite a spirited argument arose among us which State could claim the most beautiful valleys. I, as a Yorker, of course claimed the premium for my State, and named the Genesee Valley as ranking first. Others had their favorites; but a Pennsylvanian insisted that the Wyoming Valley stood unrivaled, and after talking a long time, wound up with this clencher:

"One day," said he, "I was in a hotel in the Valley when an Englishman came in, and said he had come all the way from Philadelphia to see the beauties of the valley, had read Campbell's poem, etc., with other descriptions, and really expected to see something extra, but was sadly disappointed—could see no beauty—all a humbug, etc., etc. I couldn't stand it any longer, and so I said, 'Stranger, if you will permit me to blindfold you, and will jump into my wagon, I'll take you up on "Prospect Rock," where, after you have looked about you, if you don't allow it beats any thing you ever saw before, you can stay in this village as long as you wish to at my expense.'

"He considered the offer generous, and immediately put it in execution. When we arrived at the rock I placed him so that all the beauty could be seen at a glance, and then took off the bandage. For a moment he stood, and then folding his arms upon his breast gave himself up to the enchanting scene. I let him alone for half an hour, when, feeling curious to know what he thought about it, I touched him on his arm, and said,

"Well, stranger, what do you think about it?"

"Think?" said he. "Do you suppose that Satan ever showed the Saviour this spot?"

"I was satisfied, and told him so."

As this answer capped the climax, the rest of us subsided.

THE Rev. Mr. Darter is a country merchant in a certain neighborhood in Cherokee, Georgia. He is also a local Methodist preacher, and sometimes offi-ciates in the absence of the regular minister. The church at which Mr. Darter worships is distant from his store about a mile, and the services are usually performed on some day during the week, the Methodist circuit riders being unable to fill all their appointments on the Sabbath. On a certain pleasant day a New York drummer called at Brother Darter's store to sell him a bill of goods, or for some other purpose. It happened to be a meeting-day, and the merchant was absent. Having nothing else to do, the New Yorker concluded to stroll over toward the church. The day was a warm one—nothing unusual in that latitude even in winter—and the church-doors were all open. The circuit preacher had not arrived, and Brother Darter was filling his pulpit. He happened to be descanting on the wiles of the devil when our New York friend reached the church. He described the great adversary of mankind as a terrible-looking monster, "going about like a roaring lion, seeking whom he might devour." Just at this moment the New Yorker walked in. No razor had come near his face for many a day, and his beard and mustache were long and heavy. His morning's ride and subsequent walk in the heat and dust had left him in any thing but a tidy condition. His style of dress and of wearing the beard were altogether new in that region, and his appearance created a sensation. Sitting about the centre of the church were a couple of country damsels, who were as much astonished and terrified at the strange appearance as was Hamlet at his father's ghost. Brother Darter paused in his discourse; every body seemed to hold their breath; and "you might have heard a pin drop." Just at this moment one of the damsels whispered to the other, but loud enough to be heard all over the church, "Nancy, Brother Darter's been a-talkin' about the Old One, and thar he is!"

"THE Rev. Mr. B——, of the Presbyterian Church, is, unfortunately, very bald, and has been since quite a young man. Early in his ministry he was traveling in Indiana, and in passing from Indianapolis to Logansport, over the old 'Michigan road,' was weather-bound several days at the little village of Michigan Town. The inhabitants finding out he was a minister, begged for a sermon, to which of course he assented. The largest room that could be secured was the bar-room. There he preached to a 'crowded house,' using the bar for his pulpit. Owing, perhaps, to the novelty of the circumstances, the sermon was a success; the audience were delighted, and some of them were disposed to be complimentary. Among them, an old woman, an emigrant from Virginia; but whether one of the F. F. V.'s or not I can not say. Coming up to him, her good old withered face beaming with delight, she exclaimed, 'Oh, Mr. B——, I was so delighted with your sermon! It is so seldom we hear good preaching here. The last preacher we had I did not like at all; he wore his hair so long. The fact is, Mr. B——, I do not like to hear a preacher with any more hair on his head than you have!'"

"SOME forty years ago, a Massachusetts pedagogue found his way into a border town in Vermont to keep a winter school. Methodist preachers had just found their way to that section also, and figured in the public view as new and curious characters. In the absence of barbers, our schoolmaster had to depend on some of the damsels of the border as hair-dressers. One day, after a sharp operation of the kind, he asked an old lady what she thought of his appearance. She threw up her hands in astonishment as she exclaimed, 'Like the very diabol! I should think you were a Methodist minister!'"

"A JOCKEY country merchant was trafficking one day with a rustic mountaineer purchasing hay-rakes in exchange for goods. Of course the merchant's prices were what are called barter prices. Our rustic had need of a new hat, and inquired the price of one from a case just opened, from New York. 'Only five dollars,' said the merchant. 'Isn't that rather dear?' said the customer. 'I never sold one for less!' said the sharp merchant.

"The clerk in the store put his head to the ear of the writer, who was listening to the negotiation, and whispered, 'He never sold one at all!' The case was bought at auction in New York for one dollar a piece."

OUR Episcopal Bishop for the Northwest enjoys a good joke occasionally, and he relates the following:

One Sabbath he was preaching in a log-cabin to one of our Western congregations, up in the hyperborean regions of lat. 42° N., and gave out a hymn, of which the fourth verse was to be omitted. The Bishop was his own choir, and sang the hymn, passing from the third to the fifth stanza. No sooner had he commenced the fifth than a stentorian voice sung out from the other end of the room, "Sa-ay, mister, you've skipped a verse there!"

THOUGH it is very common to reproach old bachelors with their celibacy, and to pity old maids as if "single blessedness" were a misfortune, yet many married people have seen fit to offer apologies for having entered into what some profane wag has called the "holy bands of padlock." One man says he married to get a housekeeper; another to get rid of bad company. Many women declare that they get married for the sake of a home; few acknowledge that their motive was to get a husband. Goethe averred that he got married in order to be "respectable." John Wilkes said he took a wife "to please his friends." Wycherly, who espoused his house-maid, said he did it "to spite his relations." A widow, who married a second husband, said she wanted somebody to condole with her for the loss of her first. Another because she thought a wedding would "amuse the children." Another to get rid of incessant importunity from a crowd of suitors. Old maids who get married invariably assure their friends that they thought they could be "more useful" as wives than spinsters. Nevertheless, we are of opinion that nine-tenths of all persons who marry, whether widows or widowers, virgins or bachelors, do so for the sake of—"getting married." But here is a side-view of the same matter in an anecdote: A country laird, at his death, left his property in equal shares to his two sons, who continued to live very amicably together for many years. At length one said to the other, "Tam, we're getting auld now; you'll tak' a wife, and when I dee you'll get my share of the grund." "Na, John, you're the youngest and maist active; you'll tak' a wife, and when I dee you'll get my share." "Od, Tam," said John, "that's just the way wi' you; when there's only fush or trouble, not a thing you'll do at a'."

A GOOD story is told in Lockhart's Life of Sir Walter Scott of a dinner-party where a pack of literary lions were fed and pitted one against the other. Scott was king of the board, but the rest were in league to humble him. Poets and poetry were the topics of the table, and Coleridge repeated some of his own pieces, which were praised to the skies. Scott joined in these eulogies as cordially as any body, until in his turn he was called on to repeat some of his own. He declined, but said he would repeat a little copy of verses he had met with in a provincial newspaper, and which seemed to him almost as good as any thing they had been listening to with so much pleasure. He repeated the stanzas of "Fire, Famine, and Slaughter." The applauses that ensued were faint. Then came slight criticisms, from which Scott defended the unknown author. At last a more bitter antagonist opened, and fastening upon one line cried, "This, at least, is absolute nonsense." Scott denied the charge, the critic persisted, till Coleridge, out of all patience, exclaimed, "For mercy's sake let Mr. Scott alone, I wrote the poem."

So much for criticism. If these wits had heard the verses from Mr. Coleridge as his own, they would have praised them sky high.

FROM NEBRASKA CITY a friend writes to the Drawer: "I have a niece out here, aged five years, whose father (like all other fathers) thinks his own just a little the smartest youngster there is going. One day, while visiting at my brother's house during his absence, Minnie cut some caper, for which I reproved her. She turned around, and, with no little asperity, replied, 'You sha'n't scold me. You ain't my papa, and don't understand my constitution.'

"A YEAR ago we had a little miss with us, the nine-year-old daughter of one of our ex-Governors, who is now at the head of one of the Keystone regiments. The Governor was much given to punning, and when about home always charged his good things to Bettie. The following may show that attributing good things to her was not always out of place. A number of us were in the cabin of a steamboat, lying at our levee, when a party of Pawnee Indians came on board. Some of the passengers wanted to see them dance, and made the request, to which the aborigines assented. Before dancing, however, one of them, who could speak a little English, thinking he had better be paid in advance, went among the passengers, holding his hand and demanding 'Two bits! Two bits! Two bits!' Being avaricious, he continued it long after a number of quarters had been dropped in his hand, and until he entirely exhausted the patience of Bettie, who exclaimed, 'Well, I wouldn't give him two bits, for I don't believe he can dance one bit!'"

QUITE a number of years ago there lived in the town of G—, Androscoggin County, Maine, a man by the name of L—. He was farmer, stage-driver, and hotel-keeper, and was blessed with a large family of boys. Among them was the hero of our yarn. Ide was the name that he was best known by. He was lean, long, lank, and scrawny. Always on hand to run of errands and do chores generally. One very hot day in July Ide was sent off about three miles to a mill with a large lot of grain to be ground. Unluckily for him there was quite a quantity in before he got there, so that it was late in the afternoon before the miller got to work upon Ide's lot. The water was low, consequently the millstones revolved rather slowly. Ide was hungry, and his inner man got uproarious, and looking up to the miller (Uncle Reuben), he says, "Uncle Reub, I can eat that meal faster than you grind it." "Ah, my boy," says Uncle Reuben, "how long could you do it?" "Why, till I starved to death!" said Ide. Uncle Reuben says that he never got such a shot before.

"THE army swore terribly in Flanders!" said my Uncle Toby, and probably in no case is an army wholly free from this vice. My paternal grandfather was in the Army of the Revolution, in rank a captain, and was personally acquainted with the celebrated Polish General, Kosciusko. In a skirmish with the enemy, on one occasion, the General could not make his men obey properly the orders he gave them; whether they would not, or whether they did not understand his broken English does not appear, but he became very angry, and railed and swore at them most terribly in his own tongue, of which they understood not a word, and consequently it made no impression. Seeing this, the General suddenly turned his horse and rode furiously up to my grandfather, saying, 'Captain G—, do come and curse them in English!' The old gentleman did not say whether or no he complied with the General's request.

"Another incident my grandfather often related, of which he was a witness. It was on an oppressively warm June morning that he, in company with a brother officer of the Continental army, Captain Pope, were journeying on horseback across the State of New Jersey, on their way to Massachusetts, on a furlough, when they were hailed every now and then by the farmers on the way, to inquire for news from the army, telegraphs and railroads not being then in use. They passed a barn on the side of the road in which they saw a man swingling flax. Seeing the travelers he ran out to the bars in front of the barn, calling after them to hear the news. The officers rode up to the bars and communicated whatever of news they had, and then fell into conversation with him about his farm. Every thing seemed out of repair, the buildings and fences going to decay, and a fine field of corn on the opposite side of the way was growing apace, but had not been hoed, and was now overtopped by weeds. 'Why do you not mend up your fences and your buildings?' they asked. Why, he intended to do it, but had no time. 'And why do you not hoe your corn, instead of being here swingling flax on this fine morning?' He answered that he intended to have had his flax 'done out' in the winter, but had no time; and now his wife wanted to spin some thread, and for her accommodation he was dressing a little flax. As the man was saying this, leaning over the fence, dripping with perspiration, and with all the clothing which could decently be spared laid aside, Captain Pope, watching his opportunity, drew his riding-whip most severely across the man's back as long as he could reach him, exclaiming, 'There, you scoundrel! if I ever catch you again swingling flax in June, when you should be hoeing your corn, I'll take your hide off!' They then put spurs to their horses and rode off, leaving the man swearing and stamping with impotent rage."

"LITTLE DUNCAN often asks some odd questions. The other evening, as he was sitting out on the piazza with his mother, he gazed intently up at the sky for a few moments, and turning to her, asked, 'Ma, ain't the stars God's eyes? I saw them a-blinkin'."

A SAILOR taking a walk in a field, perceived a bull advancing toward him, evidently with no good intentions. "Helm a lee, mess-mate!" he cried, at the top of his voice; "helm a lee!" The bull, not comprehending his injunction, leveled him with the ground. "There, you stupid!" said the tar, as he raised up—more in sorrow than in anger—on his elbow, "didn't I tell you you'd run foul?"

A FEW years since there resided in Utica several medical students, one of whom inquired of a mechanic what he was making. "A bell-wheel for the court-house," answered the workman. "Ah!" asked the student, "are we to have two bells in the village? I should think one would answer every purpose at present." "You are right," replied the other; "but when you young doctors commence the practice, one bell will not do all the tolling!"

THAT was hard on young physic; but this is better: A doctor lately informed his friends in a large company that he had been eight days in the country. "Yes," said one of the party, "it has been announced in the Times." "Ah!" said the doctor, stretching his neck importantly, "pray, in what terms?" "Why, as well as I can remember, in the following: 'There were last week seventy-seven interments less than the week before!'"

BOB F—— had long been paying the most devoted attentions to a young lady whose father had what is popularly known as the "rocks," when his attentions suddenly ceased, and of course every one was anxious to know the cause. Bob explained:

"You see, I knew she was rich, and I didn't think a bit the less of her for that; but, the truth of the matter is, she turned out to be a nay-Bob!"

FROM Buffalo the Drawer learns that a woman of the German persuasion was taken up for passing a bogus half dollar. She said that she had received it at the store of one of the first-class drygoods' men, and she could point out the man who gave it to her. The officer accompanied her to the store, and she surveyed the clerks.

"Is this the one?"

"Nix—no."

"This one?"

"Nix—no." Until her eye lighted on one across the store who gloried in a mustache of formidable dimensions and fiery hue.

"That is him—that man mit a big mouthful of hair!"

He denied it lustily, but she insisted; and he deemed it prudent to prune his lips and afterward avoid such an easy mark of recognition.

Our German fellow-citizens make rapid progress in learning our language and getting the hang of our institutions, but they would do well to get the schoolmaster to write their notices. The following is not so correct in its orthography as to be invulnerable to criticism. It appears conspicuously posted in Mahanoy City, Schuylkill County, Pennsylvania:

A NORWEGIAN FARM.

A FLYING TRIP THROUGH NORWAY.

SECOND PAPER.

EVERYwhere on the route through the interior I found the peasants kind, hospitable, and simple-hearted. Sometimes I made a detour of several miles from the main road for the purpose of catching a glimpse of the home-life of the farmers; and, imperfect as my means of communication were, I never had any difficulty in making acquaintance with them after announcing myself as a traveler from California. They had all heard, more or less, of that wonderful land of gold, and entertained the most vague and exaggerated notions of its mineral resources. It was not uncommon to find men who believed that the whole country was yellow with gold; that such quantities of that ore abounded in it as to be of little or no value. When I told them that the country was very rich in the precious metals, but that every hill was not a mass of gold, nor the bed of every river lined with rocks and pebbles of the same material, they looked a little incredulous, not to say disappointed. Many of them seemed surprised that a Californian should be traveling through a distant land like Norway merely for amusement, and few seemed to be entirely satisfied when I assured them, in answer to their questions, that I was not very rich; that I was neither a merchant, nor a speculator, nor the owner of gold mines, but simply an indifferent artist making sketches of their country for pastime. French, German, and English artists they could believe in, for they saw plenty of them in the wilds of Norway every summer; but what use would such a poor business be in California, they said, where every man could make a thousand dollars a day digging for gold? I even fancied they looked at my rough and dusty costume as if they thought it concealed a glittering uniform.

such as the rich men of my country must naturally wear when they go abroad to visit foreign lands. It was impossible to convince them that I was not extravagantly wealthy. On any other point there might be room for doubt, but the pertinacity with which they insisted upon that afforded me much amusement; and since I could not dispel the illusion, it generally cost me a few extra shillings when I had any thing to pay to avoid the stigma of meanness. Not that my extraordinary wealth ever gave them a plea for imposition or extortion. Such an idea never entered their heads. On the contrary, their main purpose seemed to be to show every possible kindness to the distinguished stranger; and more than once, at some of the post-stations, I had to remind them of things which they had omitted in the charge. For this very reason I was in a measure compelled to be rather more profuse than travelers usually are; so that the State from which I have the honor to hail owes me a considerable amount of money by this time for the handsome manner in which I have sustained its reputation. At some of the stopping-places on the road, where I obtained lodgings for the night, it was not uncommon to find intelligent and educated families of cultivated manners. Education of late years has made considerable progress in Norway; and the rising generation, owing to the facilities afforded by the excellent school system established throughout the country, but especially in the principal towns, will not be in any respect behind the times, so far as regards intellectual progress. It is the simplicity and honesty of these good people, however, that form their principal and most charming characteristic. To one long accustomed to sharp dealing and unscrupulous trickery it is really refreshing their confidence in the integrity of a stranger. Usually they left the settlement of accounts to myself, merely stating that I must determine what I owed by adding up the items according to the tariff; and although my knowledge of the language was so limited, I nowhere had the slightest approach to a dispute about the payment of expenses. On one occasion, not wishing to forfeit this confidence, I was obliged to ride back half a mile to pay for two cigars which I had forgotten in making up the reckoning, and of which the inn-keeper had not thought proper to remind me, or had forgotten to keep any account himself. No surprise was manifested at this conscientious act—the inn-keeper merely nodding good-naturedly when I handed him the money, with the remark that it was “all right.”

In the districts remote from the sea-ports the peasants, as may well be supposed, are extremely ignorant of the great outside world. Sweden and Denmark are the only countries known to them besides their own “Gamle Norge,” save such vague notions of other lands as they pick up from occasional travelers. To them “Amerika” is a terra incognita. A letter once or twice a year from some emigrant to the members of his family, goes the rounds of the district, and gives them all the knowledge they have of that distant land of promise; and when they listen, with gaping eyes and open mouths, to the wonderful stories of adventure, life, enterprise, and wealth detailed by the enthusiastic rover, it is no wonder they shake their heads and say that Christian, or Hans, or Olé (as the case may be), “always was a capital fellow at drawing a long bow.” They firmly believe in ghosts and supernatural visitations of all sorts, but are very incredulous about any country in the world being equal to “Gamle Norge.” Naturally enough they consider their climate the most genial, their barren rocks the most fertile, their government the best and most liberal on the face of the earth, and themselves the most highly favored of the human race. Goldsmith must have had special reference to the Norwegians when he sang of “that happiest spot below:”

“The shuddering tenant of the frigid zone Boldly proclaims the happiest spot his own.”

And why should they be otherwise than contented—if such a thing as contentment can exist upon earth? They have few wants and many children; a country free from internal commotion, and too far removed from the great scenes of European strife to excite the jealousy of external powers; sufficient food and raiment to satisfy the ordinary necessities of life, and no great extremes of wealth or poverty to militate against their independence, either in a political or social point of view. With good laws, an excellent Constitution, and a fair representation in the Storting, they are justly proud of their freedom, and deeply imbued with the spirit of patriotism.

Very little of poverty or beggary is to be seen by the wayside during a tour through Norway. Only at one point between Kringelen and Laurgaard—a wild and barren district exceedingly savage in its aspect, situated in a narrow gorge of the mountains near the head of the Logen—was I solicited for alms. A portion of this route, after passing Sinclair's Monument, is rudely fenced in so as to render available every foot of the narrow valley. The road passes directly through the little farms, which at this stage of the journey are poor and unproductive. The climate is said to be very severe in this district, in consequence of its altitude, and the sharp winds which sweep down from the mountain gorges. At every gateway a gang of ragged little children always stood ready to open the gate, for which of course they expected a few shillings; and as these gates occur at intervals of every few hundred yards for some distance, it produces a sensible effect upon one's purse to get through. Passing through some wretched hamlets in this vicinity crowds of old women hobbled out to beg alms, and I did not get clear of the regiments of children who ran along behind the cariole to receive the remainder of my small change for several miles. Strange to say, this was the only place during my rambles through the interior in which I saw any thing like beggary. Generally speaking, the farming lands are sufficiently productive to supply all the wants of the peasants, and many of the farmers are even comfortably situated.

The houses in which these country people reside are not altogether unlike the small log-cabins of the early settlers on our Western frontier. I have seen many such on the borders of Missouri and Kansas. Built in the most primitive style of pine logs, they stand upon stumps or columns of stone, elevated some two or three feet from the ground, in order to allow a draft of air underneath, which in this humid climate is considered necessary for health. They seldom consist of more than two or three rooms, but make up in number what they lack in size. Thus a single farming establishment often comprises some ten or a dozen little cabins, besides the large barn, which is the nucleus around which they all centre; with smaller cribs for pigs, chickens, etc., and here and there a shed for the cows and sheep, all huddled together among the rocks or on some open hill-side, without the least apparent regard to direction or architectural effect. The roofs are covered with sod, upon which it is not uncommon to see patches of oats, weeds, moss, flowers, or whatever comes most convenient to form roots and give consistency and strength to this singular overtopping. The object, I suppose, is to prevent the transmission of heat during the severe season of winter. Approaching some of these hamlets or farming establishments during the summer months, the traveler is frequently at a loss to distinguish their green-sodded roofs from the natural sod of the hill-sides, so that one is liable at any time to plunge into the midst of a settlement before he is aware of its existence. Something of a damp, earthy look about them, the weedy or grass-covered tops, the logs green and moss-grown, the dripping eaves, the veins of water oozing out of the rocks, give them a peculiarly northern and chilling effect, and fill the mind with visions of long and dreary winters, rheumatisms, colds, coughs, and consumptions, to which it is said these people are subject. Nothing so wild and primitive is to be seen in any other part of Europe. A silence almost death-like hangs over these little hamlets during a great part of the day, when the inhabitants are out in the hills attending their flocks or cultivating their small patches of ground. I passed many groups of cabins without seeing the first sign of life, save now and then a few chickens or pigs rooting about the barn-yard. The constant impression was that it was Sunday, or at least a holiday, and that the people were either at church or asleep. For one who seeks retirement from the busy haunts of life, where he can indulge in uninterrupted reflection, I know of no country that can equal Norway. There are places in the interior where I am sure he would be astonished at the sound of his own voice. The deserts of Africa can scarcely present a scene of such utter isolation. With a rod in his hand, he can, if given to the gentle art, sit and dream upon some mossy bank,

"In close covert by some brook,
Where no profaner eye may look
And hide him from day's garish noon."

Thus you often come upon an English sportsman waiting for a nibble.

WAITING FOR A NIBBLE.

The food of the peasants consists principally of black bread, milk, butter, and cheese. Meat is too expensive for very general use, though at certain seasons of the year they indulge in it once or twice a week. Coffee is a luxury to which they are much addicted. Even the poorest classes strain a point to indulge in this favorite narcotic; and in no part of Norway did I fail to get a good cup of coffee. It is a very curious fact that the best coffee to be had at the most fashionable hotels on the Continent of Europe—always excepting Paris—is inferior to that furnished to the traveler at the commonest station-house in Norway. This is indeed one of the luxuries of a tour through this part of Scandinavia. The cream is rich and pure, and it is a rare treat to get a large bowlful of it for breakfast, with as much milk as you please, and no limit to bread and butter. Your appetite is not measured by infinitesimal bits and scraps as in Germany. A good wholesome meal is spread before you in the genuine backwoods style, and you may eat as much as you please, which is a rare luxury to one who has been stinted and starved at the hotels on the Continent. I remember at one station beyond the Dovre Fjeld Bennett's Hand-Book says: "Few rooms, but food supplied in first-rate style when Miss Marit is at home. She will be much offended if you do not prove that you have a good appetite."

On my arrival at this place, not wishing to offend Miss Marit—for whom I entertained the highest respect in consequence of her hospitable reputation—I called for every thing I could think of, and when it was placed upon the table by that accomplished young lady (a very pleasant, pretty young woman, by-the-way), fell to work and made it vanish at a most astonishing rate. Miss Marit stood by approvingly. During a pause in my heavy labors I called the attention of this estimable person to her own name in the printed pamphlet, at which she blushed and looked somewhat confused. Possibly there might be a mistake about it.

"Your name is Miss Marit?" I asked, very politely.

"Ja."

"And this is Miss Marit in print?"

"Ja."

She took the book and tried to read it.

"Nikka Forstoe!"—she didn't understand.

"What does it say?" she asked, rather gravely.

Here was a job—to translate the paragraph into Norwegian! Besides, it would not do to translate it literally; so I made a sort of impromptu paraphrase upon it.

"Oh! it says Miss Marit is a very pretty young lady."

"Ja!"—blushing and looking somewhat astonished.

"And Miss Marit is a very nice housekeeper."

"Ja!"

"And Miss Marit makes splendid coffee, and thoroughly understands how to cook a beef-steak."

"Ja!"

"And Miss Marit would make a most excellent wife for any young gentleman who could succeed in winning her affections!"

"Nei!" said the young lady, blushing again, and looking more astonished than ever.

"Ja," said I, "it is all in print"—adding, with an internal reservation, "or ought to be."

Who can blame me for paying tribute to Miss Marit's kindness and hospitality? She is certainly deserving of much higher praise than that bestowed upon her, and I hope Mr. Bennett will pardon me for the liberal style of my translation. If he didn't mean all I said, let the responsibility rest upon me, for I certainly meant every word of it.

The farming districts are limited chiefly to the valleys along the river-courses, and such portions of arable lands as lie along the shores of the Fjords. A large proportion of the country is extremely wild and rugged, and covered, for the most part, with dense pine forests. The peasants generally own their own farms, which are small and cut up into patches of pasture, grain-lands, and tracts of forest. Even the most unpromising nooks among the rocks, in many parts of the Gudbrandsdalen Valley, where plows are wholly unavailable, are rooted up by means of hoes, and planted with oats and other grain.

I sometimes saw as many as forty or fifty of these little arable patches, perched up among the rocks, hundreds of feet above the roofs of the houses, where it would seem dangerous for goats to browse. The log-cabins peep out from among the rocks and pine-clad cliffs all along the course of the Logen, giving the country a singular speckled appearance. This, it must be remembered, is one of the best districts in the interior. The richest agricultural region is said to be that bordering on the shores of the Mïösen. One of the comforts enjoyed by the peasants, and without which it would scarcely be possible for them to exist in such a rigorous climate, consists in the unlimited quantity of fuel to which they have such easy access. This is an inconceivable luxury during the long winter months; and their large open fire-places and blazing fires, even in the cool summer evenings, constantly remind one of the homes of the settlers in the Far West. When the roads are covered with snow the true season of internal communication commences. Then the means of transportation and travel are greatly facilitated, and the clumsy wagons used in summer are put aside for the lighter and more convenient sledges with which every farmer is abundantly provided. All along the route the snow-plows may be seen turned up against the rocks, ready to be used during the winter to clear and level the roads. In summer the means of transportation are little better than those existing between Placerville and Carson Valley.

It was during the height of the harvesting season that I passed through the Gudbrandsdalen.

SNOW-PLOW.

One of the most characteristic sights at this time of the year is the extraordinary amount of labor imposed upon the women, who seem really to do most of the heavy work. I thought I had seen the last of that in the Thuringerwald, Odenwald, and Schwartzwald, while on a foot-tour through Germany; but even the Germans are not so far advanced in civilization in this respect as the Norwegians, who do not hesitate to make their women cut wood, haul logs, pull carts, row boats, fish, and perform various other kinds of labor usually allotted to the stronger sex, which even a German would consider rather heavy for his "frow." The men, in addition to this ungallant trait, are much addicted to the use of tobacco and native corn-brandy—which, however, I can not but regard as a sign of civilization, since the same habits exist, to some extent, in our own country. Chewing and drinking are just as common as in California, the most enlightened country in the world. Wherever I saw a set of drunken fellows roaring and rollicking at some wayside inn, their faces smeared with tobacco, and their eyes rolling in their heads, I naturally felt drawn toward them by the great free-masonry of familiar customs.

The system of farming followed by the peasants is exceedingly primitive, though doubtless well adapted to the climate and soil. Nothing can be more striking to a stranger than the odd shapes of the wagons and carts, and the rudeness of the agricultural implements, which must be patterned upon those in vogue during the time of Odin, the founder of the Norwegian race. Owing to the humidity of the climate, it is necessary in harvest time to dry the hay and grain by staking it out in the fields on long poles, so that the sun and air may penetrate every part of it. The appearance of a farm is thus rendered unique as well as picturesque. In the long twilight nights of summer these ghostly stakes present the appearance of a gang of heathenish spirits standing about in the fields, with their long beards waving in the air, and their dusky robes trailing over the stubbles. The figures thus seen at every turn of the road often assume the most striking spectral forms, well calculated to augment those wild superstitions which prevail throughout the country. It was impossible for me ever to get quite rid of the idea that they were descendants of the old Scandinavian gods, holding counsel over the affairs of the nation, especially when some passing breeze caused their arms and robes to flutter in the twilight, and their heads to swing to and fro, as if in the enthusiasm of their ghostly deliberations.

Mingled with the wild superstitions of the people their piety is a prominent trait. Their prevailing religion is Episcopal Lutheran, though Catholicism and other religions are tolerated by an act of the Storting, with the exception of Mormonism, which is prohibited by law. A considerable number of proselytes to that sect have emigrated to Salt Lake. This prevailing spirit of piety is observable even in the wildest parts of the country, where every little hamlet has its church, and neither old nor young neglect their religious services. Most of these churches are built of wood, with a steeple of the same material, shingled over and painted black, so as to present the most striking contrast to the snows which cover the face of the country during the greater part of the year.

The parish school-master is a most important personage in these rural districts.—He it is who trains up the rising generation, teaches the young idea how to shoot, and “Out of great things and small draweth the secrets of the universe.”

He is greatly revered by the simple-minded old farmers, is cherished and respected by the mothers of families, enthusiastically admired and generally aspired to by the village belles, and held in profound awe by all the little urchins of the neighborhood. He speaketh unknown tongues; he diveth into the depths of abstruse sciences; he talketh with the air of one burdened with much learning; he “argueth the cycles of the stars from a pebble flung by a child;” he likewise teacheth reading, writing, and arithmetic, and applieth the rod to the juvenile seat of understanding. Opposite you have him to the life.

Soon after leaving Storkterstad—a station about two days’ journey from Lillehammer, on the main road to Trondhjem, I passed through a very steep and rugged defile in the mountains, with jagged rocks on the right and the foaming waters of the Logen on the left, where my attention was called by the skydskaarl to a small monument by the roadside bearing an inscription commemorative of the death of Colonel Sinclair. If I remember correctly, a fine description is given of this celebrated passage by Mögge, whose graphic sketches of Norwegian scenery I had frequent occasion to admire, during my tour, for their beauty and accuracy. I fully agree with my friend Bayard Taylor, that the traveler can find no better guide to the Fjelds and Fjords of this wild country than “Afraja” and “Life and Love in Norway.” Laing has also given an interesting account of the massacre of Colonel Sinclair's party. From his version of this famous incident in Norwegian history it appears that, during the war between Christian the Fourth of Denmark and Gustavus Adolphus of Sweden, while the Danes held the western coast of Norway, Colonel Sinclair, a Scotchman, desiring to render assistance to the Swedes, landed at Romsdalen, on the coast, with a party of nine hundred followers. Another detachment of his forces landed at Trondhjem. It was their intention to fight their way across the mountains and join the Swedish forces on the frontier. Sinclair's party met with no resistance till they arrived at the pass of Kringelen, where three hundred peasants, hearing of their approach, had prepared an ambush. Every thing was arranged with the utmost secrecy. An abrupt mountain on the right, abounding in immense masses of loose rock, furnished the means of a terrible revenge for the ravages committed by the Scotch on their march from Romsdalen. The road winds around the foot of this mountain, making a narrow pass, hemmed in by the roaring torrents of the Logen on the one side and abrupt cliffs on the other. Across the river, which here dashes with frightful rapidity through the narrow gorge of the mountains, the country wears an exceedingly weird and desolate aspect; the ravines and summits of the mountains are darkened by gloomy forests of pine, relieved only by hoary and moss-covered cliffs overhanging the rushing waters of the Logen. On the precipitous slopes of the pass, hundreds of feet above the road, the peasants gathered enormous masses of rock, logs of wood, and even trunks of trees, which they fixed in such a way that, at a moment's notice, they could precipitate the whole terrible avalanche upon the heads of the enemy.

Such was the secrecy with which the peasants managed the whole affair that the Scotch, ignorant even of the existence of a foe, marched along in imaginary security till they reached the middle of the narrow pass, when they were suddenly overwhelmed and crushed beneath the masses of rocks and loose timbers launched upon them by the Norwegians. Rushing from their ambush the infuriated peasants soon slaughtered the maimed and wounded—leaving, according to some authorities, only two of the enemy to tell the tale. Others, however, say that as many as sixty escaped, but were afterward caught and massacred. Attached to this fearful story of retribution, Laing mentions a romantic incident, which is still currently told in the neighborhood. A young peasant was prevented from joining in the attack by his sweet-heart, to whom he was to be married the next day. She, learning that the wife of Colonel Sinclair was among the party, sent her lover to offer his assistance; but the Scotch lady, mistaking his purpose, shot him dead. Such is the tragic history that casts over this wild region a mingled interest of horror and romance.

The road from Laurgaard beyond the pass of the Kringelen ascends a high mountain. On the right is a series of foaming cataracts, and nothing can surpass the rugged grandeur of the view as you reach the highest eminence before descending toward Braendhagen. Here the country is one vast wilderness of pine-clad mountains, green winding valleys, and raging torrents of water dashing down over the jagged rocks thousands of feet below. It was nearly night when I reached Dombaas, the last station before ascending the Dovre Fjeld.

A telegraphic station at Dombaas gives something of a civilized aspect to this stopping-place, otherwise rather a primitive-looking establishment. The people, however, are very kind and hospitable, and somewhat noted for their skill in carving bone and wooden knife-handles. I should have mentioned that, wild as this part of the country is, the traveler is constantly reminded by the telegraphic poles all along the route that he is never quite beyond the limits of civilization. Such is the force of habit that I was strongly tempted to send a message to somebody from Dombaas; but upon turning the matter over in my mind could think of nobody within the limits of Norway who felt sufficient interest in my explorations to be likely to derive much satisfaction from the announcement that I had reached the edge of the Dovre Fjeld in safety. The name of a waiter who was good enough to black my boots at the Victoria Hotel occurred to me, but it was hardly possible he would appreciate a telegraphic dispatch from one who had no more pressing claims to his attention. I thought of sending a few lines of remembrance to the Wild Girl who had come so near breaking my neck. This notion, however, I gave over upon reflecting that she might attach undue weight to my expressions of friendship, and possibly take it into her head that I was making love to her—than which nothing could be farther from my intention. I had a social chat with the telegraph-man, however—a very respectable and intelligent person—who gave me the latest news; and with this, and a good supper and bed, I was obliged to rest content.

Leaving Dombaas at an early hour I soon began to ascend a long slope, reaching, by a gradual elevation, to the Dovre Fjeld. The vegetation began to grow more and more scanty on the wayside, consisting mostly of lichens and reindeer moss. I passed through some stunted groves of pine, which however were bleached and almost destitute of foliage. The ground on either side of the road was soft, black, and boggy, abounding in springs and scarcely susceptible of cultivation. At this elevation grain is rarely planted, though I was told potatoes and other esculents are not difficult to raise. On the left of the road, approaching the summit, lies a range of snow-capped mountains between the Dovre Fjeld and Molde; on the right a series of rocky and barren hills of sweeping outline, presenting an exceedingly desolate aspect. In the course of an hour after leaving Dombaas, having walked most of the way, I fairly reached the grand plateau of the Dovre Fjeld. The scene at this point of the journey is inexpressibly desolate.

Bare, whitish-colored hills bound the horizon on the right; in front is a dreary waste, through which the road winds like a thread till lost in the dim haze of the distance; and to the left the everlasting snows of Snachatten. A few wretched cabins are scattered at remote intervals over the desert plains, in which the shepherds seek shelter from the inclemency of the weather, which even in mid-summer is often piercingly raw. Herds of cattle, sheep, and goats were grazing over the rocky wastes of the Fjeld. Reindeer are sometimes seen in this vicinity, but not often within sight of the road. The only vegetation produced here is reindeer moss, and a coarse sort of grass growing in bunches over the plain. I met several shepherds on the way dressed in something like a characteristic costume—frieze jackets, with brass buttons, black knee-breeches, a red night-cap, and armed with the usual staff or shepherd's crook, represented in pictures, and much discoursed of by poets:

"Methinks it were a happy life

To be no better than a homely swain;"

but not on the Dovre Fjelds of Norway. It must be rather a dull business in that region, taking into consideration the barren plains, the bleak winds, and desolate aspect of the country.

No sweet hawthorn bushes are there, beneath which these rustic philosophers can sit—

"Looking on their silly sheep."

Shepherd life must be a very dismal reality indeed. And yet there is no accounting for tastes. At one point of the road, beyond Folkstuen, where a sluggish lagoon mingles its waters with the barren slopes of the Fjeld, I saw an Englishman standing up to his knees in a dismal marsh fishing for trout.

The weather was cold enough to strike a chill into one's very marrow; yet this indefatigable sportsman had come more than a thousand miles from his native country to enjoy himself in this way. He was a genuine specimen of an English snob—self-sufficient, conceited, and unsociable; looking neither to the right nor the left, and terribly determined not to commit himself by making acquaintance with casual travelers speaking the English tongue. I stopped my cariole within a few paces and asked him "what luck?" One would think the sound of his native tongue would have been refreshing to him in this dreary wilderness; but without deigning to raise his head, he merely answered in a gruff tone, "Don't know, Sir—don't know!" I certainly did not suspect him of knowing much, but thought that question at least would not be beyond the limits of his intelligence. Finding him insensible to the approaches of humanity, I revenged myself for his rudeness by making a sketch of his person, which I hope will be recognized by his friends in England should he meet with any misfortune in the wilds of Norway. They will at least know where to search for his body, and be enabled to recognize it when they find it. This man's sense of enjoyment reminded me of the anecdote told by Longfellow in Hyperion, of an Englishman who sat in a tub of cold water every morning while he ate his breakfast and read the newspapers.

I met with many such in the course of my tour. Is it not a little marvelous what hardships people will encounter for pleasure? Here was a man of mature age, in the enjoyment perhaps of a comfortable income, who had left his country, with all its attractions, for a dreary desert in which he was utterly isolated from the world. He was not traveling—not reading, not surrounded by a few congenial friends who could make a brief exile pleasant, but utterly alone; ignorant no doubt of the language spoken by the few shepherds in the neighborhood; up to his knees in a pool of cold water; stubbornly striving against the most adverse circumstances of wind and weather to torture out of the water a few miserable little fish! Of what material can such a man's brain be composed, if he be gifted with brain at all? Is it mud, clay, or water; or is it all a bog? Possibly he was a lover of nature; but if you examine his portrait you will perceive that there is nothing in his personal appearance to warrant that suspicion. Even if such were the case, this was not the charming region described by the quaint old Walton, where the scholar can turn aside "toward the high honey-suckle hedge," or "sit and sing while the shower falls upon the teeming earth, viewing the silver streams glide silently toward their centre, the tempestuous sea," beguiled by the harmless lambs till, with a soul possessed with content, he feels "lifted above the earth." Nor was the solitary angler of the Dovre Fjeld a man likely to be lifted from the earth by any thing so fragile as the beauties of nature. His weight—sixteen stone at least—would be much more likely to sink him into it.

As I approached the neighborhood of Djerkin on the Dovre Fjeld, famous as a central station for hunting expeditions, I met several English sportsmen armed with rifles, double-barreled guns, pistols, and other deadly weapons, on their way to the defiles of the adjacent mountains in search of the black bears, which are said to infest that region. One of these enthusiastic gentlemen was seated in a cariole, and traveled for some distance in front of me. Taking into view the rotundity of his person, which overhung the little vehicle on every side, I could not but picture to myself the extraordinary spectacle that would be presented to any observant eye in case this ponderous individual should suddenly come in contact with one of those ferocious animals.

ENGLISH SPORTSMAN.

Here you have him, just as he sat before me—a back view, to be sure, but the only one I could get in the emergency of the moment. It will be easy to imagine, from the dextrous grace of his figure, how he will bound over the rocks, climb up the rugged points of the precipices, hang by the roots and branches of trees, dodge the attacks of the enemy, crawl through the brush, and, in the event of an unfavorable turn in the battle, retreat to some position of security.

No man can be blamed for running when he is sure to be worsted in an encounter of this kind. Many a brave Californian has taken to his heels when pursued by a grizzly, and I have scarcely a doubt that I would pursue the same course myself under similar circumstances. Only it must look a little ludicrous to see a fat Englishman, a representative of the British Lion, forced to adopt this mortifying alternative rather than suffer himself to be torn into beef-steaks. It may be, however, that in this instance our Nimrod has suddenly discovered that it is about dinner-time, and is hurrying back to camp lest the beef should be overdone.

These bear-hunting Englishmen take care to have as many chances on their own side as possible. Hence they usually go into the mountains well provided with guides, ammunition, provisions, etc., and prepare the way by first securing the bear in some favored locality. This is done by killing a calf or hog and placing the carcass in the required position. A hired attendant lies in wait until he discovers the bear, when he comes down to the station or camp and notifies the hunter that it is time to start out. Thus the risk of life is greatly reduced, and the prospect of securing some game proportionally augmented. The black bears of Norway are not very dangerous, however, and hunted in this manner it requires no great skill to kill them. They are generally to be found in the higher mountains and defiles, a few miles from some farming settlement. In winter, when their customary food is scarce, they often commit serious depredations upon the stock of the farmers. Every facility is freely afforded by the peasants for their destruction, and every bear killed is considered so many cattle saved.

It was late in the afternoon when I descended a rocky and pine-covered hill, and came in sight of the station called Djerkin—celebrated as one of the best in the interior of Norway. This place is kept by an old Norwegian peasant family of considerable wealth, and is a favorite resort of English sportsmen bound on fishing and hunting excursions throughout the wilds of the Dovre

Fjeld. The main buildings and outhouses are numerous and substantial, and stand on the slope of the hill which forms the highest point of the Fjeld on the road from Christiania to Trondhjem. The appearance of this isolated group of buildings on the broad and barren face of the hill had much in it to remind me of some of the old missionary establishments in California; and the resemblance was increased by the scattered herds of cattle browsing upon the parched and barren slopes of the Fjeld, which in this vicinity are as much like the old Ranch lands of San Diego County as one region of country wholly different in climate can be like another. A few cultivated patches of ground near the station, upon which the peasants were at work gathering in the scanty harvest, showed that even in this rigorous region the attempts at agriculture were not altogether unsuccessful. As usual, the principal burden of labor seemed to fall upon the women, who were digging, hoeing, and raking with a lusty will that would have done credit to the men.

I must say that of all the customs prevailing in the different parts of Europe, not excepting the most civilized states of Germany, this one of making the women do all the heavy work strikes me as the nearest approximation to the perfection of domestic discipline. The Diggers of California and the Kaffres of Africa understand this thing exactly, and no man of any spirit belonging to those tribes would any more think of performing the drudgery which he imposes upon his wife and daughters than a German or a Norwegian. What is the use of having wives and children if they don't relieve us of our heavy work? In that respect we Americans are very much behind the times. We pay such absurd devotion to the weakness of woman that they rule us with a despotism unknown in any other country. Their smiles are threats, and their tears are despotic manifestoes, against which the bravest of us dare not rebel. It is absolutely horrible to think of the condition of servitude in which we are placed by the extraordinary powers vested in, and so relentlessly exercised by, the women of America. I, for one, am in favor of a revival of the old laws of Nuremberg, by which female tyranny was punished. By a decree of the famous Council of Eight any woman convicted of beating her husband or otherwise maltreating him was forced to wear a dragon's head for the period of three days; and if she did not, at the expiration of that date, ask his pardon, she was compelled to undergo a regimen of bread and water for the space of three weeks, or until effectually reduced to submission. Something must be done, or we shall be compelled sooner or later to adopt a clause in the Constitution prohibiting from admission the State of Matrimony. What would the ladies do then? I think that would bring them to their senses.

Not only in the matter of domestic discipline, but of business and pleasure, are the people of Europe infinitely ahead of us. In France many of the railway stations are attended by female clerks, and in Germany the beer-saloons are ornamented by pretty girls, who carry around the foaming schoppens, having a spare smile and a joke for every customer. Of opera-singers, dancers, and female fiddlers, the most famous are produced in Europe. The wheeling girls of Hamburg, who roll after the omnibuses in circus fashion, are the only specimens in the line of popular attractions that I have not yet seen in the streets or public resorts of New York.

What would be thought of half a dozen of these street acrobats rolling down Broadway or Fifth Avenue? Doubtless they would attract considerable attention, and probably turn many a good penny. I fancy the Bowery boys would enjoy this sort of thing. A pretty girl of sixteen or seventeen, with her crinoline securely bundled up between her ankles, wheeling merrily along after an omnibus at the rate of five miles an hour would be an attractive as well as extraordinary spectacle. For my part, I would greatly prefer it to our best female lectures on phrenology or physiology. I think a girl who can roll in that way must be possessed of uncommon genius. The wheeling boys of London are but a clumsy spectacle compared with this. No man of sensibility can witness such a sight without regarding it as the very poetry of motion.

But this digression has led me a little out of the way. I was on the road to Djerkin. A sharp pull of half a mile up the hill brought me to the door of the station, where I was kindly greeted by the family. Descending from my cariole a little stiff after the last long stage, I entered the general sitting-room, where there was a goodly assemblage of customers smoking and drinking, and otherwise enjoying themselves. The landlady, however, would not permit me to stop in such rude quarters, but hurried me at once into the fine room of the establishment. While she was preparing a venison steak and some coffee I took a survey of the room, which was certainly ornamented in a very artistical manner. The sofa was covered with little scraps of white net-work; the bureau was dotted all over with little angels made of gauze, highly-colored pin-cushions, and fanciful paper boxes and card-stands. The walls were decorated with paintings of cows, stags, rocks, waterfalls, and other animals, and gems of Norwegian scenery, the productions of the genius of the family—the oldest son, a Justice of the Peace for the District, now absent on business at Christiania. They were very tolerably executed. The old lady was so proud of them that she took care to call my attention to their merits immediately upon entering the room, informing me, with much warmth of manner, that her son was a highly respectable man, of wonderful talents, who had held the honorable position of Justice of the Peace for the past ten years; and that there was something in my face that reminded her of her dear boy. In fact, she thought our features bore a striking resemblance—only Hansen had rather a more melancholy expression, his wife having unfortunately died about three years ago (here the poor old lady heaved a profound sigh). But I could judge for myself. There was his portrait, painted by a German artist who spent some months at this place last summer. I looked at the portrait with some curiosity. It was that of a man about forty years of age, with a black skull-cap on his head, a long queue behind, and a pair of spectacles on his nose—his face very thin and of a cadaverous expression; just such a man as you would expect to find upon a justice's bench of a country district in Norway. Was it possible I bore any resemblance to this learned man? The very idea was so startling, not to say flattering, that I could hardly preserve my composure. I mumbled over something to the effect that it was a good face—for scenic purposes; but every time I tried to acknowledge the likeness to myself the words stuck in my throat. Finally, I was forced to ask the landlady if she would be so kind as to bring me a glass of brandy-wine; for I was afraid she would discover the internal convulsions which threatened every moment to rend my ribs asunder. While she was looking after the brandy-wine I made a hasty copy of the portrait, and I now leave it to the impartial reader to decide upon the supposed resemblance. It may be like me; but I confess the fact never would have impressed itself upon my mind from any personal observation of my own countenance taken in front of a looking-glass.

MODEL LANDLORD.

There was something so genial and cozy about the inn at Djerkin that I partially resolved to stop all night. At dinner-time the landlord made his appearance steaming hot from the kitchen. I no longer hesitated about staying. I am a great believer in the physiognomy of inns as well as of landlords. Traveling through a wild country like Norway, where there is little beyond the scenery to attract attention, the unpretending stations by the wayside assume a degree of importance equaled only by the largest cities in other countries. The approach, the aspect of the place, the physiognomy of the house, become matters of the deepest interest to the solitary wayfarer, who clings to these episodes in the day's journey as the connecting links that bind him to the great family of man. I claim to be able to tell from the general expression of an inn, commencing at the chimney-top and ending at the steps of the front door, exactly what sort of cheer is to be had within—whether the family are happily bound together in bonds of affection; how often the landlord indulges in a bout of hard drinking; and the state of control under which he is kept by the female head of the establishment; nay, I can almost guess from the general aspect of the house the exact weight and digestive capacity of mine host, for if the inn promise well for the creature comforts, so will the inn-keeper. And what can be more cheering to a tired wayfarer than to be met at the door by a jolly red-faced old fellow—beef-steaks in the expression of his eye; his bald pate the fac-simile of a rump of mutton; plum-puddings and apple-dumplings in every curve of his chin; his body the living embodiment of a cask of beer supported by two pipes of generous wine; the whole man overflowing with rich juices and essences, gravies, and strong drinks—a breathing incarnation of all the good things of life, whom to look upon is to feel good-natured and happy in the present, and hopeful for the future; such a man, in short, as mine host of the Golden Crown, whose portrait I have endeavored to present.

If there be any likeness between myself and the son it certainly does not extend to the father. He carries in his hands a steaming hot plum-pudding; he is a model landlord, and delights in feeding his customers. His voice is greasy like his face. When he laughs it is from his capacious stomach the sounds come. His best jokes are based upon his digestive organs. He gets a little boozy toward evening, but that is merely a hospitable habit of his to prove that his liquors are good. You commit yourself at once to his keeping with a delightful consciousness that in his hands you are safe. He is not a man to suffer an honest customer to starve. Nature, in her prodigality, formed him upon a generous pattern. Whatever does other people good likewise does him good. May he live a thousand years—mine host of the

DRIVSDAL VALLEY.

Golden Crown!—and may his shadow never be less!

The next morning I proceeded on my way resolved, if ever I came this route again, to spend a week at Djerkin. A withered old man accompanied me on the back of the cariole. After half an hour's hard climbing up a very steep hill we reached the highest point of the Dovre Fjeld, 4594 feet above the level of the sea. From this point the view is exceedingly weird and desolate. Owing to the weather, however, which was dark and threatening, I did not stop long to enjoy the view of the barren wastes that lay behind, but was soon dashing at a slapping pace down into the valley of the Drivsdal—one of the most rugged and picturesque in Norway.

My journey down the valley of the Drivsdal was both pleasant and interesting. A beautiful new road commences at Kongsvold, the last station on the Dovre Fjeld, after passing Djerkin, and follows the winding of the river through the narrow gorges of the mountains all the way to Ny Orne. On each side towering and pine-covered mountains rear their rugged crests, sometimes approaching so close to the river as to overhang the road, which for miles on a stretch is hewn from the solid rock.

The innumerable clefts and fissures that mark the rugged fronts of the cliffs; the overhanging trees and shrubbery; the toppling boulders of granite, balanced in mid-air; the rushing torrents that dash from the moss-covered rocks; the seething and foaming waters of the Driv, whirling through the narrow gorges hundreds of feet below the road; the bright blue sky overhead, and the fitful gleams of sunshine darting through the masses of pine and circling into innumerable rainbows in the spray of the river, all combine to form a scene of incomparable beauty and grandeur such as I have rarely seen equaled in any part of the world, and only surpassed by the Siskiyou Mountains in the northern part of California.

About midway down the valley, after passing the settlement of Rise, I stopped to examine a curious passage of the river in the neighborhood of the Drivstuklere, where it dashes down between two solid walls of rocks, which at this point approach so as to form a passage of not more than fifteen feet in width. Securing my cariole horse to a tree by the side of the road, I descended a steep bank under the guidance of my skydskaarl, a bright little fellow about ten years of age, who first called my attention to this remarkable phenomenon. I was soon compelled to follow his example and crawl over the rocks like a caterpillar to avoid falling into the frightful abyss below. For a distance of fifty or sixty yards the river, compressed within a limit of fifteen feet, dashes with fearful velocity through its rugged and tortuous boundaries, filling the air with spray and making an angry moan, as if threatening momentarily to tear the rocks from their solid beds, and sweep them into the broad and sullen pool below.

The trembling of the massive boulder upon which I lay outstretched peering into the raging abyss, the fierce surging of the waters, the whirling clouds of spray, and gorgeous prismatic colors that flashed through them, created an impression that the whole was some wild, mad freak of the elements, gotten up to furnish the traveler with a startling idea of the wonders and beauties of Norwegian scenery.

Late one evening I arrived at a lonely little station by the wayside, not far beyond the valley of the Drivsdal. I was cold and hungry, and well disposed to enjoy whatever good cheer the honest people who kept the inn might have in store for me. The house and outbuildings were such as belong to an ordinary farming establishment, and did not promise much in the way of entertainment. Upon entering the rustic door-way I was kindly greeted by the host—a simple, good-natured looking man—who, as usual, showed me into the best room. Now, I am not aware of any thing in my appearance that entitles me to this distinction; but it has generally been my fate in this sort of travel to be set apart and isolated from the common herd in the fancy room of the establishment, which I have always found to be correspondingly the coldest and most uncomfortable. It is a great annoyance in Norway to be treated as a gentleman. The commonest lout can enjoy the cozy glow and social gossip of the kitchen or ordinary sitting-room; but the traveler whom these good people would honor must sit shivering and alone in some great barn of a room because it contains a sofa, a bureau, a looking-glass, a few mantle-piece ornaments, and an occasional picture of the King or some member of the royal family. I have walked up and down these dismal chambers for hours at a time, staring at the daubs on the walls and picking up little odds and ends of ornaments and gazing vacantly at them, till I felt a numbness steal all over me, accompanied by a vague presentiment that I was imprisoned for life. The progress of time is a matter of no importance in Norway. To an American, accustomed to see every thing done with energy and promptness, it is absolutely astounding—the indifference of these people to the waste of hours. They seem to be forever asleep, or doing something that bears no possible reference to their ostensible business. If you are hungry and want something to eat in a few minutes, the probability is you will be left alone in the fine room for several hours, at the expiration of which you discover that the inn-keeper is out in the stable feeding his horses, his wife in the back-yard looking after the chickens, and his children sitting at a table in the kitchen devouring a dish of porridge. Upon expressing your astonishment that nothing is ready, the good man of the house says—"Ja! it will be ready directly, min Herr!" and if you are lucky it comes in another hour—a cup of coffee and some bread perhaps, which you could just as well have had in ten minutes. Patience may be a virtue in other countries, but it is an absolute necessity in Norway. I believe, after the few weeks' experience I had on the road to Trondhjem, I could without difficulty sit upon a monument and smile at grief.

Perceiving through the cracks of the door that there was a good fire in the kitchen, and hearing the cheerful voices of the man and his wife, varied by the merry whistle of my skydskaarl, I made bold to go in and ask leave to stand by the fire. The good people seemed a little astonished at first that a person of quality like myself should prefer the kitchen to the fine room with the sofa and bureau, the mantle-piece ornaments and pictures of the royal family; but by dint of good-humored gossip about the horses, and an extravagant compliment thrown in about the beauty of the landlady's children—for which I hope to be pardoned—I secured a comfortable seat by the fire, and was soon quite at home. The great open fire-place, the blazing pine logs, the well-smoked hobs, the simmering pots and steaming kettles, had something indescribably cheerful about them; and lighting my pipe, I puffed away cozily during the pauses in the conversation, having a delightful consciousness that nature had peculiarly adapted me for the vulgar enjoyments of life, and that every thing approaching the refinements of civilization was a great bore. It was doubtless this taint of the savage in my disposition that made me look with such horror upon neat rooms and civilized furniture, and fall back with such zest upon the primitive comforts of savage life. When I told the people of the house that I was all the way from California—that I had come expressly to see their country—there was no end to the interest and excitement. "Dear me!" they cried, "and you have traveled a long way! You must be very tired! And you must be very rich to travel so far! Ah Gott—how wonderful!" "Did you come all the way in a cariole?" inquired the simple-minded host. "No; I came part of the way by sea, in a great ship." "How wonderful!" "And what sort of horses had they in California?" I told some tough stories about the mustang horses, in which the landlord was profoundly interested, for I soon discovered that horses were his great hobby. Whatever we talked of, he invariably came back to horse-flesh. His head was overrunning with horses. I praised his cariole horses, and he was enchanted. He gave me the pedigree of every horse in his stable—scarcely a word of which I understood—and then wound up by telling me he was considered the best judge of horses in all Norway. I did not think there was much in his appearance indicative of the shrewd horse-jockey, but was soon convinced of his shrewdness, for he informed me confidentially he had drawn the great prize at the last annual horse-fair at Christiania, and if I didn't believe it he would show it to me! I tried to make him understand that I had no doubt at all what he said was strictly true; but not satisfied at this expression of faith in his word, he went to a big wooden chest in the corner and took out a bag of money, which he placed upon the middle of the table with a proud smile of triumph. "That," said he, "is the prize! A hundred and fifty silver dollars—silver, mind you—all SILVER!" But perhaps I didn't believe it was a prize? Well, he would convince me of that. So he left the bag of money on the table and went into a back room to get the certificate of the Society, in which it was all duly written out, with his name in large letters, the paper being neatly framed in a carved frame, the work of his own hands. There it was; I could read for myself! I tried to read it to oblige him, and as I blundered over the words he took it into his head that I was still incredulous. "Nai! nai!" said he, "you shall see the money! You shall count it for yourself!" In vain I strove to convince him that I was entirely satisfied on the subject—that he must not go to so much trouble on my account. "Nai! nai!" cried the enthusiastic dealer in horse-flesh, "it is no trouble. You shall see the money WITH YOUR OWN EYES!" And forthwith he untied the string of the bag, and poured out the shining dollars in a pile on the middle of the table. His good wife stood by, professing to smile, but I suspected, from the watchful expression of her eye, that she did not feel quite at ease. The skydskaarl leaned over with a general expression of the most profound astonishment and admiration. "See!" cried the old man; "this is the prize—every dollar of it. But you must count it—I'll help you—so!" As there was no getting over the task imposed upon me without hurting his feelings, I had to sit down and help to count the money—no very pleasant job for a hungry man. After summing up our respective piles there appeared to be only a hundred and forty-nine dollars—just a dollar short. "Lieb Gott!" cried the man, "there must be a mistake! Let us count it again!" I felt that there was a necessity for counting it very carefully this time, for the landlady's eye was on me with a very searching expression. "Een, to, tre, five, fem, sex," and so on for nearly half an hour, when we summed up our counts again. This time it was only a hundred and forty-eight dollars—just two dollars short! The old man scratched his head and looked bewildered. The landlady moved about nervously, and stared very hard at me. It was getting to be rather an embarrassing affair. I blamed myself for being so foolishly drawn into it. Wishing to know if there really was dently displeased at the whole proceeding. "A fool, eh? A fool!" muttered the old man; "you do well to call me a fool before strangers!" "Ja, that's the way! I always told you so!" screamed the woman, in rising tones of anger, "you'll lose all your money yet!" "Lose it!" retorted the man; "don't you see I have made ten dollars by counting it to-night! There! count it yourself, and hold your peace, woman!" Here the wife, suppressing her wrath, made a careful and deliberate count, which resulted in the exact sum of a hundred and fifty dollars! I was much relieved; but by this time the old man, unable to bear the torrent of reproaches heaped upon him by his good wife for his stupidity, swore she must have made a mistake. He was sure he had counted a hundred and sixty. Therefore he would count it again, all alone, which he proceeded to do, very slowly and cautiously. This time the result was a hundred and fifty-five dollars. "The devil's in it!" cried the astonished dealer; "there's some magic about it! I don't understand it. I must count it again!" The woman, however, being satisfied that it was all right, I now thought it best a mistake, I begged my host to let me count it alone, which I did by making fifteen piles of ten dollars each, carefully counting every pile. It was all right, the whole amount was there, a hundred and fifty dollars. "All right!" said I, much relieved; "don't you see, every pile is exactly the same height!" "Ja! ja!" said the man, "but I don't understand it. Here, wife, you and I must count it!" So the wife sat down, and they both began counting the money, varying every time they compared notes from two to ten dollars. Once they had it a hundred and sixty dollars. "The devil is in the money!" exclaimed the horse-dealer; "I'm certain I counted right." "And so am I!" said the woman; "I can not be mistaken. It is you who have made the mistake! You always were a stupid old fool about money!" This she said with some degree of asperity; for she was evi-to return to my seat by the fire, where she soon began to busy herself preparing the supper, turning round now and then of course to let off a broadside at her old man. She took occasion to inform me, during the progress of her culinary labors, that he was a very good sort of man, but was somewhat addicted to brandy-wine, of which he had partaken a little too freely on the present occasion. I must excuse him. She would send him to bed presently. And now, if I pleased, supper was ready.

I could not help thinking, as I lay in bed that night, how lucky it was for these simple-minded people that they lived in the interior of Norway. Even in California, where public and private integrity is the prevailing trait of the people, it would hardly be considered safe to pull out a bag of money at a wayside inn and show it to every passing stranger. I have known men there in high public positions whom I would scarcely like to tempt in that way, especially if there was money enough in the bag to make robbery respectable.

All along the route during the next day the scenery was a continued feast of enjoyment. In looking back over it now, however, after the lapse of several months, it would be difficult to recall any thing beyond its general features—pine-covered mountains, green valleys, dark rocky glens, foaming torrents of water, and groups of farm-houses by the wayside. At Bjerkager I reached the first of the “slow-stations;” that is to say, the established post-houses, where a margin of three hours is allowed for a change of horses. I had supposed that in a country, and on a public route, where during the summer there must be considerable travel, it would hardly be possible that so long a delay could take place; but in this I was mistaken. The slow-stations are emphatically slow; the keepers are slow, the horses are slow, the whole concern is slow. From Bjerkager to Garlid, and from Garlid to Hov, including all delays, a distance of three hours and a half ordinary time, it took me all day. No entreaties, no offers of extra compensation, no expressions of impatience produced the slightest effect. The people at these places were not to be hurried. Kind and good-natured as they were in appearance and expression, I found them the most bull-headed and intractable race of beings on the face of the earth.

I was particularly struck with the depressing lethargy that hung over a wretched little place called Soknaes, which I made out to reach the next morning. A dead silence reigned over the miserable huddle of buildings by the roadside. The houses looked green and mildewed. A few forlorn chickens in the stable-yard, and a half-starved dog crouching under the door-steps, too poor to bark and too lazy to move, were the only signs of life that greeted me as I approached. I knocked at the door, but no answer was made to the summons. Not a living soul was to be seen around the place. I attempted to whistle and shout. Still the terrible silence remained unbroken, save by the dismal echoes of my own melancholy music. At length I went to a rickety shed under which some carts were drawn up for shelter from the weather. In one of the carts, half-covered in a bundle of straw, was a bundle of clothes. It moved as I drew near; it thrust a boot out over the tail-board; it shook itself; it emitted a curious sound between a grunt and a yawn; it raised itself up and shook off a portion of the straw; it thrust a red night-cap out of the mass of shapeless rubbish; the night-cap contained a head and a matted shock of hair; there was a withered, old-fashioned little face on the front part of the head underneath the shock of hair, which opened its mouth and eyes and gazed at me vacantly; it was an old man or a boy, I could not tell which till it spoke, when I discovered that it was something between the two, and was the skydskaarl or hostler of this remarkable establishment. He rubbed his eyes and stared again. “Hello!” said I. He grunted out something. “Heste og Cariole!” said I. “Ja! Ja!” grunted the hostler, and then he began to get out of the cart. I suppose he creaked, though I do not pretend that the sounds were audible. First one leg came out; slowly it was followed by the other. When they both got to the ground, he pushed his body gradually over the tail-board, and in about five minutes was standing before me.

“A horse and cariole,” said I; “let me have them quick!”

“Ja! Ja!”

“Strax!” [directly!] said I.

“Ja! Ja!”

“How long will it be?”

“Ach!”—here he yawned.

“An hour?”

“Ja! Ja!”

“Two hours?”

“Ja! Ja!”

“Three hours?”

“Ja! Ja!”

“Sacramento! I can’t stand that. I must have one STRAX—directly—forstøede?”

“Ja! Ja!” and the fellow rubbed his eyes and yawned again.

“Look here! my friend,” said I; “if you’ll get me a horse and cariole in half an hour I’ll give you two marks extra—forstøe?”

“Ja! Ja! two mark” (still yawning).

“Half an hour, mind you!”

“Tre time—three hours!” grunted the incorrigible dunderhead.

“Then good-by—I must travel on foot!” and with rage and indignation depicted in every feature I flung my knapsack over my shoulder and made a feint to start.

“Adieu! farvel!” said the sleepy lout, good-naturedly holding out his hand to give me a parting shake. “Farvel, min Herr! May your journey be pleasant! God take care of you!”

The perfect sincerity of the fellow completely dissipated my rage, and giving him a friendly shake I proceeded on my way. As I turned the corner of the main building and struck into the road I cast a look back. He was still standing by the cart, yawning and rubbing his eyes as before. That man would make money in California—if money could be made by a bet on laziness. He is lazier than the old Dutch skipper who was too lazy to go below, and gave orders to the man at the helm to follow the sun so as to keep him in the shade of the main-sail, by reason of which he sailed round the horizon till his tobacco gave out, and he had to return home for a fresh supply. I call that a strong case of laziness, but scarcely stronger than the traveler meets with every day in Norway.

I now began to enjoy the real pleasures of Norwegian travel. No longer compelled to endure the vexatious delays to which I had lately been subject, I bowled along the road, with my knapsack on my back, at the rate of four miles an hour, whistling merrily from sheer exuberance of health and lack of thought. The weather was charming. A bright sun shed its warm rays over hill and dale; the air was fresh and invigorating; the richest tints adorned the whole face of the country, which from Soknaes to Trondhjem gradually increases in fertility and breadth of outline, till it becomes almost unrivaled in the profusion of its pastoral beauties. Nothing can surpass the gorgeous splendor of the autumnal sunsets in this part of Norway. At an earlier period of the year there is perpetual daylight for several weeks, and for three days the sun does not descend below the horizon. The light, however, is too strong during that period to produce the rich and glowing tints which cover the sky and mountain-tops at a later season of the year. I was fortunate in being just in time to enjoy the full measure of its beauties; and surely it is not too much to say that such an experience is of itself worth a trip to Norway. I shall not attempt a description of Norwegian skies, however, after the glowing picture of the North Cape at midnight drawn by the pen of my friend Bayard Taylor, the most faithful and enthusiastic of all the travelers who have given their experience of this interesting region.

Keeping along the banks of the Gula the road winds around the sides of the hills—sometimes crossing open valleys, and occasionally penetrating the shady recesses of the pine forests, till it diverges from the river at Meelhus. Soon after leaving this station the views from the higher points over which the road passes are of great beauty and extent—embracing a glimpse, from time to time, of the great Trondhjem Fjord.

Night overtook me at the pretty little station of Esp. Next morning I was up bright and early, and after a cup of coffee and some rolls shouldered my knapsack and pushed on to Trondhjem.

If this very crude and hasty record of my experiences in the interior shall have the good luck to be found worthy of perusal, I hope soon to follow it up by an account of my visit to the Norwegian coast.

WHAT LUCK?

MR. BIGGS AT HOME.

ALONG THE WHARVES.

I AM the public's most obedient servant, Septimus Witherspoon, of Herkimer County, State of New York. When I am at home I am called a farmer, and though I am proud of the title, I am glad to say that I am not altogether dependent on my farm. I say all this because I know that the public like, when they're hearing from a man, to know who he is. It's a warrant of respectability, and shows that he is not ashamed of himself.

It has always been my intention to spend some little time in the city of New York, and I had read that, as a general thing, people from the country see more of New York than the citizens, and I was determined not to destroy that impression. But I also knew from my own experience that my neighbors who had seen the wonders of the great city utterly failed on their return in giving a clear impression of the sight. This, too, I determined to improve by going about with my eyes open, and not by looking with suspicion on every man I met in the metropolis shut off my sources of information.

From the earliest period of its career I have been a reader of Harper's Monthly Magazine, and I have been especially attracted by two or three articles in which the versatile information of a Mr. Biggs is brought to bear; and I resolved to make his acquaintance, and, if possible, induce him to escort me through the city and show me the sights. By the kindness of the editor of the Magazine, to whom I introduced myself as an old subscriber, I was favored with a note to a friend of Mr. Biggs, who gave me a note to that gentleman. The editor also said, that if I would write out my observations he would be glad to see them, and if they suited him, would print them in the Magazine.

Armed with a note to Mr. Biggs, I took my way to the address given. After some search I found that renowned gentleman at a quiet retreat not very far removed from his boarding-house, answering to the title of the "O'Sullivan Hall," and kept by Mr. Dennis O'Sullivan.

Mr. Biggs took my letter and looked it well over before breaking the seal, and then did the same with myself. He then perused the letter slowly, seeming to spell at some of the words, while I stood waiting for him to reach the end. When this occurred, Mr. Biggs turned to me and said, rather abruptly,

"Want to see New York, eh! Got any money?"

I answered that I had, and by way of delicately letting him understand that I was willing to spend it, I said,

"What'll you drink, Mr. Biggs?"

He answered without an instant's hesitation, thereby showing how easily confidence is begotten in his mind,

"Whisky straight, Dennis. He pays;" meaning me, and designating, by his finger, the fact to a stern Milesian gentleman behind the bar.

The convention between Mr. Biggs and myself was settled in a couple of hours at an expense of four shillings and sixpence, cash in hand, paid to Dennis O'Sullivan, after which Mr. B. did me the honor to accept my arm as far as the "Nonsuch House" and to sup with me. As it could hardly be expected that I should accompany Mr. Biggs home quite late at night, being myself a stranger to the city, I delegated that matter to a very polite colored gentleman at the "Nonsuch," who, for the sum of one dollar, promised, pledged himself to the faithful performance of the duty.

The convention between Mr. Biggs and myself was, that on the following day he was to begin showing me around, and that the shipping and commercial interests were to have our first attention.

The next morning, bright and early, quite early in fact, being only a little after six, and much before breakfast, Mr. Biggs knocked at my door. In consequence, I had the pleasure of Mr. Biggs's company at breakfast. As we traversed the city toward the wharves I wished to become acquainted, at least by name, with many fine buildings and strange things I saw by the way; but I soon found out that I had a man of system to deal with, and that this was no part of his system. We came out to see the wharves, he informed me, and we would see them and nothing else.

"System, Sir, system!" said Mr. Biggs. "We'll do the thing properly or not at all. Commence at the Battery, Sir, and go up."

In a few minutes we stood upon that famous spot, and Mr. Biggs, taking a position a little to the westward of the centre, stamped his foot and exclaimed:

"Now, Sir, I stand on the very spot where stood Fort Amsterdam, the first attempt at raising a building of any consequence on the ground that afterward became this wonderful city."

I naturally looked at the ground with veneration, though I could perceive no sign that should so induce me.

"Here, Sir, the renowned Wouter Van Twill-er put up his fort in 1635, and opened trade with the Indians for furs. While just over there, to the southeast of the Battery, was built the first vessel ever constructed on this island. She was called the Unrest, measured 38 feet keel, and was built in 1613 by Captain Block to supply the place of one he had brought from Holland, which was accidentally burned. At that time, Sir, this spot was merely looked on as a convenient place for the traders, who came with small notions to dicker with the Indians; they even despising the beauty of its position for the superior trading facilities of Beaver Wyth, now Albany. One voyage a year between this spot and Holland was in those days considered fast traveling and trading, Sir."

Mr. Biggs looked triumphantly around, and I could not help thinking that, with the very natural enthusiasm of a New Yorker, he took to himself a large part of the credit for the energy and perseverance that had built up so great a city from so small a beginning. Mr. Biggs went on:

"Why, Sir, in the year 1623 this place was the property of 'The United New Netherland Company,' who merely looked upon it as a trading post. Up to the year 1656 there was but one wharf, which ran out from the foot of Moore Street, only reaching to low-water-mark. Vessels at this time moored in the East River and unloaded by scows. In 1659 fifty feet was added to this wharf, and some provision was made for facing up the bank around the point, now called the Battery, by putting plank about it. At that time, Sir, the north side of Pearl Street was the water side, and in 1687 the lots facing the water were granted to different parties on condition of their keeping the facing-plank in good order. How many water lots would you take now, Sir, on the same conditions? Eh!"

I replied to Mr. Biggs by offering to blindly face up both rivers on the same terms. Mr. Biggs said he didn't doubt it.

"You see the Battery now," Mr. Biggs went on; "would you like to know how it looked two centuries ago? Here," and he produced from his pocket a soiled and crumpled engraving, "is a picture of New York in 1664. You see the Fort, inclosing Governor Kieft's double-roofed church, the Governor's house, the flag-staff, and wind-mill. At the river's edge, perhaps on the very spot where we now stand, are the Gallows and Whipping-post. Great institutions those. We could make good use of them now if we had them.

"What do you think now, Sir," continued Mr. Biggs, "of a great commercial city surrendering to a fleet consisting of two frigates and a fly-boat, carrying in all only 130 guns and 600 men? And yet, Sir, such is the fact. Our valiant Dutch ancestors backed down to an English force of that strength in 1664; and then in 1673, nine years after, backed down a second time to a Dutch force still smaller. It was the merchants that did it, Sir; the first time to improve trade, as they thought, and the second time to get back the old government for the same purpose. The merchant is ruler, depend upon it, Sir."

I had noticed that during the time Mr. Biggs was stamping down the earth where once stood Fort Amsterdam a youthful wielder of the blacking brush was operating on Mr. Biggs's boots, as I truly believe—being so assured by that gentleman personally—without his knowledge or consent. Unfortunately for the misspent labor, Mr. Biggs did not awake to the fact until his boots were entirely polished, when, with proper indignation, he spurned the surreptitious boot-black away, and threatening to give him immediately into the hands of a policeman, went on with his conversation.

"Now, Sir," said Mr. Biggs, "we come to busy and classical grounds. Pier No. 1, North River. Pier No. 1, Sir, is the landing-place of the boats of the Camden and Amboy line, the first railroad stretching south from New York. It was built in 1829 from Amboy, in New Jersey, to its terminus on the Delaware River, the intermediate distances between New York and Philadelphia being traversed by steamboats. When that road was first built, Sir, it was traveled by horse-cars, and the first practical locomotive in the country went over its rails only thirty-one years ago. Now, Sir, the earnings of the road are equal to $1,600,000 per annum."

For a few minutes Mr. Biggs stood absently on the corner of Battery Place ruminating and picking up single peanuts from a stand, the legal owner of which slept sweetly beside it, and gazing far out upon the bosom of the Hudson.

"Charming river!" said Mr. Biggs at last, just as the apple and peanut lady awoke, and turning his back as he spoke to the edibles. "Charming river, Sir! navigable for 160 miles from its mouth. Splendid harbor! especially intended by nature for commercial purposes. Capable of giving shelter to the largest vessels in the world. Bar at Sandy Hook, Sir, 27 feet at high-water, Sir. After that there's no farther trouble—channel of from 35 to 50 feet all the way up to the wharves."

"Get out wid ye, spitting all over me pineapples! Do yees think I've got nothing to do but be washing me slices all day after yees?"

I am constrained in truth to admit that the lady proprietor of the stand behind Mr. Biggs had justice on her side, as that gentleman, in the abstraction of the moment, had evidently been giving way to absent-minded expectoration.

"Pier No. 2, Sir," said Mr. Biggs, walking on hurriedly, "is one of the Boston lines. Mind you, Sir, I say one of them. The day has gone by, Sir, when the stage started daily, taking its eight passengers for a six days' journey, price $20. Now, we used to have the splendid steamers of the Charleston and Savannah lines at Pier No. 4, and more of the same sort for the same place at Pier No. 12. There, Sir, is the Bethel ship, one of many—those sheet-anchors for the poor wanderers about the docks. We'll speak of 'em again, Sir. By-and-by—by-and-by, Sir."

Mr. Biggs blew his nose violently, and walked on.

"It is much to be regretted, Sir," he continued, "that we New Yorkers have not seen fit to pay more attention to the wharves. There are very few of them that are structures of which we can be proud. We have not yet followed the example of England in building stone wharves and basins that will last for centuries. To be sure, Sir, the exigencies of our trade and tides have not so imperatively called for them as in London and Liverpool; but still it would be a most creditable movement to replace some of the old, decayed, dangerous, and rat-eaten docks of the lower part of the city. The day is rapidly coming, Sir, when it will have to be done, and we shall see a line of stone wharves stretching from six to ten miles on either side of this right little, tight little island, Sir."

Here was a pause, in which my imagination pictured out the great city of New York when it should throw all the cities of the world into the shade; when for five miles from the Battery not a dwelling would exist, nothing but one mass of stores and warehouses, laden to repletion with the wealth of the world; and all the opposite shores would be a repetition of the vast hive. Mr. Biggs's voice brought me back to Pier No. 12.

"Another Boston line, and there used to be another Savannah line, Sir! Steamers upon steamers, from one to five thousand tons, clustering along the docks like flies clinging to a slice of bread and molasses! Pier No. 13; here were Virginia steamers, Sir, mediums of conveyance to the mother of statesmen and the land of sweet plug tobacco. No. 14, Sir, Philadelphia steamers around Cape May; sea-sickness and bilge-water, Sir, at the lowest possible charge. Pier No. 15, Sir, is the landing-place of the Albany boats—a spot full of wonders, Sir. Here, Sir, at 6 A.M. and 6 P.M. each day these magnificent boats, emblematic of our rapid progress, can be seen, like grand monsters who have kindly lent themselves to puny man, awaiting the throng of passengers rushing away from the city on business or pleasure. The months of July and August are especially notable for the life upon the river, when all the fashionable world is bound to Niagara, Saratoga, Canada, or such parts of the country as may please their taste. Then, Sir, there is something approaching to delirium in the departure of an Albany boat. The wild hurrying of the excited people; the shouting of the hack and cart drivers; the dodging of the baggage smashers, and the cries of the vendors of every article under the sun, mixed up with the commands of policemen and officers of the boat; while, high above all the other din, the roaring of the escaping steam, makes the nearest approach to Pandemonium that we shall ever experience in this life."

Mr. Biggs paused for breath, a fine color glowing in his face, and centring particularly bright about his nose. I may as well mention here that Mr. Biggs's description so interested me that I took the earliest opportunity to revisit the spot at the hour he had designated, and I can indorse personally all he has said.

"Here, Sir," proceeded Mr. Biggs, "we have another immense outlet from New York, the Jersey City Ferry, communicating not only with a city of fifty thousand people, but with the dépôts of the great Erie Railroad, the New Jersey Railroad, the Northern Railroad of New Jersey, and the Morris and Essex Railroad. Over this ferry, Sir, there pass daily twenty-five thousand people and two thousand vehicles. Seven boats do service, the largest of which is 800 tons. Think of that, Sir, for a mere ferry-boat. These boats, Sir, make the passage in six minutes, in all weathers, cracking through twelve-inch ice like so much paper, at three cents per head for each passenger. For this privilege, Sir, the most valuable ferry of the city, the Company only pay $5000 per annum, holding it until the year 1866. Now, Sir, imagine that up to one hundred years ago, or a little over, say 1750, there were no docks above this spot, and that the scows which then plied between New York and the opposite shore landed their passengers and freight at a stake dock built from this place—a dock which was generally carried away every winter by the ice. About this date the wharves and lining of the river bank were built as high up as Partition, now Fulton Street."

Just as Mr. Biggs said these words, stretching out his hand to point to the spot, I saw a gentleman make a sudden stoop, pick up something at the feet of Mr. Biggs, and cross quickly over to the pier, with an anxious manner, as though he would conceal whatever the article was he had stooped for. While I was intently watching this another gentleman, with a singular obliquity of vision that caused him to look perpetually sideways over a tall cigar, came up to me.

"Did you see that?" said this last gentleman.

"See what?" I naturally asked.

"Why, that feller's found a pocket-book," said the gentleman.

As a matter of course I felt interested, which the gentleman perceiving, said, earnestly, "Go over and make him go yer shares."

At this moment I was astounded to see Mr. Biggs seize the gentleman violently by the cravat, and while holding and shaking him uncomfortably, address him in this style:

POCKET-BOOK DROPPERS.

"Now ain't you a pretty scamp? Now ain't ye? What d'ye take me for, you rascal? Don't you understand your business better? If you don't tell me in an instant what ye took me for I'll hand ye over to the police!"

I saw that the gentleman rather shrank under this threat, and when Mr. Biggs gave him another shake, and another repetition of the same words, he burst out with,

"Oh! come, Squire, don't git mad. I d'know what's er matter with me ter day. That's er second time I've mixed up the thing this mornin', any how. Let up on a feller, say, won't yer?"

Mr. Biggs gave him one more genial shake that completely lifted him off his legs, and then dropped him so quickly that the released party went down on his knees. He was up, however, in a moment and away like a deer, while Mr. Biggs strode on the other way, leaving me for an instant in such a state of stupefaction that I could scarcely follow. When I did reach that gentleman all the explanation I could get in answer to my questions was,

"Pocket-book droppers, Sir;" and that was all the information I ever got on the subject.

After this, for some little time, Mr. Biggs's equanimity was clearly disturbed, causing him to pass hurriedly over the ground, notwithstanding the refreshment of a dozen on the half shell at Washington Market, and a primer, as Mr. Biggs expressed it; which "primer" was simply a gill of Bourbon straight.

"Over there, Sir," said Mr. Biggs, standing at the south end of Washington Market, "is No. 19, the freight dépôt of the Morris Canal. That pier and the next, No. 20, is the city residence of a cloud of propellers and canal-boats, the bearers of burdens of every kind to our all-devouring people. At that point commences Washington Market, called in old times the Bear Market, running northerly to Pier No. 26. Here are thousands of hucksters, commission sellers of edibles of every kind. Middle-men, who deal and speculate between the producer and the consumer, until the latter has to pay at least fifty per cent. more for his food than it is really worth. Their sheds—mere shanties of plank—cover every inch of room, and there they lie in wait for the hundreds of boats of every kind that bring provisions to feed the hungry city. A few months ago a fire swept through these shanties, leaving the spot one mass of roasted potatoes, vegetables, beef, mutton, and poultry, and letting the public into the secret of how much and how valuable a quantity of food finds its way into this apparently unimportant spot. It is a disgrace, Sir, to the city, that these men should be allowed to create by their influence laws that prevent the countryman from coming directly into the market and selling his own produce at any time!"

The last part of Mr. Biggs's argument had been addressed to a couple of muscular gentlemen in red shirts, who were ostensibly applemerchants by wholesale, and who, in reply, only vouchsafed the single word "Gas!"

"And now, Sir," said Mr. Biggs, emerging from the opposite end of the market and passing over a couple of blocks at a brisk trot, "we come to another great outlet for a rurally-disposed people—the first slip of the Hoboken Ferry. Though the glories of Hoboken, Sir, have much departed since the days when the Elysian Fields reached almost to the landing on the Jersey side, yet Hoboken still holds out inducements to entice thousands away from their native soil. On the Sabbath-day, Sir, especially, they flock to the three New York landings, and from morning to night, when the weather is fine, swarms—particularly of Germans—seek their Teutonic relaxation in the fields above or the cafés in Hoboken. Seven thousand people, Sir, have been known to pass over the three ferries of this company of a Sunday, though on a weekday the travel is very much smaller. Rather a good property, Sir; and yet the proprietors pay the princely sum of $1050 per year for the whole three ferries! What d'ye think of that, Sir? Pier No. 29, Sir, is the California Steamer wharf—the spot from whence so many thousands have sailed away, with hearts elate, never to return—many of them never to be heard of again; gone, Sir, to swell the unwritten history of that Golgotha of lands. I never see one of those steamers, Sir, without thinking of some great monster waiting to swallow its prey."

Mr. Biggs suited the action to the word, drawing back his head as he made the last remark, and opening his mouth, which he shut with a snap.

"And now, Sir," he resumed, "we come to the wharf of the Erie Railroad Company, the greatest work of private enterprise ever executed in this country; a work which—though it has cost thirty millions of dollars, and absorbed, without any return, all the original capital—is still to be looked on as a work doing great credit to the enterprise of us New Yorkers, Sir, who not only spent all our own money in it, but all of any body else's, Sir, that we could get hold of. It hasn't paid yet; but we expect that it will soon. If you want to invest, let me advise you to buy Erie now, while the stock is low. Now is your time."

Mr. Biggs fell into a brown study for a few moments, when he brightened up. "Here again, from Pier No. 33, we have steamboats, Sir, by the score, ready to take you any where for a less sum than it will cost you to stay at home."

We picked our way in silence for a short time, when Mr. Biggs paused, waved his hand impressively, and said:

"Here, Sir, at Piers 37 and 38, we have a group of interesting items: Firstly, the Bremen and Southampton steamers; secondly, Sir, we have the way the ice comes in; thirdly, the wharf of the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company, who bring us every year about a couple of hundred thousand tons of coal, forty-five thousand of which are landed upon this wharf; and, fourthly, and most interesting of all, one of the wharves sacred to the Municipal Sanitary Office. At this wharf, Sir, there is dumped weekly 1200 loads of manure and garbage from the streets. In the spring this runs up to 2000; and it must be understood, Sir, that this is only one of many dumping places, several larger existing on the east side of the city, the total amount removed from the city being about an average of 17,000 loads weekly. In the spring this has been known to run up as high as 38,000 loads in one week."

By this time we had reached the second landing-place of the Hoboken Ferry, at the foot of Canal Street, which Mr. Biggs dismissed with a wave of his hand, and we stood before the docks once occupied by the Collins steamers; while just above, at another wharf, lay the line of screw steamers running between New York and Liverpool.

I stood musing over all this, when I missed Mr. Biggs. At the moment I was rather alarmed, not knowing but that gentleman had, in an unguarded way, slipped from the dock into the briny waves below, without noise or disturbance; but I was soon disabused on that point. I beheld Mr. Biggs standing with his back toward me on board a half-house half-boat arrangement, that lay moored, with many others of the same sort, at the wharf. I watched the motion of my friend's body and the bending forward of the head; and this, coupled with the fact that I could not fail to perceive the host of the boat hand him something, persuaded me that Mr. Biggs was going through a swallowing operation. In a moment he made a hurried exit from the boat and stood beside me on the dock, the host staring wildly at him as though in wonder.

"There, Sir! What d'ye think o' that?" were his first words; while, by watching the countenance of the man who stood with the oyster-knife in his hand, I became convinced that Mr. Biggs had merely been "sampling" the oysters without buying. "There's our oyster-boats. There's where a large share of the first-class bivalves are stowed. It's not an uncommon thing, Sir, for 40,000 bushels to be sold there in one week, while quite a business is done in the same goods in the Clinton Market, just opposite."

I felt uncomfortable as we walked away, being unable to disabuse my mind of the fact that the proprietor of the oyster-boat Mr. Biggs had honored with a visitation had come out on the plank to see us off, and gave Mr. B. a parting shout, as he moved away, that sounded very much to me as though he cried, "How did you like 'em, sonny?" Mr. Biggs, however, with an imperturbability to be admired, took no notice whatever of his impertinence. A few hasty steps and we stood upon the wharf at the foot of Hammond Street, where, as Mr. Biggs informed me, lay the majestic Great Eastern in all her sullen grandeur, while every spot about her teemed with suddenly-awakened life. Now ruin and desolation is upon all.

We passed between Piers 49 and 51, where the Christopher Street station of the Hoboken Ferry loomed up amidst piles of lumber towering almost to the skies. Mr. Biggs had become slightly taciturn. At Pier 53 stood a vestige of the past which I could not pass without inquiry. It bore the impress of one of the relics of history, and seemed as though it might have been a block-house erected by the early settlers for defense against the Indians. It was with this upon my mind I appealed to Mr. Biggs.

"Hay scales, Sir," was that gentleman's response; "old hay scales, long disabled, Sir; been there, Sir, ever since the memory of the oldest inhabitant; supposed to have been the original scales used by Wouter Van Twiller when he used to put his foot in for a pound, in his Indian trades." Here Mr. Biggs gave a short cough, and drawing his right hand from his pocket, waved it across the scope of several slips, and went on: "Here, Sir, is sand, the spot whereon the product of Coney Island is stored, to enable our housewives to keep their pans and kettles bright; and there, Sir, we see flags—not flags of the free and brave, with stars and stripes, but flags, Sir, to trample under foot without insult—flags to pave our streets and back-yards, Sir. And now, Sir, we come to a very important item in our domestic economy." And Mr. Biggs pointed to a large building standing out toward the water's-edge, surmounted by a gigantic horse, the anatomy of which would have puzzled Agassiz or Owen in classification. "There, Sir, is one of the numerous establishments where our fire-wood is sawed and split by steam. Once upon a time, Sir, you could not walk half a mile without being turned off the sidewalks half a dozen times by their being in possession of the wood-sawyers; now, this is all done by the steam-engine, and thousands of boys are employed in performing the labor once executed by the professional and artistic sawyer. The wood is done up in those little bunches that we see in every grocery—a smart boy being enabled to tie somewhere between 600 and 800 per day, by which he can earn from $2 to $2 50 per week. These bundles are sold to the grocers at $1 50 per 100, and by them retailed at 2½ cents each; while the knots and ends of the wood are sold at the factory for 16 cents per box, containing a little less than a barrel. Eight hands at the sawing and splitting machine will turn out about 16 cords per day. This, Sir, is one of the small reformatations of great importance daily being made among us."

As Mr. Biggs strode steadily away I could not but admire the stern pride with which he related these little facts; and the admiration was accompanied by the thought that, should the inventor of the splitting machine at that moment come in contact with Mr. Biggs, he might have some doubts as to whether himself or that gentleman was the real benefactor of mankind. A few minutes' walking and we stood at the foot of Twelfth Street, on the ground occupied by the freight dépôt of the Hudson River Railroad Company, watching the unloading of scores of cars just arrived with hundreds of cans of milk, boxes of cheese, firkins of butter, and such other edibles as the great city engulphs by thousands of tons and leaves no sign. Mr. Biggs placed himself about the centre of the ground, and, to the astonishment of a group of workmen whom he had rather crowded to attain it, commenced stamping the ground the same as he had before done on the Battery.

"Here, Sir, is more classical ground, the spot whereon, only a few years since, stood Fort

THE DERRICK.

TELEGRAPH OFFICE.

Gansevoort, or, as more familiarly known, 'The White Fort.' It was erected during the war of 1812 to keep the Britishers out of the North River—should it so happen that they ever got so high as this place. There it stood, Sir, serving the very useful purpose, during many of the last years of its life, of a lodging-place for shoals of negroes and vagrants, who crawled into the port-holes and kept house permanently rent free."

The workmen listened to Mr. Biggs with distended eyes, every now and then looking about at the ground whereon he had been stamping, as though they momentarily expected to see it open and swallow the speaker; and then, disappointed in this result, they made various disrespectful noises and motions, signifying their belief to each other that there was something wrong in the mental condition of Mr. Biggs.

At the wharf close by lay an immense square box, covering, as I thought, somewhere about an acre, and having upon its deck a small house, from the centre of which towered a mast of gigantic proportion, with cross-beam and rigging of indefinite quantity. I was naturally desirous of knowing its use.

"Bishop's derrick, Sir! the great derrick with which sunken steamboats, ships, and heavy laden vessels are brought back from the briny deep to the light of day. With only one-horse power and five men that arrangement has lifted a sunken boat laden with 300 tons of coal. This is done more by the lifting force of the boat itself than by the power on board—the boat having a square of 76 feet on deck, and 12 feet depth of hold. It is only necessary, therefore, to make her fast to a sunken wreck at low tide, which, at high-water, will bring it six feet off bottom, after which she is swung in nearer shore and the lifting process repeated at next tide until she lies high enough to be pumped out."

By this time we had reached Fifteenth Street, the crossing of the American Telegraph Company—a fact of which Mr. Biggs informed me much in the same way that he would have spoken of some little personal property.

"The telegraph crossing, Sir," said Mr. Biggs. "If you say so we'll step over and see how it gets on."

I thought I should like to see how it got on. Accordingly we went across the wharf to where Mr. Biggs settled upon an individual in an extremely dirty shirt, smoking an impeachable clay pipe, and holding short grumbling conversations with the little waves that broke against the dock over which he was swinging his legs. This gentleman was obviously well posted, and not to be caught, as he instantly informed Mr. Biggs in answer to his question as to who had charge of the office of the telegraph crossing.

"No yer don't! I ain't no fool, I ain't," said that sagacious individual. "I warn't born yister-day, I warn't. I've seen fellers comin' round here as-sin' ker-wes-tions, I have."

I ventured to ask the gentleman what kind of folks came round there asking questions, and got my answer.

"I ain't a gwan to be ker-wes-tioned, I ain't. Do you think I doan-no? yer can't ketch me, yer can't. No, Sir, yer can't."

"BE KEERFUL OF MY VEST."

Mr. Biggs was at this moment leaning against the Telegraph office, staring at the dirty gentleman, when that individual addressed himself to Mr. B.

"Say, Mister, be keerful of my vest, will yer?"

I saw Mr. B. start, and, as he started, I saw a strangely tattered rag of a wondrous dingy hue hanging on the spot against which he had been leaning. I saw Mr. B. shake himself with a shudder and look at the garment somewhat as one would look at a venomous reptile or a mad dog, and then I saw him dash away with an expression that clearly showed that he was not able by speech to do justice to the subject. It was not until he had got several streets away that he found voice to express his indignation mingled with certain information.

"Confound the fellow!" said Mr. Biggs; "the rascal. Couldn't he have told us that there are fourteen wires crossing at this point. Eh! Sir. Couldn't he just have mentioned that the cable crossing this spot is just three times as thick as the Atlantic Telegraph cable, and that it runs from that point to Brimstone Point in the Elysian Fields, Hoboken, and from there to every where. The man ought to be hung, Sir. No, Sir, he's too dirty for that. He ought to be ducked, Sir, if it wouldn't spoil the river."

We stood by this time at the foot of Eighteenth Street, where I saw some great iron frames raising themselves to the altitude of a house, and holding in their embraces vast vessels seeming like gigantic pots just put on to boil. I had heard much of the charity of the citizens and of the soup-houses that had fed the poor through some bitter winters, and, as a natural consequence, these ran through my mind as I asked Mr. Biggs for information.

"Those, Sir, are the gasholders of the Manhattan Gas Company, a Company upon whom 30,000 customers depend for their nightly supply of light. Not 30,000 people, Sir, but 30,000 buyers, and perhaps not less than 350,000 people. They have 230 miles of cast-iron main laid through the streets, and light this great city from the north side of Grand Street to the south side of Seventy-ninth Street. In this, which is called the Eighteenth Street station, they have 1000 retorts and sixteen gasholders, while at the foot of Fourteenth Street, East River, they have another station almost as large, and at the foot of Sixty-fifth Street, North River, one much larger. In one year, Sir, this Company consumes 100,000 tons of coal, and 60,000 bushels of lime, from which they manufacture, with the aid of 1500 men, 1000 millions of cubic feet of gas."

Mr. Biggs walked on ruminating and breaking forth into occasional ejaculations of,

"A wonderful study, Sir, is gas! The whole world, Sir, is gas! Mankind is made of gas, Sir! From gas we came, and unto gas we must return!"

We had not walked far when Mr. Biggs, with an admiring cast of countenance, stopped before a domicile erected apparently upon public ground at the very entrance of a wharf. The architecture of the "Hôtel de Flaherty"—for so an artistically-lettered board announced its name—was decidedly of the rural order, though of what material it was composed would have puzzled an analyzing chemist. There was wood undoubtedly, with here and there a stone breaking through a chaos of mud, plaster, and mortar. There were bits of tin-roofing impressed into the service, with here and there a scrap of canvas or a brick by way of ornament. The "Hôtel de Flaherty" boasted a master of the softer sex, who did her business under a projecting shed in front. Her goods consisted of wilted apples, dusty candy, and something which looked to me like smoked sausages. Mr. Biggs walked up to the stand, and, taking up one of the last-named articles, inquired,

"How much apiece?"

"Two cints," responded the proprietress.

"Too much," said Mr. Biggs, sternly.

"Well, lave 'em be, thin."

"I'll give you three cents for two," said Mr. Biggs, not abashed.

"I'll see yees hanged first," said the lady. "and thin I wuddint."

Mr. Biggs silently laid down four cents, drew out his pocket-knife and cut off two of the coveted articles.

HOTEL DE FLAHERTY.

"Boloneys!" said Mr. Biggs, proffering me one, which I declined, giving as a reason that I never ate at that hour of the day. Mr. Biggs graciously accepted the refusal, and devoured the whole without winking.

During the time that Mr. Biggs was disposing of his lunch we were progressing upward past piles upon piles of lumber, stone, brick, and coal. By swill-fed cow stables; by distilleries and slaughter-houses; by sugar refineries, towering ten stories into the sky, and packing-houses capable of taking in a drove of a thousand hogs and barreling them for exportation before they have time to squeal. Past great clipper ships discharging cargo by the aid of a steam-engine, where once the heave and song of the stevedore only was heard; past crowds of tow-boats, laden with the grain of the West, the coal of Pennsylvania, and the thousand products of a thousand places; past sloops and schooners, from every spot under the sun, and bound likewise to every region, as my guide informed me, in the intervals of mastication.

For a time I had noted a peculiar perfume on the air which I thought disagreeable. Mr. Biggs strode on unheeding notwithstanding my protest against the growing unpleasantness of the atmosphere, until at last we stood at the foot of Thirty-fourth Street, before a half-opened gate that gave admittance to a wharf from whence the sweet savor poured forth in volumes. A German watchman guarded the portal, and opposed the entrance of Mr. Biggs. That gentleman, to my astonishment, pulling a small notebook and a pencil from his pocket as he pushed by, and muttering the single word "Reporter," ushered me into view of a small sloop piled high with the savory carcasses of horses, pigs, cows, dogs, and cats, while barrels and tubs, tanks and hogsheads of blood and entrails, stood about.

"The offal boat, Sir," said Mr. Biggs, with a wave of his hand as of introduction; "the craft that waits to receive the animal dead of the city."

The watchman, backed by an assistant, stood watching Mr. Biggs with no pleased expression of countenance. With a patronizing nod Mr. Biggs turned to address him and proposed a question. He answered,

"Nein, nicht forestan."

Mr. Biggs tried the other.

"Oh, ya-as, goot. I sphakes Angerlish. Ya-as. I knows every ting."

Mr. Biggs tried another question.

"Oh! ya-as, dat ish so. Goot, I knows all about it."

And so between the gentleman that knew nothing, and the gentleman that knew every thing, Mr. Biggs came down to his own stock of knowledge.

"The offal boat, Sir," said Mr. Biggs, "is an important adjunct to the Bureau of Sanitary Inspection. I have a little document here, Sir, which will give you some insight into the matter;" and Mr. Biggs drew from his pocket a dingy paper rather the worse for wear, and read:

"City Inspector's Department, Bureau of Sanitary Inspection, etc., New York, September 24, 1860. For the week ending September 22, 1860. Number of dead horses removed from the city limits, 50. Ditto of cows, 9. Ditto of dogs and other small animals, 135. Number of barrels of offal removed, 3100.' That's the week's work, Sir; and then here's another string of items, in the way of choice articles of food which we're not allowed to eat. The Inspector pounces on 'em, Sir, like a chicken on a grasshopper, and to this they must come whether or no: 'Beef, number of pounds, 1236; veal, 495; fish, 2900; poultry, 350; other meats, 3580; hogs, 16.' That's a pleasant little lot, Sir," continued my guide, "for one week, which might have found its way down the throats of the citizens. Eh, isn't it?" and Mr. Biggs gave an unearthly chuckle, and scowled at the two Dutchmen as though they were the guilty parties. "It all comes here, Sir, brought by the contractor at his own expense, except the blood and offal from the slaughter-houses, which the butchers are obliged to deliver. The contractor keeps ten carts constantly going on these errands, and three of these boats to carry away what they gather. Whenever an animal dies notice must immediately be given at the nearest station-house, or at the office of the City Inspector. The carts are then sent, and the funeral proceeds with dispatch, until the carcass is deposited upon the boat. One of these boats sails every evening, and her cargo is landed at the bone-boiling establishment up the river. After sundry processes of manufacture, the defunct omnibus-horse, the swill-fed cow, and the departed canine, comes forth in the shape of leather, bone, manure, soap fat, and various other trifles too tedious to mention. In fact, Sir, quite improved, and far more useful."

Mr. Biggs paused gaspingly, gave one more sniff, with his nose rather elevated, and slightly turned away from the object of his admiration, and then, to my very decided relief, left the offal boat far in the rear.

Mr. Biggs was marching away rapidly toward the east, leaving the water behind. In answer to my question of "Why?" he answered,

"Had enough of this side, Sir; nothing more to be seen above. We'll try the East River, Sir."

I could not fail to perceive an uncertain air about Mr. Biggs; a look as though he had the intention of doing some act for which he was only awaiting opportunity. He gazed into corner establishments of a suspicious style, and made several feints at entering; but seeing that I made no motion to follow, Mr. Biggs surrendered what I supposed was his intention, and passed on with an audible ejaculation and a hastened step.

At the very moment when I was wrapped in the deepest wonder at the strangeness of his manner, Mr. Biggs seemed at once to alter his course, making directly toward an old-fashioned wooden-box hydrant, that stood upon the street corner, on which, to my utter astonishment, he seated himself with an air that plainly declared him a fixture.

"A-h!" said Mr. Biggs, drawing a long breath, "now we'll have a little quiet conversation. You seem to have a rather small idea of the commercial greatness, Sir, of this town, if I understand you right, Sir! I mean to have that out of you, Sir!"

Upon what premises Mr. Biggs based his argument was beyond my understanding; I certainly had not so expressed myself, and I am equally certain that such was not my opinion. That gentleman, however, did not give me an opportunity of saying so, but continued rapidly:

"This city, Sir, has too long labored under slander and false valuation, Sir. I mean to crush it out, Sir! Crush it out!" And Mr. Biggs, suiting the action to the word, gave the hat, which he had taken from his head to cool it, a scrunch, and then took from it a bundle of soiled papers, to which he occasionally referred, as he went on speaking:

"New York, Sir, in proportion to its size, is the greatest commercial city of the world! In the increase of her commerce, Sir, she has no parallel in history! She has it in her power, Sir, by wealth and commercial importance, to dictate peace or war to the world. Commerce, Sir, has become the real arbiter of nations. Let us look, Sir, at the growth of her mercantile marine, from the period when the Dutch traders made their annual voyages for furs to Nieuw Amstel, as the south end of this island was then called. The first steps in the way of marine architecture were consummated in the shape of square-built sloops, measuring from twenty to thirty-five feet in length, and used for the commerce of the river. As the settlement advanced in importance it naturally began to look for foreign trade, even to going as far north as the vicinity of Salem and Boston, and as far south as the Virginia plantations. At last, Sir, the daring spirit that actuated our Dutch forefathers broke out in the shape of barks and brigantines; so that, within half a century of the time when the great Wouter Van Twiller hung out his country's banners upon the walls of Fort Amsterdam, the commerce of the city had grown to a most respectable size. In 1684 it numbered 2 barks, 2 brigantines, 25 sloops, and 46 open boats. At this period, Sir, New York began to show, by the growing wealth of her merchants, that her trade was not to be sneezed at, some of them accumulating what in those days was considered princely wealth. In 1674, when an account was taken of the wealth of the principal people, the richest man was found to be Frederick Philipse, who was rated at $150,000—a sum that then placed him in about the same position as an Astor now. In 1695, Sir, the new dock was built from Coenties Slip to Whitehall Street, and a rate of wharfage established, which was, for vessels of less than five tons, 6s.; between five and ten tons, 9s.; from ten to fifteen tons, 12s.; from fifteen to twenty-five tons, £1; from twenty-five to fifty tons, £1 10s.; over that measurement, £2 10s. In 1701, Sir, the marine of the city consisted of seventy-four vessels, of which seven were ships. Think of that, Sir!—seven ships!"

Here Mr. Biggs's voice grew husky, and I could only catch a word at intervals. Then he began to nod, and nearly fell from his seat, dropping his bundle of papers. This aroused him; he started, rubbed his eyes, and exclaimed, fiercely:

"Wake up, Sir! Wake up! What do you mean, Sir, by going to sleep while I am talking?"

I denied the fact most positively. I was not asleep, and so I declared to Mr. Biggs.

"You're another, Sir!" said that gentleman, with an emphasis that brought a policeman, who had been lurking around the corner, to the spot, and kept him, during the rest of Mr. Biggs's very valuable lecture, within hearing.

"Well, Sir," continued Mr. Biggs, recovering his temper, "I've been telling you all about the commerce of New York, during the Revolution, and the war of 1812, and for the next forty years, and you were asleep, Sir, and didn't hear a word of it. Now, Sir, keep awake while I read you a paper I wrote a couple of years ago, which will give you some idea of the present commerce of New York. Now don't go to sleep again."

He seated himself firmly on the hydrant, took out from a side-pocket a bundle of soiled and creased manuscript, from which he proceeded to read:

"We find that the entire commerce of the country for the last four years foots up to this:

IMPORTS.
1856.....	$314,639,942	1858.....	$282,613,150
1857.....	360,890,141	1859.....	338,763,130

EXPORTS.
1856.....	$310,536,330	1858.....	$293,758,279
1857.....	338,985,065	1859.....	335,894,385

"Now let us take the last year of this and see what proportion New York does, and what proportion other leading cities do, that we may arrive at the commercial greatness of New York by comparison:

IMPORTS FOR THE YEAR ENDING JUNE 30, 1859.
New York....	$218,231,093	Baltimore.....	$9,713,921
Boston.....	41,174,670	Charleston.....	1,438,535
New Orleans..	18,349,516	Mobile.....	788,164
Philadelphia..	14,517,542	Savannah.....	624,599
San Francisco.	11,155,767

"There are the imports, in which, as we see, New York does two-thirds of the whole business of the United States, and fifteen times as much as Philadelphia, a city of almost equal size. Now, Sir, let us come to the exports, and we'll see a difference:

EXPORTS FOR THE YEAR ENDING JUNE 30, 1859.
New Orleans..	$100,870,689	Boston.....	$14,196,130
New York....	97,461,576	San Francisco..	12,403,782
Mobile.....	28,933,662	Baltimore.....	9,074,511
Charleston....	17,902,194	Philadelphia...	5,248,514
Savannah....	15,372,696

"There's the figures for it, and New York is obliged to give it up. New Orleans sends out her cotton, which swells the grand total to almost three millions beyond New York. Now, Sir, while our hand is in, let's see the thing through.

Here we have the clearances, or vessels leaving the port of New York during the year ending June 30, 1859:

FOREIGN.		AMERICAN.
Number of vessels	4,877	Number of vessels	4,786
Number of tons...	1,276,706	Number of tons...	2,554,134
Number of men ..	59,601	Number of men ..	66,806
Number of boys ..	751	Number of boys ..	375

"So you see, Sir, by this simple statement we find that the average tonnage of foreign vessels in the year 1859 was 261, while the average tonnage of American vessels was 533—another instance, Sir, of the effect of free institutions. We also see, Sir, that these foreign vessels, with their one-half tonnage, used within a fraction as many men and boys to get along with as the American—a palpable saving on the Yankee side, Sir. Then, Sir, during the same period of time there entered the port of New York:

FOREIGN.		AMERICAN.
Number of vessels	4,999	Number of vessels	5,457
Number of tons ..	1,305,279	Number of tons ..	2,907,786
Number of men ..	61,326	Number of men ..	74,618
Number of boys ..	757	Number of boys ..	153

"By this, Sir, it will be seen at once that there were 823 more vessels entered than cleared—a fact that may be accounted for by the varying number at the wharves, by the condemnation of unseaworthy vessels, and various other causes not set down in the calendar, all of which, to a sensible man, are as apparent, Sir, as the nose on your face."

Mr. Biggs paused, and gazed absently at the nasal member, causing, for a moment, a misgiving in my mind that all was not right with that necessary facial appendage. I think it was for the purpose of doing away with this embarrassment that I asked Mr. Biggs what was the entire tonnage of the port of New York.

"1,444,360 tons, Sir," was his immediate response—"one-fifth, Sir, of the entire United States, which is 7,806,035."

A dead silence fell upon us for a few moments

"YOU MOVE ON, NOW."

after this stunning announcement of figures, only broken by Mr. Biggs, who, after fumbling in his pocket, asked,

"Have you any change about you?"

I took out a handful and extended it toward him. He carefully selected a bright quarter and a half-dime. The first he put in his pocket, and, with the other in his fingers, beckoned to the policeman. The M.P.—No. 4429—approached, when Mr. Biggs, deliberately laying the bit of silver in his hand, said,

"Go and get me a cigar, my good fellow."

Astonishment for a moment caused dumbness, but in a mere trifle of time there was a recovery, and No. 4429 slowly raised his hand, and, with a quick, convulsive jerk, cast the coin upon the body of Mr. Biggs, crying as he did so,

"Come, now; you move on, now, I tell yer. I been er having my eye on yer. Yer better move, or I'll bet I make yer bounce, I will."

Mr. Biggs stooped, picked up the fallen silver, gave one gaze upon the offended majesty of the law, and—moved.

Mr. Biggs made no halt in his moving until we stood at the foot of Thirtieth Street, East River, looking over the beautiful sweep of blue water before us, the great masses of rock, yet unlevied, on our left, and the long line of wharves that ran down into the very heart of the city on our right.

"This, Sir," said Mr. Biggs, giving his head a wave that he might keep both hands in his pockets, "is the spot that will be remembered by New Yorkers of the past as Kipp's Bay, now a busy suburb of the busier city. Above this, Sir, at the foot of Thirty-fourth Street, is the ferry to Hunter's Point, Long Island. Now, Sir, let's be off—Down, derry, down."

And Mr. Biggs, suiting the action to the word, started off at a brisk trot, as though under an engagement to be at the Battery in fifteen minutes.

"That, Sir, is Bellevue Hospital we are leaving behind us," said Mr. B., as we reached Twenty-fifth Street—"the hospital for the poor sick and the sick poor. Mighty clean and decent place, Sir. And now, Sir, we are coming to the old House of Refuge. Ah, Sir, how are the mighty fallen! Degraded, Sir, into a laundry, a sawing and splitting place for kindling wood, and a distillery. Here, Sir, we have the ferry to Greenpoint, foot of Twenty-third Street, and another gas company—the New York. This company, Sir, falls somewhat behind the Manhattan in point of size, their territory for supply not being of so great an area, their customers, of which there are 11,000, being entirely below Grand Street. They have 130 miles of cast-iron main, or pipe, laid, and employ 535 men. At these works there are 550 retorts and 6 gas-holders; four more, making ten in all of the latter, are in other parts of the city. They manufacture nearly 600 million of cubic feet of gas per annum."

As Mr. Biggs ran on in his recital I looked out over the great open spaces, which I knew had but recently been reclaimed from the river and filled in to make wharves. Long lines of carts from the interior of the city were filing out continually, dumping dust, garbage, and ashes, to swell the mass that was to add so many feet to New York territory. Hundreds of chiffonniers were scattered over the waste, culling into their bags and baskets what had been cast out by their fellow-man, no doubt often raking from the rubbish treasure-trove that well repaid the labor. We were passing by the yards where were put together those floating palaces of which New York has so just a right to be proud. I saw the great skeletons, gaunt and vast, raised upon the stocks, and the frames knit together, smooth and shapely, only waiting to be consigned to their element, and my heart yearned to wander among them, and see the builders of the ship. I expressed this desire to Mr. Biggs, but Mr. Biggs said, "No, Sir; not to-day—can't permit it, Sir—haven't time—make a special matter of it, Sir—system, Sir, system's the word. Come on!"

And I came on.

Down we went past the Novelty Works and the Morgan Iron Works, where the clang and the clash of the hammer is never still, and the air is dark with the dust and labor of ten thousand men. Down by the ferries—at Tenth Street, to Greenpoint—at Staunton Street, to Williamsburg—and at Grand Street, to the same. Down past great ships, unloading with unfragrant hides, with great tuns of whale oil, and the thousand other things that go toward making up the smell of the wharves; and still by one where they bore out a burden that had gone on board of its own volition—the lifeless body of the captain, who had died in a far-off land, or on a far-off sea. The stevedores stood uncovered, and the careless crowd paused reverently for a moment as the rough, square box was borne to the waiting hearse: the door closed, the vehicle rolled away, and all was life, noise, and bustle again.

"Pier 54, East River, Sir," said Mr. Biggs, "is where all the Italian marble is landed that is brought into this port. In the great blocks you see before you lie all the grand works that will grow into life under the American chisel. Pier No. 53 is the Walnut Street Ferry to Hudson Avenue, Brooklyn. This street was once the most frightfully depraved in New York; and though it has not improved much in physical dirt, it has in mental. Here we come, Sir, to the building for the Tobacco Inspection—a vast pile, where 20,000 hogsheads of American tobacco are taken in yearly, examined, pronounced on, classed, marked, and turned out to be puffed into ashes by the millions all over the earth. And now, Sir, we come to one of the most important adjuncts of a mercantile marine—the dry, or sectional docks—the spot where a sick ship is taken in and done for. Between these two companies—the 'Sectional Dock Company' and the 'New York Balance Dock Company'— there is accommodation for five vessels. The largest of these docks is 300 feet in length, and has a lifting power of 4000 tons. It hoisted out the Great Republic and set her to rights, and proposed to do the same thing with the Great Eastern, but the British monster was coy of a Yankee embrace, and wouldn't trust herself. The power used is steam, and four men jerk these great ships out of water with ease—that is, Sir, with the aid of the engine. When once out, it is not an uncommon sight to see 200 men pegging away at once on a ship's bottom. Should a vessel present herself at these docks in a dangerous or sinking condition when they are all occupied, a certificate to that effect from either company to the Navy-yard, Brooklyn, just opposite, will gain the distressed craft admission to the United States sectional dock at that place, but not otherwise. The charge for hoisting out the sick vessel is twenty-five cents per ton for sailing vessels and fifty cents for steamers. They had the Adriatic up there once, Sir. Not a bad job, that. About $2500 at a pull, Sir. A long pull, and a strong pull, and a pull all together, Sir, eh?"

And Mr. Biggs jocularly carried out his words on the cheap carmine head of a youth of seven summers, given to maternity and curiosity, who had for the previous four minutes been dividing his attentions between a fat baby nearly as large as himself which he carried, and a laudable desire to overlook my sketch-book, in which I was trying, in my poor way, to delineate what I saw.

"Pier No. 40, Sir, another Bethel. No. 39,

'Hydrostatic Lifting Docks,' for same purpose as those above. No. 34, Sir, Catharine Ferry, part of the machinery of the Union Ferry Company, of which more anon, Sir. Anon! Pier No. 33, Sir, sacred to oysters, another spot where the delightful bivalve comes in by the hundreds of tons. A large business done here, though not as large as on the North River side. Delightful East Rivers, Princes Bays, etc., and so forth!"

I remembered the gentleman's remark at the foot of Spring Street, and felt timid as I looked upon the countenance of Mr. Biggs. An ounce of prevention is better than a pound of cure, and so I said,

"Try an oyster, Mr. Biggs?"

Mr. Biggs assented; and in less than fifteen minutes I was well aware that the words of Mr. Biggs in their praise came from his heart. His acts responded to his sentiment. Mr. Biggs issued upon the wharf smiling benignantly, and pressing his hand gently on the spot to which he had transferred two dozen. We walked on.

"Another ferry to Hunter's Point," said Mr. B., finding his voice. "Pier 32. Pier No. 29, another ferry to Williamsburg and to Bridge Street, Brooklyn. And here, Sir, we stand upon the spot where was started the first ferry to Brooklyn, in the year 1642. At that time, Sir, Cornelius Dierkson, an able Dutchman, who had tasted the dangers of the deep, even as far as Sandy Hook upon the Bay and Hellgate upon the East River, started a ferry from his own farm, which lay along this bank from Roosevelt Street to Beekman, unto the opposite shore. From that time the Brooklyn Ferry became an established fact from this street, having only been removed to Fulton Street within the memory of the oldest inhabitant. The landing on the Brooklyn side was close by what is now called Fulton Street. There the ferry-house, firstly a small frame building standing elevated on the bank, secondly a stone house built close to a wharf erected for ferry purposes. In 1710 and 1720, Sir, there stood a house on the corner of what is now Broad Street and Exchange Place, which went by the name of 'The Ferry-House,' it being a place of entertainment for man and beast, and the door of the hostel surmounted by the carved figure of a boat with rowers. But, Sir, I have my doubts whether this was strictly a ferry-house, though it is so recognized by the historians. I set it down as a place where the farmers and boatmen who came with produce put up while they were selling their truck. At that time, Sir, the highest wharf up, on the East River side, was at Roosevelt Street. As you perceive, Sir, this spot—Pier No. 26—is now occupied by the Peck Slip Ferry Company to Williamsburg, lately known as the Eastern District of Brooklyn. This ferry privilege is accounted sufficiently valuable to find purchasers of the lease at $21,000 per annum—a bargain that endures until 1869, while the one from Grand Street to Williamsburg, which we passed some time since, pays $18,000 per annum unto the same year. A great place, that Brooklyn, Sir," added Mr. Biggs, meditatively. "The third city in the Union—275,000 inhabitants.

I can remember, Sir, when there were only 7000. Here's a view of it"—and here Mr. Biggs extracted a paper from a package in one of his multitudinous pockets—"as it appeared in 1810—the year I was born; I've kept it on that account. I'll make you a present of it to remember me by. And here, by-the-way, is a picture of the Ferry-House of 1791. Ah! how time does pass!"

FERRY-HOUSE, BROOKLYN, 1791.

Mr. Biggs here paused suddenly before an establishment which had evidently been erected in the ruder ages from primeval plank. Its construction hesitated between the coal-box and the pig-sty, and had as an aperture one place only, serving both for door and window, the shutter of which, upon being let down, furnished a table or counter for the sale of such articles as its proprietor had to offer the public. These consisted of a dozen or two of clams, about the same number of oysters laid out on small plates, and various like-size crockery receptacles filled with the flesh of the succulent lobster. Inside this establishment stood a gentleman and a small cask, the gentleman bearing the impress upon his features of being upon the best of terms with at least that portion of his property. Over the door was stretched a line of letters, reading, "RESTERANT;" while below the counter a label fluttered in the breeze, bearing on it, "1000 able-bodied men wanted immediately, to drink Swingle's Lager Beer. None but those having the spondulix need apply." It was before this place that Mr. Biggs paused and turned the flesh of the succulent lobster over with his finger. The gentleman inside addressed him:

"Well now, bossy, what kin I do for you? Try er lobstaw, bossy?"

"Ain't got no money," said Mr. Biggs, still fingering the morsels.

"Oh, come now, none o' that ere lallygag," responded the gentleman. "Go in, bossy!"

Mr. Biggs raised a morsel to his lips, tasted, smacked them, and swallowed it. He gazed a moment on the dish and then turned away. I saw a gathering cloud on the face of the store-keeper. I remembered the Spring Street oyster-boat, and I laid the sum of six cents as a peace-offering on the counter. Mr. Biggs saw the act as he had receded a few steps, and once more turned and devoured the balance of the dish.

"Piers 24 and 25, Sir," continued Mr. Biggs, as he passed on, "are the wharves of the New Haven and Hartford steamboats. Fine boats, Sir, fine boats! From Pier 21 to 22 is the Fulton Ferry, the oldest of the Brooklyn ferries. This and most of the other Brooklyn ferries are held under lease by one Company, under the title of the Union Ferry Company. Over the joint ferries to Brooklyn 40,000 persons are computed to pass daily. After you pass this point, Sir, come the wharves where the most valuable products that enter into New York are landed, and where the oldest shipping houses are located. The China and Australian trade; the old lines of London, Liverpool, and Havre packets; gold, ivory, palm-oil, drugs, dye-woods, and precious stuffs; teas, wines, silks, cloths, and indigo. The waste and thieving, Sir, along these wharves is equal to half a dozen fortunes yearly, in spite of every precaution. I think it would be safe to say, Sir, that from the Fulton Ferry to Pier No. 16, which we are just coming to, and which is the foot of Wall Street, the lurking-place of the bulls and bears, and the slip of another ferry to Brooklyn is the very richest section of the city wharves. You might be satisfied, Sir, if you were in receipt of the customs levied on what comes in here for one quarter of a mill in one year."

Mr. Biggs here jingled something audibly in his pockets, which, if he had not already declared himself without money, I should certainly have recognized for the sound of that useful article. I don't think the quarter which he took from me was quite without company.

"Here, Sir," he resumed, "is the old Fly Market, now the Franklin. It was the first market established in this city, though sadly fallen into disuse. From this point, Sir, if you will cast your eye along South, you will see an immense fleet of tow-boats and propellers of every size. Big box, little box, bandbox and bundle, Sir; one, two, three, four thousand. The first cloud of 'em, at Pier No. 8, is the family of the Erie Railroad. The great, crab-like, puffing and blowing machine, with its dirty attendant satellites, that you see off this pier, is the dredging machine, commonly called a 'mud-scow,' used for deepening the water in the docks by relieving them of the great mass of mud that washes in, and the filth that comes out of the sewers and does not get off with the tides."

"Once more, Sir," said Mr. Biggs, stretching out his hand, "we stand within view of that noble spot, the Battery. Here, Sir, are the slips of the South and Hamilton ferries to Brooklyn, Pier No. 2; and just over there is the Staten Island Ferry; while this, Sir, between, is the wharf on which are located three important establishments: the barge office, the office of the Associated Press, and the boat-house of the Harbor Police. This is Pier No. 1, Sir. The barge office, Sir, is the house built on the extreme end of the wharf, with a steeple, which steeple has at its top a white revolving light. Within it the inspectors of customs wait when not on actual duty. From there they are assigned to ships as they arrive, to watch over the interests of Uncle Sam, and see that nothing comes ashore without paying duty into his coffers. Two inspectors are assigned to each steamer, and these gentlemen are expected to keep wide awake, for Uncle Sam is confiding enough not to put seals or locks on this description of craft. At this wharf, also, all cabin passengers coming by steamers that carry steerage passengers are landed, and their baggage is looked into here to prevent any little private smuggling. From this wharf, also, all the Government supplies for the use of troops, etc., at Governor's Island are shipped. The office of the Associated Press is the small white building. From this they dispatch their boats to board vessels, and to this all matter, newspapers, and so forth, is brought. The Harbor Police, Sir, keep their boats in that boat-house below. They do duty upon the water the same as other police on the land, having their various sub-stations at different places along the docks of both rivers. It consists of an acting captain, four sergeants, and fifty-seven men. They have ten boats, every one of which has its especial crew. Ah! A-h-h-h! Come along, Sir. Why don't—you—come—along, Sir?"

I had noticed for some little time that Mr. Biggs had been growing curt and condensed; but when I considered that we had traveled over a distance of nine miles, with but slight refreshment, and that the sun was going far down what the poets happily call "the western slopes," I felt that it would be ungenerous on my part to complain. And yet I am obliged to confess that I was not prepared for so sudden a termination to his eloquent lessons, nor yet to see Mr. Biggs make so sudden a dash at an upward-bound omnibus, calling to the driver, as I paid, to set us down at the Nonsuch House.

"Do you think," said Mr. Biggs, "that we could get a little drop of good brandy at that hotel of yours?"

I thought we could, and that evening, after dinner, Mr. Biggs thoroughly tested the matter, doing me the honor to inquire especially after my aunt Deborah Jane, whom I had casually mentioned as the owner of a fine farm, and having, moreover, sundry shares in the "New York Central;" and to drink her health, making the assertion very positively that,

"She's a fine woman, Sir! Charming woman, Sir! I shall come to Herkimer next summer, Sir. Give my respects, Sir, to your aunt."

Mr. Biggs slept at the Nonsuch House that night.

TOMMATOO.

I.—THE HOUSE BY THE STONE-YARD.

A FAIRY that had lost the power of vanishing, and was obliged to remain ever present, doing continual good; a cricket on the hearth, chirping through heat and cold; an animated amulet, sovereign against misfortune; a Santa Claus, without the wrinkles, but young and beautiful, choosing the darkest moments to leap right into one's heart, and drop there the prettiest moral playthings to gladden and make gay—such, in my humble opinion, was Tommatoo.

As yet I do not ask the reader to agree with me; for over him I have this one great advantage—I know who Tommatoo is. When, however, he makes her acquaintance also, hears her twitter round the house, beholds the flash of her large dusky-gray eyes, is wonder-struck at the marvelous twinkling of her ever-dancing little feet, he can take his choice of all the personifications with which I began this story, and I feel convinced that he will select the most beautiful to enrobe Tommatoo.

There is (or rather was six years ago, when the incidents to be narrated took place; but I shall narrate them in the present tense) a vast flat of land stretching along the New York shore of the North River, close to where Thirty-second Street vanishes into a swamp, in which unborn avenues are supposed to be slowly maturing. Although yet in embryo, they are already christened, and city engineers have imaginative ground-plans hanging on their walls, where Twelfth and Thirteenth avenues are boldly represented with as much minuteness as Fifth or Sixth. Should, however, any sanguine person be led by those delusive maps to seek for such mythical thoroughfares, Ponce de Leon, after his pursuit of the Fountain of Youth, would not offer a more striking example of ill success. On reaching the spot where imagination depicted the long perspective of rails, with crowded and hurrying cars gliding smoothly to and fro, he would behold this vision of civic activity replaced by the dreary and mysterious waste I have spoken of, without even a sign-post pointing to the splendid future reserved for it by city surveyors.

This tract of land is perhaps the most melancholy and mysterious spot in the whole city. The different streets that cross the island pull up, as it were, suddenly on reaching this dreary place, seemingly afraid to trust themselves any farther. The buildings that approach nearest to its confines are long, low ranges of fetid slaughter-houses, where on Sundays bloated butcher-boys lounge against the walls; and on week-days one hears through the closed doors the muffled blow, the heavy fall of the oxen within; the groan, and the hard-drawn breath; and then a red, sluggish stream trickles out from under the door-way and flows into the gutter, where hungry dogs wait impatiently to lap it up. The murderous atmosphere, these smells of blood, seem appropriate enough as one approaches this desolate locality.

A great plain of red swampy clay is covered here and there with numberless huge, helpless beams of timber—some floating like dead rafts in the stream, and chained to the bank; others high and dry, blackening in the sun, and shadowing criminal-looking dogs that skulk in and out among them all day long. One or two immature piers jut out into the river here and there, and grimy sloops that seem to have no particular trade, unless it is to rot calmly at their moorings, lie alongside, and grate and chafe lazily against the slimy logs. A few homeless boys, with smeared faces and thin, starved arms, who seem to have dressed themselves in the rags and kite-tails that flutter on telegraph wires, lie on the sunny sides of the timber piles sleeping away hunger, or sometimes sit on the edges of the green piers languidly fishing for something which they never catch. Cinders most unaccountably prevail all over the place; they crackle under the feet, and the dogs gather round occasional piles of them, growling over a burned bone lying in the ashes: where they come from is not to be known. There are no houses, no factories, and the rotting sloops are so damp and slimy that it would be a mockery to suppose a fire had ever been lit in any one of them. Nevertheless the cinders prevail; and at certain hours in the day two or three crouching creatures wander slowly among the heaps, picking mysterious objects with hands that seem themselves to have been burned into coke.

The place is also a species of Morgue for dead dogs. Every cur that the Hudson drowns floats inevitably to this spot and is swept up on the swampy bank, when the outlawed mongrels that skulk between the timber logs crowd around it, and perhaps identify the corpse. On Sundays you see a few low-browed, soap-locked loafers strolling among the piles, pitching stones into the water, and, if it is summer, stripping off their tattered shirts to have a swim; but on week-days the place is entirely dead. The starved boys and the shadowy rag-pickers flitting here and there give no air of life; they seem very thin and impalpable, and haunt the place like ghosts.

Farther on this dreary swamp changes somewhat its character. The great balks of timber disappear, and a few shingle huts—so loosely built that the wind whistles through their walls with a shriek of triumph—are scattered here and there. Large masses of stone lie about, hewn into square blocks for house-fronts, and in the daytime the monotonous click of the stone-cutter's chisel shrills continually from the shingle huts. This straggling stone-yard, for such it is, is perhaps less desolate than the swamp farther down, but at night—when the moon streams on the huge white blocks that lie there so cold and dead, and the huts are deserted by the workmen, and nothing moves but a shadowy dog that flits by, seen for an instant against the pallid stones—the place is inexpressibly weird and lonely.

Just on the confines of this stone-yard, in a rutty, half-made road that is bounded on both sides by burned-looking building lots, where nothing hides the scalded earth but some unhealthy-looking boulders, and occasional remnants of old shoes that are black and pulpy with decay, stands a small house built of unpainted shingles. It is two-storied, with a basement, and a somewhat imposing flight of steps up to the door; yet it wears a reckless and despairing aspect. I have no doubt when this house was first built it had many youthful hopes of establishing a neighborhood and becoming a dwelling of respectability. It promised itself, perhaps, a coat or two of paint, and had visions of being the ancestor of a street. But year after year wore away, and it found itself still naked as when it was born. No companion dwelling lifted its head to cheer the solitude. On all sides the bleak river-winds tousled and smote its bare walls until its windows chattered with the cold. It grew weary of waiting for the neighborhood that never was to come, and seemed to care no longer what became of it. It let beardy mosses grow all over its haggard face. Its edges were chipped and ragged; its chimneys, no longer spruce and tapering, bulged and tottered to one side like the crushed hat of a confirmed drunkard. It buttoned itself up no more about the chest with its snug, comfortable doors, but let them hang loose on one hinge, and flap about in the wind. It was evident to any one who saw it that the house near the stone-yard had gone to the bad.

Forlorn and seedy as it looked, this house was inhabited. The shivering, shrunken windows gleamed with lights by night, yet not cheerfully, but with a wild glare, like that which streams from the eyes of those about to die. If the skulking men that prowled in summer evenings among the sheds of the stone-yard, whisting mysteriously to each other, had any taste for music, the house would have been to them a source of great wonder. Sometimes for hours together a wild and mellow music would stream upon the air, soaring over the dreary yard, wailing sadly along the waste river-grounds and by the rotting sloops until it reached the water, when it would float triumphally along, as if it knew that it was leaving the desolate place behind it, and bury itself deep in the sleeping groves that nodded on the distant Weehawken heights. The character of these melodious sounds was entirely mystical and strange. They were not born of violin or bugle, and yet seemed to have the souls of both instruments intermingling with another distinctly their own. Another soul, not merely instrumental, but human, passionate, luxuriant, as if all the utterances of a great Italian love—desire, entreaty, and triumph—were translated into aerial harmonies.

To you and I, reader, there need be no mystery in either house or music. That despairing-looking chateau was inhabited but by three people—an old man, a young girl, and a youth of about twenty-one. As age is entitled to its traditional homage of precedence, I will first introduce you to the elder of the trio. I beg to present to your notice the maestro, Baioccho.

You could not possibly conceive a man made up with less waste of material than Signor Baioccho. Nature, when she formed him, must have been terribly short of stuff. There was too little of every thing in his physical composition. He was abbreviated in every limb and feature. This, nevertheless, was fortunate, for had he been on a large scale he would have been insupportably ugly; he was too small, however, to be repulsive, and so was only queer. But how queer he was, with his withered, pinched up face, his sparse, stiff beard, which looked like a thin growth of thorns, and his quaint, convulsed figure, that gave one the idea that all inside of him was catgut and wheels, and that something was continually breaking in his machinery! Yet, with all this likeness to a comic toy, how inexpressibly mournful was the countenance of Signor Baioccho! what terrible sorrow was hopelessly shut up in that wretched little frame!

Baioccho had been a musician, and was now a cook. Years ago, when Opera was young in New York, Baioccho came here from Italy with a company, set up an opera-house, was instantly successful, and made a fortune. Music was his religion, the lyric stage his temple, the conductor's desk his altar, the overture his mass. But he became a fanatic in his faith. He enlarged his house; he spent thousands of dollars on the production of new operas, and, as a matter of course, he became bankrupt. For the Opera is like a Parisian mistress, the most charming, fascinating, bewildering of all creations, and invariably leaves you without a shilling in the end. For many years poor Baioccho struggled to keep his feet. He led orchestras at second-rate theatres; he gave lessons on the piano and violin, always hoping, always dreaming of some one day grasping again the magical baton, the sceptre of his world. It was a vain struggle, however; other maestri came over from Italy with still more wondrous and expensive singers than those Baioccho brought, and they built opera-houses, and bought newspaper critics, and covered the dead walls with huge announcements of colossal successes; and the world rushing on the heels of novelty, swept over the ancestor of American Opera, and poor Baioccho found himself trampled on, bruised, and left to die.

It were too sad a task to enumerate the various steps which led Baioccho from Parnassus to the kitchen. An accomplishment, of which in his palmy days he had been not a little proud, was now brought into requisition to save him from starvation; the hand that was too weak to hold the baton found itself still able to brandish the ladle. Those gay Italian tenors, those majestic basses, little thought when, round his elegant supper-table long ago, they used to applaud his amateur cookery, delicious mayonnaises, harmonious salads, that the day would arrive when the poor conductor would don the white apron and cotton cap very seriously, and sweat all day in a restaurant kitchen through an eternal round of soups and roasts and entrées ever the same. But so it was. Those who frequented Calcar's Restaurant would now and then behold a wizened little man stealing quietly from some mysterious passage leading to the kitchen, and sneaking up to the bar, where he would hastily swallow a potent draught of raw brandy, and shuffle back guiltily to the place from whence he came. And they would see one or two old New Yorkers looking pitifully after him, and saying to each other that they remembered poor Baioccho when he drove his carriage. He trudged now though home every night on foot; and it was sad to see the old fellow, unsteady with drink, staggering down the rutty road to the house near the stone-yard, where the faithful Tommatoo kept watch until she heard his stumbling footstep, when, tripping to the door, she tenderly helped him up to bed.

So! we have come at last to Tommatoo. I have been longing to get to her for some time past, but it would have been unkind to have deserted poor old Baioccho now that he is so poor. Salutation to his misfortunes!

Tommatoo was Baioccho's only child. In some quaint old Italian chapel, it may be by the shores of Sorrento, a smiling babe was one sunny day christened by the stout old Padre, and the name bestowed was Tomasina. Melodious as was this pretty name, the little girl that bore it, as soon as she reached lisping age, obstinately refused to be known by any cognomen but that of Tommatoo. This sounded awfully heathenish to old Baioccho, but she was apparently determined, and in time her imperious infant will had its effect on the family. She became Tommatoo to all intents and purposes, as far as household experience went, and even when she grew up to the age of reason did not seem anxious to reclaim her original appellation.

Tommato was one of those lovely fair-haired Italians that one sees so seldom, but which once seen are never forgotten. At some antique period, when Alaric was king, some of the blood of his blonde race must have mingled with the olive-skinned Roman Baiocchi, and after centuries of rest suddenly bloomed in Tommato. Her eyes were a dark liquid gray like a twilight lake. Her face was pale, yet not cold, for a southern fire seemed to smoulder beneath the skin, with a beautiful, subdued glow. Her mouth, small and moist and rosy, pouted over pearly teeth, half seen, and the curves of her smooth cheeks swept into a wickedly dimpled chin, that aided and abetted with all its might the criminal beauty of her bewildering lips. This sweet virginal face was set in a golden frame of luxuriant hair that one of Raphael's saints might have envied.

Yet why speak of Tommato's beauty so rapturously? I shall have no enthusiasm left for that bright and joyous nature that burst from her as the sun from out of a little golden cloud, shedding its own lustre on every thing, and infusing into all a portion of its own innate warmth. Every one has felt at times, when wandering through the fields, the intense joy he experienced from the twittering of the birds amidst the branches and the glancing of their tiny forms through the leaves. Some such pure and healthy influence did Tommato exercise over the little household. She twittered and sung, and, as it were, fluttered lightly through the rooms until one could swear that the sun shone wherever she went. All day, while old Baiocchi was off attending to his culinary duties, compounding wondrous soups, and moving amidst the thick steams of the kitchen like an elf in some incantation scene, Tommato was putting the old house in order; sweeping up the little sitting-room, displaying its scanty furniture to the best advantage, and occasionally darting in like a swallow into Mr. Gustave Beaumont's sanctum sanctorum.

It must be confessed that this was one of the household occupations that Tommato performed with the greatest willingness; for Mr. Gustave Beaumont was young, handsome, and played the most delightful melodies on his great instrument, invented by himself, entitled the Pancorno. The Pancorno was a singular piece of mechanism; hideously suggestive in appearance of some nameless instrument of torture from the dungeons of the Inquisition, yet in reality capable of soothing the most agonizing pains by the sweetness of its notes. By aid of some interior arrangement of tubes, the vibrations of the horn portion acted in turn upon what must have been a series of wires also concealed, and which seemed to give the effect of a trio between flute, violin, and French-horn. It was from the Pancorno that the seraphic strains heard at nights across the stone-yard floated so harmoniously, giving to the old house an air of being one of those enchanted abodes frequent in fairy tales, in which dwelt some spell-bound Prince, who thus summoned in music his faithful knights to his rescue.

Gustave was a clever young Frenchman, with an extraordinary passion for music, whom old Baiocchi had known ever since he was a child. He was the son of the bassoon in one of the orchestras which the maestro had conducted in his palmy days; but one night the bassoon died in the middle of a rapid passage, and the little Gustave was left without a father, and but one friend, Baiocchi. The old Italian took the bassoon's son home, brought him up as his own child along with Tommato; and when his fall came Gustave still shared his scanty means. To do the young fellow justice, he wanted to work, but the old man would not have it. "You are a genius, Gustave," he would say, "and, please the Virgin, you shall do something great." So Gustave did nothing great or small save the invention of the Pancorno, out of which he expected to reap a fortune, and he continued to live at the house by the stone-yard, having first scrupulously bargained with his entertainer to pay three dollars a week, which, as he did nothing but play on the Pancorno and make love to Tommato, it is needless to say he never earned and never paid. It quieted his conscience, however, and he used to say to himself that when he sold his invention for one hundred thousand dollars, that being the lowest he would take for it, old Baiocchi should live like a prince.

And this is the last of the inmates of the house by the stone-yard.

II.—A FAMILY GROUP.

"Is that you, father?"

"Ah, the little Tommato! So you maintain the watch for the poor old father? Bless you, little angel!"

"Take care of the step, father. Take care."

"Put yourself easy, my child. I will be remindful of the step. I am very steadfast on my feet this evening."

And as if to falsify his testimony, poor old Baiocchi staggered up the steps leading to the hall-door, and would have fallen if Tommato had not caught one of his thin arms and held him up.

"It is nothing; it is nothing!" he exclaimed, as he tottered through the hall into the little parlor. "I can walk myself well enough. But it is the kitchen—that dam kitchen! It has got into my head, my child. Where is the cognac?"

"Do you think it would do you any good, father?" asked Tommato, sorrowfully; "won't it make your head bad?"

"Ah, little dove! It does not comprehend. My child, the cognac is the life to me. When I stew and form dishes and mingle soups all day long in that dam kitchen it get into my head; and sometimes, mon Dieu! when I stand over the ragout, and try to forget the place where I have found myself for a moment, the old times return upon me, and I become very sad and sorrowful, so that I have to walk myself out to the bar and drink the cognac; and then, per baccho! I remember myself not, and I go back to my kitchen quite raised. Give me one little glass of cognac, my child!—one glass for the poor old father!"

Tommatoo fluttered over to a little cupboard that stood on one side of the room, and brought out a little bottle and a wine-glass, and pouring out some brandy handed it to the old man. He raised it tremulously to his lips and quaffed it off at a single draught; then, smacking his lips, he muttered, "Ah! the cognac is the soul to the old men like me!"

There was nothing disgusting in Baioccho's intoxication. If one saw one of those toy-men tipsy, it would not have been less revolting than the inebriety of the old musician. His little eyes only twinkled the brighter, and his nose seemed longer and sharper and thinner, and his lips moved more rapidly; but that was all. His speech was not thick, nor were his ideas clouded. It was drunkenness idealized.

"What has my child to tell me of the day?" asked the old man, invigorated as it were by the petit verre de cognac.

Tommatoo drooped her eyelids, colored a little, and did not reply for a moment.

"Some one has been here," she said, at last.

"Which was it, little one?"

"It was—it was—" And the little one faltered.

"Diable!" cried the old man, leaping like an enraged cat from his chair, as if an idea had flashed upon him suddenly. "Ten millions of devils! was it not that brute Giuseppe?"

"It was, father," answered Tommatoo, soothingly. "Pray, don't fly into a rage. I could not help it."

"The wretch! the abandoned-by-God miserable fellow!" shouted old Baioccho, growing more and more excited each moment. "So he must place himself near my child, my angel, to steal her away from me! But we will see! What did he say to you?" he added, turning almost fiercely to Tommatoo.

"Oh, nothing more than what he has said to you. He said he loved me very much, and if I would marry him that he would take us all back to Italy, and that you should end your days in comfort."

"Oh, the serpent! His mother and his grandfather were snakes! You know not that man, Tommatoo! He is capable of roasting his father on a spit!"

"But, dear father, you know I hate him. I will never marry any one but Gustave, and not that until you wish it. I laughed at Giuseppe, and told him to go away." And Tommatoo made an ineffectual attempt to give some idea of her stern manner to Giuseppe; but if the reality was at all like the representation, I don't think that the descendant of snakes was very much crushed.

"Ah! child, you are as innocent as the flower that grows under our feet!" and Baioccho looked down, but finding no flowers, continued: "He will perform some mischief to us. I feel it in—in the air!" and the sharp eyes seemed to pierce into the depths of the gloomy room, and fasten on some spectral misfortune.

"Now Gustave is a good boy. He will be a great man. His Pancorno shall be played in many universal cities, and the good fortune shall come to him. Thou shalt be the wife of Gustave, my small pet child!"

"But," said Tommatoo, with a half smile, "I think he loves his Pancorno better than he does me."

"It is the love of the artist, mignonne. He loves it with his soul, but his heart—ah, that is thine!"

"Hark! there he is!" cried Tommatoo, hushing her father into silence as the liquid, delicious notes of the Pancorno stole through the house.

"Yes, let us listen. Oh, Heaven, how beautiful!" exclaimed the old musician, rapturously; then in a half whisper added, "one little glass more of the cognac, ma biche."

And there they sat in the dusk of the room, the old man warming his veins with the cognac, the young girl dreaming of her lover, and both listening to the music that bore them far away, out of the old house by the stone-yard, into a delicious land, where the sea lay like a mistress on the broad breast of the beaches, and the breath of the orange groves wandered like unheard music through the slopes and valleys.

"I think so of my home," murmured the old maestro, and I know that a tear fell through the twilight as he spoke—"of my dear, dear home when I hear the music. Ah! why does not my brother—the brother of my youth—replace me in my dear Italy? He is more rich than a great many of Jews, and yet he will not spare his poor brother one scudo, Tommatoo. Oh! if I were the rich Pietro, and he the poor cook Giulio Baioccho, I would not count my zechins until he had what he wanted. If he would only promise to leave my little Tommatoo something when he died I would not care for myself. Ah, the bad brother! Mignonne, one other little verre de cognac for the poor old cook."

"Shall I go and tell Gustave that you have come home?" asked Tommatoo. "We must have supper soon, you know, father."

"Do, my beloved. Sweet as are the notes of the Pancorno, thy voice is sweeter still. Go and gladden the good Gustave with its music."

Tommatoo tripped to the door, perched for a moment on the threshold like a little bird hovering on the edge of its cage, then, after looking back into the dusky room with a radiant smile that seemed to illuminate the twilight, she vanished, and in a few moments the notes of the Pancorno ceased, and there were light, pattering footsteps heard in its stead.

The old musician, when she was gone, buried his head in his hands, and seemed lost in meditation. So lost that he neither heard nor saw any thing around him. Neither the footsteps that came softly toward him through the gloom, nor the tall cloaked form that stood beside him.

until a hand laid on his shoulder startled him from his reverie, and he looked up.

"Who is that?" he asked, with a sort of astonished abruptness, as he in vain tried to distinguish the new-comer's features through the darkness.

"It is I—Giuseppe," answered the figure in a very calm voice, and in Italian.

"What dost thou here again, outcast?" cried the old maestro, starting from his seat hurriedly and in great agitation. "I tell thee that thou shalt never wed my daughter. I know thee well. I know of thy prison life. I know of that bloody affair in Venice, when even the sacred stole of the priest could not shield his heart from thy accursed hand. Begone! or I will call for help, and have thee lodged in the jail."

"Come, come, Baioccho, no need of all this bad language. You wrong me, I swear you wrong me. I am not the man you take me for, nor do I wish to press my suit with Tommatoo. I come for other ends. I bear great tidings to thee. I bring thee great riches."

"Ah, boaster, you will not cajole me with your fine words!" cried the old cook, mockingly.

"If I do may I forget my mother's grave!" exclaimed Giuseppe, earnestly. "Walk with me for ten minutes along the road, and if I prove not my words thou shalt never see my face again."

In spite of his detestation of his fellow-countryman Baioccho could not prevent his heart from leaping to his mouth at the mention of wealth. In a moment he saw himself emancipated from the accursed kitchen, his Tommatoo clad as became her beauty, Gustave's Pancorno brought before the public, and all three living happily in the dear Italy, making a music out of life itself.

"Well," said he, "I will go and walk with you. But why not tell it here?"

"Because houses are less safe to speak in than the universe," said Giuseppe. "You forget that I was once a conspirator, and am cautious."

"I remember it well enough," muttered Baioccho, as both left the house, "and the police of Venice remember it better."

They walked slowly toward the stone-yard. Neither spoke. Baioccho disdaining to show any impatience; Giuseppe remaining silent for some motive of his own. So on through the stone-yard. Amidst the white blocks that loomed like dim ghosts through the darkness. By the shingle huts that, with their jagged corners and irregular roofs, seemed in the darkness to crouch like strange animals, squatting upon the dreary earth. Over rough masses of unhewn stone, through deep ruts left by cart-wheels in the soft clay, until they reached the river.

"Well," said Baioccho, at last, "how long am I to wait for this wondrous intelligence?"

"Your brother is dead," answered Giuseppe.

"What!" almost shrieked the old cook, "and—and—he left—"

"You every thing."

"Holy Virgin be praised!" ejaculated the poor old fellow, clasping his hands and kneeling in the damp, oozy earth. "My dear Tommatoo will be rich."

"I have just arrived from Italy," continued Giuseppe. "I saw your brother. I found him dying. I spoke to him about you, and induced him to will to you the fortune which he was going to leave to the Church. Do you not think I deserve some reward for all this?"

"You shall have it. I swear it!" cried the old musician, fervently. "You shall name your own reward."

"Good. I want your daughter."

"Ah, traitor! that is what you demand!" cried the excitable old man in his shrill voice. "Never! never! never! No; you shall have money, but no Tommatoo—no Tommatoo."

"Tommatoo is your heir-at-law when you die," remarked Giuseppe.

"Certainly. I know why you want to wed with her, you fellow!"

"She will inherit very soon."

"Eh!" The old man did not exactly seem to comprehend, but peered up into Giuseppe's face.

"She will come into possession in ten minutes," added Giuseppe, and rapidly as lightning he passed a sort of handkerchief across Baioccho's mouth, stifling all utterance. The old man, though thin, possessed a great tenacity of muscle, and he struggled long and vigorously against his assailant. He twined about his legs, he crawled up his huge chest, he dug his bony fingers into his throat, all the while uttering through the gag upon his mouth terrible muffled cries of agony that were more dreadful from their being so suppressed. The youth and strength of Giuseppe told at last. The old man grew faint and almost ceased to struggle. In an instant Giuseppe seized him by the waist, lifted him clear off the ground, and swung him into the river. He watched him sink. "I think that Tommatoo is mine now," he muttered, as he turned and fled rapidly back through the stone-yard.

Baioccho sank but speedily came to the surface. Instinctively he stretched out his hands, and suddenly one of them came in contact with some floating substance. He grasped it, and found it a drifting beam of timber that had become loosed from its moorings to the bank and was traveling with the stream. With some difficulty he got astride of it and removed his gag. His first impulse was to shout for help, for he could not swim, and he was already some distance from the bank, and he put all his strength into a furious cry. The sound of his own voice echoing over that desolate shore seemed to tell him how little chance he had of obtaining assistance in that way, and after shouting until his lungs were sore, he gave it up, and clung to the hope of being picked up by some boat.

The tide was running out rapidly, and a wind was blowing down stream, so that Baioccho could tell from the rippling of the waves around the beam that he was floating fast with the current. It was very dark. On either side of the bank he could see the faint lights in the houses, and now and then the black spectral hull of some sloop or schooner would suddenly appear to him as he floated past and then vanish. All on the river seemed dead. There was not a sound of life. There did not seem a hope for the old musician.

Still he floated fast. Past the dreary black wharves, round which vessels made palisades of masts seen dimly against the dull sky. Past the shadowy groves of the Elysian Fields, that now, alas! seemed like the banks of Acheron. Past the cheerful Atlantic Gardens, where even still lights gleamed on the water, and people were making merry, while the poor old musician was floating to his death. Past the great hive of the city, that in the gloom seemed to lie upon the water exhausted with its day's labor. And so on out into the broad bays. Then for the first time Baioccho felt that he would be swept out to sea. He had not recoiled from his fate up to this time, for he was brave, and, after all, drowning was only death. But starvation—ah! that thought was too horrible, and for the first time a groan escaped from the poor musician. He then thought of Tommatoo, of Gustave, of their agony at his never returning. Their vague sorrow for his fate, which would never be known. Then he prayed to God that the murderer, Giuseppe, would be baffled in his designs on his dear child—and then—

A dull roaring sound along the water. A hissing of the air and of the sea. A red glare from what seemed like a fierce angry eye moving over the waves. A sparkle of foam, seen white through the gloom, and Baioccho saw the ferry-boat bearing right down on him. He shouted; he tried to stand upright on the timber log, but it slipped and turned; he took off his coat and flung it high in the air—all to attract attention. But in vain. Closer, closer came the fiery eye. With what seemed to the old musician ever-increasing speed the sharp prow cut through the water. The funnel gave out short puffs of triumph, the wheels beat their paddles madly on the water, as if they knew what work they had to do, then a sudden, awful shriek from Baioccho. The projecting ledge of the boat shot over him. He touched it for an instant with his hand, and then went under.

III.—THE GRANDSON OF SNAKES.

"Father, Gustave will be down in a few minutes, and we will have supper!" cried Tommatoo, fluttering into the dark room like some pretty little nocturnal bird. "Father! why don't you answer? Why, where can he be? Ah, that cognac! He has perhaps taken too much while I was away, poor father!" and Tommatoo hastily lit, with a lucifer match, a poor little fluid lamp, and held it high above her head while her eyes every where sought the expected recumbent form of the old musician.

"Why, he is not here!" she cried, in a tone half of astonishment half of alarm. "Oh! where has he gone? Not out into this dark, dark night.

God forbid! I will call Gustave;" and she ran toward the door of the apartment. But ere she quite reached it she stopped and drew back, for a tall, dark figure filled the little door-way, and a pair of bright sinister eyes reflected back the lamplight.

"Ah! pretty one! you did not expect to see me again to-day, did you?" said the new-comer, in a half mocking tone, and in Italian; "but you see how it is: I am fascinated, and haunt the spot where I will find you."

"Signor Giuseppe, my father does not wish you to come here; you know what I think, and yet you come. That I think is wrong;" and Tommatoo looked like a moralist of the Middle Ages, if one could imagine such a personage with beautiful blonde hair, large dark-gray eyes, and the neatest little waist in the world.

"Ah! none of you appreciate me," answered Giuseppe, advancing into the chamber. "Your father is a good man, but full of prejudices. I am progressive, and he does not understand progress—that is all. But I am a good fellow, Signorina—a capital fellow for all that."

He looked at this moment, standing close to the door and unclasping his heavy cloak, with his pale, unhealthy skin shining in the lamplight and his eyes glistening with a furtive meaning, so truly the reverse of a good fellow that I am not surprised at the faint frown that perched for a moment on Tommatoo's forehead, and then suddenly slid off of her smooth temples and was lost.

"I am going, Signor Giuseppe," she said, making a movement toward the door, between which and her the Italian was standing. "I wish you a good-evening."

"Stay a moment!" he cried, interposing. "Where is the worthy Baioccho?"

"He is not here. I do not know where he is. Let me pass, Signor. I am going to search for him."

"Perhaps he has taken too much of the delightful cognac of which he is so fond," said Giuseppe, sneeringly.

"My father is a good man, Signor!" cried Tommatoo, indignantly, "and his weaknesses should be respected. Let me pass, Sir!"

"Not just yet, little one. I have something to say to you. You know that I love you. I told you so three months ago before I went to Italy. I tell you so now that I have returned."

"I do not want to hear your confession, Signor. I wish to go and seek my father."

"Listen to me, Tommatoo"—and he stretched his long arm across her till it fell like a great bar between her and the door. "Listen. If you become my wife, this is what I will do for you. I will take you to Italy, and you shall have a villa that the Prince Borghese might envy. We will have much money—I shall be very rich indeed—and all Italy shall not contain finer horses, carriages, servants than ours. I will be magnificent, Tommatoo, gorgeous, princely. Perhaps, too, I will purchase a patent of nobility—it is to be done; there's the banker Torlonia—and how would my Tommatoo like to sit in state and be called Principezza? Ah! it would be glorious, would it not?"

So excited was he with the visions he had himself conjured up that Giuseppe stretched forth his arms, and, inclosing Tommatoo between them, drew her toward him, while a devilish glitter shone in his dark eyes.

"We are alone, sweet dove," he said, in a soft voice; "none in this silent house to watch us. Will you not vow to be my bride—the bride of Giuseppe that loves you so, and who will make you a little Countess? Ah! the little one is not so cruel after all."

But he mistook Tommatoo's terrified immobility for a timid though undemonstrative assent. To his utter astonishment, after a moment's silence, that young lady opened her mouth and shrieked "Gustave! Hasten! Gustave, I am in danger!" with all the power of an excellent set of lungs.

"Whew! who the devil is Gustave?" muttered Giuseppe, astounded. "I thought that none lived in the house but those two. Who the devil is this Gustave?" and as he spoke, he thrust his hand inside his coat as if feeling for some weapon.

There was an immediate response to Tommatoo's call in the shape of the descent of a pair of boots four stairs at a time. In a few seconds the boots had reached the door, and Gustave Beaumont, who stood in them, suddenly appeared on the scene of action.

"Diavolo!" ground Giuseppe between his teeth as he beheld this new apparition. Then taking a stride backward he seemed like some wild animal preparing for a spring.

"Qu'est ce que c'est? Qu'est ce qui ce Monsieur la?" rapidly demanded Monsieur Gustave, looking rather ominously at Giuseppe, who, not understanding a word of French, preserved a grim silence.

"Oh! Gustave, this man persecutes me. Protect me from him!" cried Tommatoo, bounding toward the young Frenchman, and taking shelter as it were under his wing.

"Soyez tranquille, enfant!" said Gustave, fondly enfolding her petite form with his arm. "What the devil you do here, Sare?" he continued, in English, seeing that Giuseppe had not replied to his previous interrogatories in French. "For why do you bring the fright to this young girl, Sare? who you are, Sare? I demand to know. Moi! Gustave Beaumont!"

"I reply myself not, Sir, to your interrogations, when they put themselves to me in a manner so insolent," answered Giuseppe, haughtily, his eyes flashing through the gloom of the half-lit chamber.

"Ask him about our dear father, Gustave," cried Tommatoo, earnestly, nestling up to the young musician's side. "I left him here a few moments since, and he has disappeared. I feel sure that this bad man knows something of him. Ask him, dear Gustave."

"One can not know about all the world," answered Giuseppe, before Gustave had time to interrogate him. "My business is not with the old man. Look in the cellar where the strong waters are kept. He will be there."

With a mocking laugh the Italian folded his cloak around him and strode toward the door. Gustave removed his arm from Tommatoo's waist, round which it had stolen, and placed himself resolutely between Giuseppe and the door and barred his passage.

"You shall not depart from here until we know about Signor Baioccho. You are suspected a great deal."

"Let me pass away from here," cried Giuseppe, advancing savagely, "or by the head of the Virgin you will meet with misfortune!"

And placing his hand in his breast he half drew a small poniard.

Gustave saw the motion, and quick as thought sprang on the Italian, weaving his young sinewy arms around his waist, and pressing his chin against his antagonist's breast until he fairly howled with pain. Tommatoo, with one faint moan, sank on her knees on the ground, and one might see, by the clasped hands and the murmuring lips, dimly shown in the imperfect lamplight, that the little one was offering up her prayers to Heaven.

The pair now struggling were evenly matched as far as youth and size. But in point of endurance the Italian had decidedly the advantage. The sedentary life which the young Frenchman led had relaxed his naturally powerful muscular system; and consequently, although capable of a vast momentary effort, he was entirely unable to sustain a prolonged contest. For the space of two minutes nothing was heard in the room but the hard breathing of the struggling men; the slipping of the feet on the uncarpeted floor; the sudden stamp, as one sought an advantage which the other as quickly frustrated. Gustave's main object seemed to be to keep the Italian from using his poniard, and this he sought to effect by pressing him so closely in his arms as to render it an impossibility to use his hands. For some time he was successful in this; but presently his want of tenacity of muscle showed itself in the relaxation of his gripe and the quick recurrence of his breaths, almost amounting to panting. Inch by inch Giuseppe loosened his arm from the Frenchman's grasp, and inch by inch his hand moved toward his breast, where the poniard lay, his eyes all the while flashing with a light that seemed to announce his approaching vengeance. In vain did Gustave strain every nerve to hold his own. The large drops of sweat gathered on his forehead; the blood flowed from between his lips, bitten in the agony of exertion; and his knees fairly shook with the power of a will that far exceeded the strength of the frame on which it was exercised. He could not last much longer. Giuseppe, in proportion as he beheld his adversary sinking, seemed to gain additional force. He at length extricated his arm. At length he grasped the poniard, and plucked it from its sheath. Held aloft an instant over Gustave's head, it quivered in its descent; when, with a dull, heavy thud some enormous weight fell on the back part of the Italian's head, the dagger was dashed from his hand, and he fell stunned and senseless on the floor.

"Sweet child, my life owes itself to you!" said Gustave, as he stood over the prostrate form of his antagonist, while he gazed with intense astonishment on Tommatoo, who, revealed to him by the Italian's fall, exhibited herself as the agent of that lucky event, assisted by an enormous bludgeon which she held in her hand.

"It was an inspiration of Heaven, I think," said she, simply. "I was praying to the Virgin, when I recollected that papa's big stick was in the corner; so I stole toward it, lifted it up, and struck that bad fellow with it—only I did not think I could strike him so hard. I hope he is not very much hurt;" and she looked pityingly down on the villain that a moment before she would have gladly seen perish.

"Cré nom de Dieu! He moves himself!" cried Gustave, beholding a slight indication of returning animation in the body of the Italian. "Quick! Tommatoo; ropes to bind him up! Bring me great strong twines, for he is very dangerous, this fellow! Ha! rascal, you are there! You lie very low now, brigand! We will trouble ourselves with your care, Sir! Yes, we will have the honor to conduct you to the bureau of the Chief of the Police, and there we will demand of you that you shall let us know all your villainies. Quick, child—the twines! The fellow will get himself up very presently!"

And so chattering a sort of mingled monologue of reproach, triumph, and sarcasm, Gustave passed the rope which Tommatoo brought him around Giuseppe's body in so scientific and elaborate a manner that the wretched man was as incapable of motion as an Indian pappoose strapped to its board, and lay on the floor with nothing but the winking of his large, dark, villainous eyes to tell of his being animate.

Now came the great question, Who was to go for the police? If Gustave went, Tommatoo would be left alone in that terrible house with that terrible man, who might unloose that wonderful net-work of bonds in which Gustave had enlaced him. If Tommatoo went, she would have to thread her way alone through that dreary, dangerous locality; and she confessed she had not the courage to make the attempt. If they both went, who was to take care of the captive? So they, perforce, came to the conclusion that they must wait until morning; and accordingly Gustave, determined not to lose sight of his prize, lifted him on his shoulder as one would a bale of goods, and carrying him up to his own room—the room in which the Pancorno resided—threw him into a corner. Then he and Tommatoo sat down gloomily to speculate and wonder over Baioccho's disappearance. It was in vain that they interrogated Giuseppe. That individual glared at them from his corner like a coil of ropes with a pair of large eyes hidden somewhere in it, but would condescend to no reply; and so the hours passed gloomily watching for the day.

Wearied with speculation, and heart-sore enough with pondering over the fate of old Baioccho, Gustave, as the small hours wore on, could no longer resist his inclination to invoke the Genius of the Pancorno to disperse the sad thoughts that hung like black clouds around him and Tommatoo; so he sat down to that mysteriously-constructed instrument, and poured forth those wild improvisations that seemed to interpret some love-passage in the history of young Æolus. And when the sun broke faintly over the dreary stone-yard, and its first rays fell on the livid face of the Italian lying bound in the corner, it seemed to float upward through the sky, buoyed upon those harmonies that seemed to seek their native heaven.

IV.—THE PÆAN OF THE PANCORNO.

The ——th Ward Station House. It was the early hour of the morning before the overnight prisoners had departed to be judged by the immaculate justices presiding in the neighboring district police court, and the poor sleepless-looking, blear-eyed people were emerging from the "lock-up" in the basement, still heavy with the poison of bad liquor, and buttoned all over the face with the bites of mosquitoes that abound in all police stations. Along the walls of the general room hung rows of glazed fire-caps and locust-wood batons, while stretched in rank and file on the floor beneath one saw a quantity of India rubber overshoes, splashed with the mud gathered in the weary night-tramp on the heels of crime. What stories of city vice spoke in those dirty, flexible shoes! One saw the burglar at work with file and centre-bit, and accomplice keeping watch with pricked up ears. The file grates, and the centre-bit cuts, and the confederate strains his hearing as the grasshopper leaps from the wall; but none see the dark shadows creeping round the corner, and the pavement yields no echo to the muffled feet: and the silent overshoes steal on, until with one quick leap, and one heavy blow with the baton, the burglar and confederate lie powerless on the ground.

The ——th Ward Station House was a dreary-looking establishment. The police captain in plain clothes, with a presentation watch in his pocket, attached to a presentation chain, and a presentation diamond ring on his finger, and a presentation pin in his shirt front, which having buttons did not seem to require it, sat on a high chair behind a high counter on which he measured out justice by the yard. Two or three sly-looking men in plain clothes also, with a furtive glance in the eyes, and an air of always seeming to be looking round a corner that bespoke the detective, or "shadow," lounging on the stout chairs, picking their teeth and watching every body, even the police captain, as if they were ready at any moment to detect any body in something illegal. A pleasant-looking chain of handcuffs hung on the wall, some ten or twelve pair linked together—cold, brutal-looking loops of iron that seemed to regret it was wrists and not necks that it was their duty to clasp. Sitting on the sill of the deep window, which opened into the street, were two little children crying lustily. They had been lost or ran away, and in the face of the boy, a large-eyed, French lad of some six years old, one could see the determination working that made him preserve, when questioned, a sullen silence as to his name and home. The other, a little girl—thanks to the philoprogenitive organ of one of the police!—was munching a jam tart amidst all her grief, and slobbering the unwholesome pastry with her tears.

But chief of all the figures in that melancholy room were three persons who had, in the charge of a policeman, arrived at early dawn. Deep in one corner, the farthest from the door, sat Giuseppe, now carefully uncorded but still scowling out of his cloak, as if he might dart poisoned poniards out of his eyes; while before the high counter on which the prize police captain measured out his two-penny worth of justice, stood Gustave and Tommatoo, who was weeping bitterly.

"You say that you left your father for but a few moments, and on your return he had disappeared?" inquired the prize captain, solemnly.

"Yes, Sir!" sobbed Tommatoo. "My dear, dear father! What has become of him? Oh, that bad man!"—a wicked glance at Giuseppe in the corner.

"And when you returned you found the prisoner in the room where you had left your father?"

"Yes, Sir; and I know that he knows where my father is—I see it in his eyes. Oh, Sir, make him tell—make him tell. Pinch him until he tells—beat him until he tells!"

The prize captain smiled, condescendingly.

"Lieutenant!" he said, "telegraph a description of this Baioccho to the chief's office, with inquiries."

Immediately a thin policeman commenced working the telegraph that lay in one corner of the room, but the monotonous click of the instrument was but little consolation to the aching bosom of Tommatoo.

A half hour passed—an hour—during which Tommatoo related over and over again the details of her little story to the prize captain. The subordinates of the office began to take an interest in her, and gathered round her as she sat nestling close to Gustave, who was completely amazed by the novelty of his situation, and each had a kind word for the little maiden.

An hour passed. Ah, how dreary! dreary to Giuseppe scowling in his cloak, carefully watched by two stalwart policemen; dreary to Gustave, who wondered how policemen could live without music; dreary to little Tommatoo, who, with swollen eyes and heavy, sad heart, sorrowed for the old musician.

Presently there was a bustle. A carriage drove up to the door with policemen on the box, and Tommatoo's heart fluttered. The door of the vehicle opened, and out tottered Baioccho, feebly singing, crowing, dancing, with his old eyes twinkling with cognac, and a suit of gigantic clothes on, out of which he seemed to be endeavoring to scramble. In another instant Tommatoo was in his arms.

"Ah, mon enfant, ma fille bien aimé! the old father has brought himself back. Per baccho! brought himself back with the joy in his heart. The assassin failed in his work. Ha!"

This last exclamation was caused by a sudden rush for the door which Giuseppe had made the moment the old musician appeared. His attempt at escape was vain, however, for before he had made two steps he was collared, and a pair of handcuffs magically slipped over his wrists. He sat down again sullenly, but with a face white with terror.

"Ha! serpent that thou art!" cried Baioccho, placing himself before Giuseppe and shaking his withered old fist at him. "Thy time has arrived. Thou wilt hang for this. So you thought to drown the poor old maestro who never harmed you? But no! the God above is good, and when waves lifted themselves up to engulf me, and the boat of the passage—what you call ferry-boat—came to knock me on the head, a heaven-descended rope put itself into my hand, and a blessed sailor pulled me up to the deck. Oh no; I am not dead yet, and the sweet dove that you covet will find some other nest than thine!"

Then turning to the prize captain, the old man, still with one arm round his daughter, poured forth his voluble tale: how Giuseppe had flung him into the river; how he was floating out to sea when the ferry-boat had come down on him; and how, just in the nick of time, some one on board had discerned him in the water and flung him a rope. All this mixed up in his extraordinary English, and so interlarded with French and Italian imprecations on the head of Giuseppe, that the prize captain was so entirely bewildered that all he could do was to order the assassin into the lock-up, and bind over the old maestro to appear in evidence. This done, he and Gustave and Tommatoo, now chirping like a bird, went home together.

I would not like to count all the petits verres de cognac that the old musician took that night; but I know that Baioccho, on that occasion, danced the most singular dances, and sang the most eccentric songs, and told Tommatoo and Gustave at least fifty times the wondrous story of his adventures, and how his brother was, he believed, dead, and had left him all his wealth; and so the night closed on jubilation in the old house by the stone-yard.

Strange to say, Baioccho's brother was dead and had left him his heir. This, it was supposed, Giuseppe had learned in Italy, and had hastened home with the intention of profiting by an information of which he was the earliest recipient. Chance, however, frustrated his plans, and after a trial, in which Baioccho's eccentric evidence was a feature, the gates of the State Prison closed over the assassin forever.

In time Baioccho realized his inheritance and bade farewell to the kitchen. The Pancorno was brought before the public, and every one remembers the sensation it created that winter at the Antique Concerts given at Niblo's. Women, while listening to its wonderful strains, could not help noticing how handsome was the young Frenchman who played on it; yet none saw the lovely face that every night gazed from the front row on the performer; but I know that Gustave Beaumont played all the better because he knew that Tommatoo, otherwise Madame Beaumont, was looking at him. Madame Beaumont! Tommatoo as a Madame! Can you realize it? I can't.

JOHN P. KENNEDY.

THE position occupied by Kennedy as a writer is a prominent and highly respectable one. He is best known to the public as the author of "Swallow Barn" and "Horseshoe Robinson," two very popular and well written novels, whose scenes are laid in the Southern States, and whose incidents turn upon the peculiarities of Southern life as it presented itself nearly a century ago. The first of these appeared in 1830, and the second in 1832, since which time the press has teemed with works of fiction, the most of which have had a short-lived existence, and given place to a successor possessing perhaps but little merit beyond the one which it supplanted in popular favor. A few, however, retain a permanent place in American literature, among which are those of Irving, Cooper, and Kennedy; for it is fair to associate the author of "Horseshoe Robinson" with the authors of "Knickerbocker's History of New York" and "The Spy."

Kennedy is now verging upon seventy years, but his appearance indicates a person some twenty years the junior of this patriarchal age. The truth is, that from youth up he has had the good fortune to possess an ample competence, and a temperament that enabled him to take the world as he found it, without permitting himself to be annoyed by its trifles or its cares. He is, moreover, prudent in his style of living; and while not averse to a reasonable enjoyment of the gifts of Providence, is rigidly exact in his habits. This may account for the manner in which years have almost insensibly stolen upon him without leaving those tell-tale evidences that usually accompany their progress.

But while thus placid in his domestic life, he has been an ardent politician, and in this capacity has filled several important positions, the last of which was Secretary of the Navy during the administration of Mr. Fillmore. Literature has been with him rather a pastime than a pursuit, and was never looked upon as a source of emolument.

So careless, indeed, has he been in this particular, that when the first edition of "Swallow Barn," which was from the beginning very popular, was exhausted, he gave no heed to its republication; and but for the circumstance of Putnam's proposal to republish it in connection with the works of Cooper and Irving some ten years after its first appearance, it might probably have remained without a new edition to this day. And yet it is not only a work of great merit and promise in itself, but one which from its subject was calculated to excite a marked interest. Its object was to give a description of the manners and customs prevalent in the "Old Dominion," as Virginia is not unfrequently denominated, during the last century. For this purpose he selected an aristocratical old edifice on the bank of the James River, occupying a kind of shady nook formed by a sweep of the stream, on a gentle acclivity dotted over with oaks. It was a time-honored mansion, the main structure of which was upward of a century old at the date of his narrative, and which had been added to from time to time as the increasing wants or opulence of its proprietors had demanded. The proprietor of this edifice, with its ample domain and servants, was a gentleman of about forty-five years, upon whom a pleasant temper and good cheer had produced their effects in a comfortable and full figure, and easy, contemplative habits that inclined him to indolence and philosophical trains of thought. He was, in short, possessed of that substantial planter look that belongs to a gentleman who lives on his estate, and is not much vexed with the crosses of life.

In the selection of his subject, and in the delineation of his characters, which are of that pleasant and generous kind that warmly attach the reader to them, Kennedy may have created purely imaginary personages; but it has always appeared to me, and this gives an additional interest to the volume, that he was only transferring to paper the impressions he had received while residing among his own maternal relatives, a number of whom might well sit for such portraits as he has introduced in his exquisite delineation of Virginian society.

Kennedy's mother, whose maiden name was Pendleton, was a member of one of the most respectable and wealthy families in Virginia, which even at the present day numbers among its descendants many of the most substantial landholders in the Old Dominion, as well as many of the most influential statesmen whose voices have been heard in our national councils. Of this latter class are Mr. Pendleton of the House of Representatives, Mr. Faulkner, late Minister to France, and Judge Pendleton, of Berkeley County, the uncle of Kennedy, and one of the few survivors of that coterie in which Washington was accustomed to mingle on familiar terms. Many of these gentlemen possess princely estates, which have been retained for more than a century within the family, and if Frank Meriwether, the genial host of "Swallow Barn," is not in reality a veritable member of this family, there is more than one in whom it would not be difficult to trace a family likeness. Be this as it may, it is very certain that Kennedy derived his knowledge of the manners and customs prevalent in a household of the old Virginia aristocracy by his long-continued residence among his relatives in that State; and it is equally certain that he has given the most faithful portraiture of such an establishment ever presented to the public. It is not too much to say that a more accurate idea of Virginia life in its best coloring is to be obtained by the perusal of "Swallow Barn" than from the writings of any other author who has attempted a similar delineation.

There is a genuine good-humor that pervades the fictitious writings of Kennedy, which, like those of Irving, give more than a passing insight into the character of the author. It was my good fortune to know them both, and I had frequent occasion to notice this similarity in their character, however widely they may have differed in other respects, which doubtless went far toward cementing the warm friendship that always subsisted between them. No one was ever more warmly welcomed by its genial host to Sunnyside than Kennedy, and no one, when he could be induced to leave his pleasant cottage on the banks of the Hudson to ramble through the South, was more cordially received by Kennedy than Irving. A winter's ramble together through the South, several years before Irving's decease, not only served to restore Irving to his wonted health and spirits, but enabled each to store up a thousand pleasant recollections of the other, which served as an additional link to cement the warm friendship that had heretofore subsisted between them.

I saw most of Kennedy while his fellow-townsmen in Baltimore, at a literary club, of which we were both members, composed of four doctors of law, four doctors of divinity, four doctors of medicine, and four gentlemen distinguished for literary attainments. This club, styled "The Monday Club," met alternately at the houses of the various members each Monday in the winter season, and during its existence was the most agreeable reunion in Baltimore, and was almost certain to command the presence of any distinguished stranger who chanced to be in town. Kennedy was among the most punctual in attendance, and, with the exception of Dr. Morris, a Lutheran divine, was perhaps the best talker.

He was always full of the subject that most occupied his attention, and without engrossing the conversation would be pretty certain to allude to it during the evening. At that time he had for the most part retired from active political life, but took a deep interest in the political discussions of the day, which he aided in elucidating by occasional contributions to the National Intelligencer, in which many of his best political essays appeared. This was about the time when the sectional discussions in Congress began to assume the angry character they afterward took.

On one occasion Kennedy appeared at the club gloomy and desponding, and soon turned the conversation to the theme that most occupied his thoughts. He had just returned from Washington, where he had conversed freely with the more prominent Southern members, most of whom had been his colleagues in the previous sessions of Congress.

"I have great apprehensions," said he, "for the perpetuity of the Union, and I know not how soon this beautiful fabric of government, the best that the world has ever seen, may be rent into pieces."

I remember that I expressed doubts as to the grounds of his fears, and urged that the present exacerbation of feeling would give place to one in which both sections would be perfectly willing to do justice to each other.

"So I thought," replied he, "before I went to Washington; but when I heard—as I have within a few days—grave and cautious Southern statesmen, in whose opinions I have been accustomed to repose great confidence, deliberately calculating the advantages that would accrue to their section by a separation from the North, I must confess that my confidence has vanished, and given place to the most gloomy forebodings for the future."

The opinion of the gentlemen present without exception was that Kennedy's fears were groundless; but he continued to argue his point with much ability, giving a number of facts bearing upon the question which, in a few days after, appeared in the columns of the National Intelligencer in an essay from a "valued contributor," in which the evils of dissolution were most vividly portrayed. In the course of his remarks, turning directly to me, he said, with great emphasis, "I consider the danger imminent; and I believe it to be the duty of every one who can write to exercise his influence in attempting to save our now happy country from impending ruin."

In a visit which I made to Prescott, two or three years afterward, I narrated this conversation of Kennedy's. Prescott thought that he had little real ground for apprehension. The sequel has shown that Kennedy's insight into the future was far clearer than that of his opponents. After the extreme Southern States had declared themselves as no longer a part of the Union, and Tennessee had followed their example, true to his original sentiments, he issued an appeal to the citizens of Maryland, showing how little it had to gain by uniting its destinies with the South, and how much by remaining steadfast to the Union.

About the time of the appearance of this appeal I returned to Washington from the South, whither I had gone on an errand of peace, and had made an appointment to meet the President before breakfast on the following morning to confer with him on the subject of my mission. I passed the evening prior to this interview at the Prussian Minister's. Before leaving, Baron Gerolt placed in my hand Kennedy's appeal, which I had not yet seen, with the request that I would read it before seeing the President on the following morning, remarking that it was one of the most statesmanlike and patriotic expositions of the subject he had seen.

Among Kennedy's earliest literary ventures was the "Baltimore Red Book"—a sort of annual, somewhat after the style of Paulding and Irving's "Salmagundi," which appeared about twelve years prior to the publication of "Swallow Barn." Kennedy was associated in this work with Peter Hoffman Cruse, a gentleman of rare attainments and a thousand noble qualities. Cruse, Kennedy, and Josiah Pennington had been students of law together, and were inseparable friends. Poor Cruse was one of the first victims of cholera in Baltimore, in 1832, and died in a few hours of his attack; Josiah Pennington is still a resident of Baltimore, respected for his sterling integrity, and admired for his admirable fund of wit and humor. The intimacy between Kennedy and himself still continues as fresh and green as when they first formed their mutual attachment for each other in early manhood. Mr. Pennington was likewise a member of the "Monday Club," and the best narrator of anecdote and delineator of character among his associates. His perception of the ludicrous is greater than that of any one I ever met except Hackett, who, by-the-way, is a good friend of Kennedy's, and seldom passes through Baltimore without paying him a visit. Mr. Pennington has a considerable practice as a lawyer and a handsome private estate. He has, as a consequence, many trust funds; one of which is so peculiar that it is best narrated in his own language:

"On making a deposit in bank many years ago," said he, "the teller threw out a three-dollar note as unbankable. I went to a broker's to get it exchanged, but he pronounced it to be nearly valueless. I will, however, said he, give you a lottery ticket for it—for he dealt in lottery tickets. Having no confidence in lotteries, I refused to take one; but as I was leaving the door with the worthless bill his entreaties prevailed, and I took the ticket in exchange, and thought no more of the transaction for several days, when, passing one day, he called me in to inform me that my ticket had drawn a prize of several hundred dollars. This fund I deposited in bank and invested by itself. It has now grown to be a considerable sum, but remains entirely untouched by me except for charitable purposes. I look upon it as the devil's money, and fancy that some day he will call for it; and I have taken very good care to keep it by itself, so that it shall not taint the remainder of my possessions."

Kennedy at this time occupied as his town-house the former residence of William Wirt, on Calvert Street, a spacious and venerable old mansion, which in Wirt's time was doubtless one of the most aristocratic in the city, and which even then was a very excellent establishment. I remarked to Kennedy on one occasion that it was a singular coincidence that the biographer should occupy the residence of the one whose biography he had written (his Life of Wirt had not long before been published). He stated that it was purely accidental, as he dwelt there chiefly to oblige his father-in-law, then an aged man, but since deceased, who had an attachment for the place. "This," he continued, "is the room occupied by Wirt as his library, and it was here that the greater part of those legal papers were prepared which obtained for him so great a celebrity."

The apartment alluded to was a spacious room whose sides were well covered with the books which Kennedy had collected, and which probably equaled in number those of the eloquent advocate who had preceded him in possession. As to the value of the collection I have no information, but from the varied subjects that from time to time have occupied his attention, I should infer that it contained many excellent books, especially in its political and historical departments. He understood very well the use of extensive libraries, and made free use of them when engaged in writing. I remember that I once remarked to him that to the imaginative writer the country was full of suggestions, and I did not wonder that authors of this class especially gladly retreated from town to hold companionship with Nature in her rural abodes.

"The country is all very well," replied he, "but commend me to the town for the stimulus of literary pursuits. In the midst of the excitement of a populous city, with its incentives to labor and its aids to composition, the author generally produces his best works, and I apprehend if you were to know the secret history of this kind of writing, you would find that the greater part of the most touching incidents of rural life, with their accompaniments of wood, and hill, and dell, so vividly portrayed that the reader almost imagines himself in their midst, were penned in the midst of all the bustle and confusion of a populous city."

And he was, without doubt, correct in this judgment. The author, in his rapid progress through the country, takes in at a glance its immense ideal treasures, which imprint themselves upon the memory, to be used in the laborious work of composition in the study. Let any reader with the least conception of the beautiful attempt to analyze his own sensations, and he will find that the impressions of a few moments cover a field which it would require whole pages to describe. The great art of the imaginative writer is to reproduce these impressions in a shape so vivid and tangible as immediately to be realized by others. The reader need scarcely be told that the exquisite pictures of Virginia plantation life as portrayed in "Swallow Barn," or the incidents of the primitive military camp, as told in "Horseshoe Robinson," were penned in a lawyer's office in the city of Baltimore.

The house, the library, all the associations of the place necessarily led the conversation to the able lawyer, the masterly orator, and the polished biographer who had formerly occupied them. Wirt had really been the maker of his own fortune, and he had labored most industri-ously in elevating himself to the position he finally occupied. In youth he was surrounded by none of those aids by which men are often elevated in spite of themselves. The library that formed the basis of the one which finally occupied those shelves, and with which he commenced the practice of law, consisted of a copy of "Blackstone," two volumes of "Don Quixote," and a volume of "Tristram Shandy." His whole life, said Kennedy, was that of a student. "His youthful days were passed in the preparation for his profession. His manhood was engrossed by forensic labors. Old age found him crowned with the honors of a faithfully earned judicial renown."

Kennedy's description of the personal appearance of Wirt is not only a true likeness but an admirably drawn sketch. "Those who remember William Wirt," he says, "need not be reminded how distinctively his face and figure suggested his connection with the German race. The massive, bald outline of his countenance, the clear blue eye, the light hair falling in crisp and numerous curls upon a broad forehead, the high arching eyebrow, the large nose, the ample chin, might recall a resemblance to the portrait of Goethe. The ever-changing expression of his eye and lip—at one moment sobered in deep thought, and in the next radiant with a lurking, quiet good-humor, that might be seen coming up from the depths of his heart, and provoking a laugh before a word was said—were traits which enlivened whatever might be supposed saturnine in the merely national cast of his features." He had indeed not only a keen sense of the ludicrous, but one of the most imaginative of temperaments. It was this latter faculty that enabled him to depict with such admirable skill the masterly forensic displays of Patrick Henry, and which made him so irresistible in his own great appeals to the court and jury. An incident in his early life shows somewhat of this feeling. A school companion had been detained at school longer than the rest, and on his way home was obliged to pass a lonely field after daylight was gone. On the following day he narrated to a group of eager listeners how, in passing this spot the previous evening, a bird perched upon the grave-stone of an old negro cried out, "Whip him well! whip him well!" and a froggy voice deep from below seemed to answer, "Oh, pray!" "It was," said Wirt, "the first time that a superstitious emotion entered my mind; and I now recall how dreadfully sublime it was. My heart quaked—and yet there was a sort of terrible pleasure in it which I can not define; I do not yet hear a whip-poor-will without some of these misgivings of my childhood."

Wirt had several daughters, all of whom were elegant and accomplished women. With much of the talent of their father, they were indebted to him for unusual care in their education. To his daughter Sara, who afterward married Judge Randall, and died in Florida, he thus wrote while yet a little girl: "Suppose there was a nest full of beautiful young birds—so young that they could not fly and help themselves—and they were opening their little mouths and crying for something to eat, and their parents would not bring them any, would you not think them wicked? Now your mind is this nest, full of beautiful singing birds, and there sits reason and fancy and memory and judgment. Will you not love your father and mother for trying to feed them with books and learning?" Under such culture it is not singular that they should have all come to occupy prominent positions in social life, admired for their many accomplishments, and respected for their numerous virtues.

In 1833 a literary paper in Baltimore, called The Visitor, offered a prize for the best poem. Among the competitors was the erratic but gifted Edgar A. Poe, to whom the prize was awarded for his "MSS. found in a Bottle." Kennedy was one of the umpires to whom these contributions were referred, and he thus formed Poe's acquaintance, who, he remarked, was in part indebted for his success to his extremely neat handwriting; a fact which I can readily imagine, for Poe wrote in a small, but perfectly legible character, which could be as easily read as a printed page. His numerous letters which I have seen written to his cousin, Nelson Poe, a lawyer in Baltimore, sparkling with vivacity and overflowing with wit, are in their chirography the very quintessence of neatness. Poe, at the time he made Kennedy's acquaintance—as, indeed, at all others—was sadly in want of pecuniary resources. Kennedy not only introduced him to Mr. White, then editor of the Southern Literary Messenger, but urged his employment in such terms as to induce Mr. White to accept his literary aid in the conduct of that magazine. This engagement, however, which promised at least a means of maintenance, was, like several others of the same character formed by Poe at different periods, destined to be of short continuance.

Kennedy's relations with literary men were always of the most agreeable character, and in no manner intermixed with the envy that too frequently mars the pleasant relations that should subsist between those engaged in kindred pursuits. I remember that the first favorable impression I had of Willis's poems was obtained from Kennedy. In a conversation relating to Willis I remarked that I had really never read his poems attentively, because of a prejudice I had, I scarcely knew why, against the author.

"Then," said Kennedy, "you should read them before forming an opinion. I consider Willis as a poet of great excellence, and some of his poems, particularly those in blank verse, as 'Jephtha's Daughter,' as of a very high order of merit."

The hint thus gently given was taken, and a perusal of his writings showed me how much I had mistaken the character of the author. Between Kennedy and Willis a friendship has existed for a long time, with the kindest appreciation of each other's character on either side. In 1859 Willis paid a visit to Sunnyside, in company with Mr. Wise, an account of which he has published in the Home Journal. Kennedy was at the time the guest of Irving, and left for New York at the same time that Willis and his friend returned to Idlewild. In this description Willis says that an amusing interchange of sorrows took place between Irving and Kennedy as to the persecution of autograph hunters, in which Kennedy bore off the palm. He said that while Secretary of Navy he was written to by a person entirely unknown to him, but who claimed to be his constituent, who requested to be furnished with the autographs of all the Presidents, together with those of the present Cabinet, including his own, as well as those of any other distinguished persons with whom he chanced to be in correspondence.

Among Kennedy's literary productions intended to delineate the domestic history of the South, is an address delivered before the Maryland Institute in 1851, upon the early settlement of Baltimore, in which some incidents are noticed which, however familiar to the older inhabitants of that city, are not generally known. An Act of Assembly "for erecting a town on the north side of Patapsco in Baltimore County" was passed in 1729, and under this ordinance Baltimore was built. "You have heard," says Kennedy, "the traditional story of Mr. John Moale's alarm when this project of a town was first talked of. The projectors had an eye to a tract of land of his—Moale's Point—which looks in upon Spring Gardens. That worthy gentleman had some iron ore on his farm, and was seized with such terror at the idea of having a town built over it, that he repaired, it is said, in extraordinary haste to the Legislature, of which he was a member, to defeat the bill, then actually under consideration, to place the town on his land. A very notable parliamentary effort, as it turned out, for Baltimore was in consequence saved from an inconvenient location on Moale's Point, and established where it is."

The preference given to Moale's Point by those most interested in the establishment of Baltimore, doubtless arose from its level and somewhat low surface, which seemed to offer facilities for laying out streets and erecting buildings at small cost. By the timely influence exerted by Mr. Moale to prevent his land from being occupied for this purpose, the town was necessarily compelled to extend itself over the undulating and beautifully diversified surface it now occupies. The substratum, instead of the rich alluvium of the plain, is composed of gravel and sand, eminently favorable to health; and the surface, gently and picturesquely undulating, crowned with monuments and domes, presents one of the most magnificent city views to be found on the continent. "Every one," remarks Kennedy, "speculates at the present day upon the absolute certainty of a prosperous town springing up on some locality he could designate. There is no point, however, on which anticipation is so often disappointed as this. The chances are all against the preconceived opinion. Looking to ordinary considerations which we might conjecture to be most potential in influencing the growth of a trading city, one would say a priori that the mouth of the Susquehanna River would have been selected in the last century as the site of a town inevitably destined to grow to importance. Another such site would have been pointed out at Norfolk, where the Chesapeake Bay meets the ocean. Annapolis and Alexandria and Georgetown were in those days full of hope. They were growing, and for some years continued to grow in advance of Baltimore—Alexandria especially; but Baltimore gave no augury for a favorable prediction. What have we here to invite settlement? what convenience of inland trade? what seaward? To this day we may consider the sudden start and swift pre-eminence which Baltimore made and won as an unsolved problem in the philosophy of cities."

There is one important physical fact to which Baltimore, in common with the rest of the seaboard cities, is more indebted than might at first view be supposed. The whole Atlantic coast stretching from New York southward is composed of a slope where the continent originally terminated, clearly identified by its hard, granite rocks, and the plain subsequently made by the deposits from the ocean. At this line of demarkation the streams that flow into the sea break over their hard granite beds in waterfalls or rapids, which intercept the progress of navigation. Now it is precisely at this point that New York, Trenton, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Georgetown, Richmond, and Raleigh, have sprung up, and grown into an importance that their projectors could hardly have predicted. This fact demonstrates how vast an influence the geological formation exercises over the character of a country and the movements of its population.

But although Kennedy has achieved an honorable distinction in literature, and is best known through his writings, yet he has never at any one period of his life been a bookmaker by profession. These literary labors have rather constituted the incidents in a life actively employed in other pursuits than its chief occupation. As a member of the bar and as a politician he was both active and prominent. In the latter capacity he was for many years a Delegate in the Legislature of Maryland, and an ardent supporter of that system of works of internal improvement upon which Maryland boldly ventured far in advance of the larger and wealthier States, and by means of which she has contributed to her prosperity as a State, and at the same time involved her finances with a debt which it will require long years of prosperity to liquidate. The pressure of this debt rendered those who were instrumental in creating it unpopular, and Kennedy, with his legislative colleagues, was forced into a retirement from which he emerged some years after as a Representative in Congress, and subsequently as Secretary of the Navy.

During his political career the country was pretty equally divided into the two political parties—Whig and Democratic—which in Maryland so closely divided the State that before each important election it was doubtful which would be in the ascendant. Kennedy was a member of the Whig Party, and may now be ranked among what are denominated the "Silver Grays." His political course was characterized by great liberality of sentiment and freedom from party trammels. In the establishment of the system of electro-magnetic telegraphing Morse always found in him a steadfast advocate. He not only readily comprehended its operation when exhibited in the committee room, but was warm in its favor on the floor of the House. It was on his motion that the bill for the appropriation of the fund to try the experiment between Washington and Baltimore was brought before the House, and through his influence many of his own party, who were either careless or doubtful concerning it, were induced to record their votes in its favor.

His political predilections are admirably delineated in "Quodlibet," a political satire, which, although not a novel, yet has sufficient of the rude outlines of a plot to be included in this category of writing. It is a hit at the political parties preceding the presidential election which took place just before it was written, and contains some humorous and admirable caricatures of the prominent personages engaged. It appeared anonymously, but the public were not long in tracing its authorship to its true source.

Although Kennedy has rendered good service to his country as a politician, yet, after all, it is to be regretted that he did not devote himself more exclusively to literature, for which he has certainly exhibited rare ability. "His talent in this respect," said Alexander Everett, upon the appearance of "Swallow Barn," "is probably not inferior to that of Irving. Some of his smaller compositions, in which our author depends merely on his own resources, exhibit a point and vigor of thought, and a felicity and freshness of style that place them on a level with the best passages of the 'Sketch-Book.'" If he who can succeed in creating and describing an imaginary character that ever after remains in the memories of men, ranked among the real existences of the past, both illustrates his own merit and secures his fame, then he well deserves Mr. Everett's acknowledgment of his talent; for side by side with Scott's Meg Merrilies, of Cooper's Leather Stocking, of Dickens's Sam Weller, and of Irving's Rip Van Winkle, Horseshoe Robinson must be recognized as a real and veritable creation, which occupies a permanent place in the minds of those who are familiar with the story.

The greater part of his time is now spent at his residence on the banks of the Patapsco, a few miles from Baltimore, and in the immediate vicinity of a large number of cotton manufactories, in one of which he is largely interested. The situation is of the wildest and most picturesque character. The Patapsco, a turbulent and restless stream, flows rapidly down over a series of rapids and natural cascades (which have been largely turned to advantage by the erection of a number of mills upon its borders), in the bottom of a deep ravine which it has made for itself amidst the undulating country through which it pursues its course. The sides of the valley thus made, as well as the lofty hill-tops which overhang it, are alternately composed of bald and abrupt rocky prominences, presenting their bare and jagged front to the stream, and gentler undulations whose sides are clothed with a variegated foliage that contrasts pleasantly with the rocky buttresses that jut out from their midst.

Kennedy's residence occupies a position directly on the bank of the stream, which is here spanned by a light trellis work foot-bridge. From the portico is seen the bald outlines of the adjoining heights and the craggy sides that intervene between them and the bed of the stream, while perched high up on the opposite bank, as if suspended in the air, the Baltimore and Ohio Railway winds its tortuous course along the side of this intricate and highly romantic valley. He is much attached to "home," and with the exception of an annual pilgrimage to the North, when the gay world is to be found at its watering-places, or a summer jaunt among the mountain resorts of Virginia,* seldom wanders much beyond the immediate confines of his own neighborhood, which indeed possesses a circle of elegant and refined people, among whom are the Ridgeleys of Hampton, and the Carrols of the Manor, such as few districts can boast.

Twice within the last few years he has been tempted to visit Europe, where his political position and literary reputation secured him a flattering reception, but on each occasion he has returned with but little reason to regret that he was a citizen of the United States. He seldom engages in public matters, but is occasionally moved by a sense of duty to exert what influence he possesses when he deems that the country stands in need of his services, as on the occasion of his late appeal to the people of Maryland to remain steadfast to the Union. To the Maryland Historical Society he has always been a steadfast friend, and attends its meetings whenever it is possible for him to do so. He is also a trustee of the "Peabody Institute," recently founded in Baltimore by Mr. Peabody of London, whose early mercantile life was passed there, and is quite active in the development of this noble foundation.

Possessed of gentle manners and much kindness of disposition, a large fund of acquired information, and mingling much in society, there are few persons whose companionship is more agreeable or instructive than that of the genial author of "Swallow Barn."

* The "X. M. C." (i. e. Ex-Member of Congress) who appears in some of "Porte Crayon's" admirable sketches, originally published in Harper's Magazine, and subsequently collected in the book "Virginia Illustrated," is the author of "Swallow Barn," and "Horseshoe Robinson."

CHAPTER LXI.

THE STATE OF PUBLIC OPINION.

THE day of the trial was now quickly coming on, and the London world, especially the world of lawyers, was beginning to talk much on the subject. Men about the Inns of Court speculated as to the verdict, offering to each other very confident opinions as to the result, and offering, on some occasions, bets as well as opinions. The younger world of barristers was clearly of opinion that Lady Mason was innocent; but a portion, an unhappy portion, was inclined to fear, that, in spite of her innocence, she would be found guilty. The elder world of barristers was not, perhaps, so demonstrative, but in that world the belief in her innocence was not so strong, and the fear of her condemnation much stronger. The attorneys, as a rule, regarded her as guilty. To the policeman's mind every man not a policeman is a guilty being, and the attorneys perhaps share something of this feeling. But the attorneys to a man expected to see her acquitted. Great was their faith in Mr. Furnival; great their faith in Solomon Aram; but greater than in all was their faith in Mr. Chaffanbrass. If Mr. Chaffanbrass could not pull her through, with a prescription of twenty years on her side, things must be very much altered indeed in our English criminal court. To the outer world, that portion of the world which had nothing to do with the administration of the law, the idea of Lady Mason having been guilty seemed preposterous. Of course she was innocent, and of course she would be found to be innocent. And of course, also, that Joseph Mason, of Groby Park, was, and would be found to be, the meanest, the lowest, the most rapacious of mankind.

And then the story of Sir Peregrine's attachment and proposed marriage, joined as it was to various hints of the manner in which that marriage had been broken off, lent a romance to the whole affair, and added much to Lady Mason's popularity. Every body had now heard of it, and every body was also aware, that though the idea of a marriage had been abandoned, there had been no quarrel. The friendship between the families was as close as ever, and Sir Peregrine—so it was understood—had pledged himself to an acquittal. It was felt to be a public annoyance that an affair of so exciting a nature should be allowed to come off in the little town of Alston. The court-house, too, was very defective in its arrangements, and ill qualified to give accommodation to the great body of would-be attendants at the trial. One leading newspaper went so far as to suggest, that in such a case as this, the antediluvian prejudices of the British grandmother—meaning the Constitution—should be set aside, and the trial should take place in London. But I am not aware that any step was taken toward the carrying out of so desirable a project.

Down at Hamworth the feeling in favor of Lady Mason was not perhaps so strong as it was elsewhere. Dockwrath was a man not much respected, but nevertheless many believed in him; and down there, in the streets of Hamworth, he was not slack in propagating his view of the question. He had no doubt, he said, how the case would go. He had no doubt, although he was well aware that Mr. Mason's own lawyers would do all they could to throw over their own client. But he was too strong, he said, even for that. The facts as he would bring them forward would confound Round and Crook, and compel any jury to find a verdict of guilty. I do not say that all Hamworth believed in Dockwrath, but his energy and confidence did have its effect, and Lady Mason's case was not upheld so strongly in her own neighborhood as elsewhere.

The witnesses in these days were of course very important persons, and could not but feel the weight of that attention which the world would certainly pay to them. There would be four chief witnesses for the prosecution; Dockwrath himself, who would be prepared to speak as to the papers left behind him by old Usbech; the man in whose possession now remained that deed respecting the partnership which was in truth executed by old Sir Joseph on that fourteenth of July; Bridget Bolster; and John Kenneby. Of the manner in which Mr. Dockwrath used his position we already know enough. The man who held the deed, one Torrington, was a relative of Martock, Sir Joseph's partner, and had been one of his executors. It was not much indeed that he had to say, but that little sent him up high in the social scale during those days. He lived at Kennington, and he was asked out to dinner in that neighborhood every day for a week running, on the score of his connection with the great Orley Farm case. Bridget Bolster was still down at the hotel in the West of England, and being of a solid, sensible, and somewhat unimaginative turn of mind, probably went through her duties to the last without much change of manner. But the effect of the coming scenes upon poor John Kenneby was terrible. It was to him as though for the time they had made of him an Atlas, and compelled him to bear on his weak shoulders the weight of the whole world. Men did talk much about Lady Mason and the coming trial; but to him it seemed as though men talked of nothing else. At Hubbles and Grease's it was found useless to put figures into his hands till all this should be over. Indeed it was doubted by many whether he would ever recover his ordinary tone of mind. It seemed to be understood that he would be cross-examined by Chaffanbrass, and there were those who thought that John Kenneby would never again be equal to a day's work after that which he would then be made to endure. That he would have been greatly relieved could the whole thing have been wiped away from him there can be no manner of doubt; but I fancy that he would also have been disappointed. It is much to be great for a day, even though that day's greatness should cause the shipwreck of a whole life.

"I shall endeavor to speak the truth," said John Kenneby, solemnly.

"The truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth," said Moulder.

"Yes, Moulder, that will be my endeavor; and then I may lay my hand upon my bosom and think that I have done my duty by my country." And as Kenneby spoke he suited the action to the word.

"Quite right, John," said Mrs. Smiley. "Them's the sentiments of a man, and I, as a woman having a right to speak where you are concerned, quite approve of them."

"They'll get nothing but the truth out of John," said Mrs. Moulder; "not if he knows it." These last words she added, actuated by admiration of what she had heard of Mr. Chaffanbrass, and perhaps with some little doubt as to her brother's firmness.

"That's where it is," said Moulder. "Lord bless you, John, they'll turn you round their finger like a bit of red tape. Truth! Gammon! What do they care for truth?"

"But I care, Moulder," said Kenneby. "I don't suppose they can make me tell falsehoods if I don't wish it."

"Not if you're the man I take you to be," said Mrs. Smiley.

"Gammon!" said Moulder.

"Mr. Moulder, that's an objectionable word," said Mrs. Smiley. "If John Kenneby is the man I take him to be—and who's a right to speak if I haven't, seeing that I am going to commit myself for this world into his hands?"—and Mrs. Smiley, as she spoke, simpered, and looked down with averted head on the fullness of her Irish tabinet—"if he's the man that I take him to be, he won't say on this thrilling occasion no more than the truth, nor yet no less. Now that isn't gammon—if I know what gammon is."

It will have been already seen that the party in question were assembled at Mr. Moulder's room in Great St. Helen's. There had been a little supper party there to commemorate the final arrangements as to the coming marriage, and the four were now sitting round the fire with their glasses of hot toddy at their elbows. Moulder was armed with his pipe, and was enjoying himself in that manner which most delighted him. When last we saw him he had somewhat exceeded discretion in his cups, and was not comfortable. But at the present nothing ailed him. The supper had been good, the tobacco was good, and the toddy was good. Therefore when the lovely Thais sitting beside him—Thais, however, on this occasion having been provided not for himself but for his brother-in-law—when Thais objected to the use of his favorite word he merely chuckled down in the bottom of his fat throat, and allowed her to finish her sentence.

Poor John Kenneby had more, much more on his hands than this dreadful trial. Since he had declared that the Adriatic was free to wed another, he had found himself devoted and given up to Mrs. Smiley. For some days after that auspicious evening there had been considerable wrangling between Mrs. Moulder and Mrs. Smiley as to the proceeds of the brick-field; and on this question Moulder himself had taken a part. The Moulder interest had of course desired that all right of management in the brick-field should be vested in the husband, seeing that, according to the usages of this country, brick-fields and their belongings appertain rather to men than to women; but Mrs. Smiley had soon made it evident that she by no means intended to be merely a sleeping partner in the firm. At one time Kenneby had entertained a hope of escape; for neither would the Moulder interest give way, nor would the Smiley. But two hundred a year was a great stake, and at last the thing was arranged, very much in accordance with the original Smiley view. And now at this most trying period of his life, poor Kenneby had upon his mind all the cares of a lover as well as the cares of a witness.

"I shall do my best," said John. "I shall do my best, and then throw myself upon Providence."

"And take a little drop of something comfortable in your pocket," said his sister, "so as to sperrit you up a little when your name's called."

"Sperrit him up!" said Moulder; "why I suppose he'll be standing in that box the best part of a day. I knowed a man was a witness; it was a case of horse-stealing; and the man who was the witness was the man who'd took the horse."

"And he was witness against hisself!" said Mrs. Smiley.

"No; he'd paid for it. That is to say, either he had or he hadn't. That was what they wanted to get out of him, and I'm blessed if he didn't take 'em till the judge wouldn't set there any longer. And then they hadn't got it out of him."

"But John Kenneby ain't one of that sort," said Mrs. Smiley.

"I suppose that man did not want to unbosom himself," said Kenneby.

"Well; no. The likes of him seldom do like to unbosom themselves," said Moulder.

"But that will be my desire. If they will only allow me to speak freely whatever I know about this matter, I will give them no trouble."

"You mean to act honest, John," said his sister.

"I always did, Mary Anne."

"Well now, I'll tell you what it is," said

Moulder. "As Mrs. Smiley don't like it I won't say any thing more about gammon—not just at present, that is."

"I've no objection to gammon, Mr. Moulder, when properly used," said Mrs. Smiley, "but I look on it as disrespectful; and seeing the position which I hold as regards John Kenneby, any thing disrespectful to him is hurtful to my feelings."

"All right," said Moulder. "And now, John, I'll just tell you what it is. You've no more chance of being allowed to speak freely there than—than—than—no more than if you was in church. What are them fellows paid for if you're to say whatever you pleases out in your own way?"

"He only wants to say the truth, M.," said Mrs. Moulder, who probably knew less than her husband of the general usages of courts of law.

"Truth be —," said Moulder.

"Mr. Moulder!" said Mrs. Smiley. "There's ladies by, if you'll please to remember."

"To hear such nonsense sets one past one's self," continued he; "as if all those lawyers were brought together there—the cleverest and sharpest fellows in the kingdom, mind you—to listen to a man like John here telling his own story in his own way. You'll have to tell your story in their way; that is, in two different ways. There'll be one fellow 'll make you tell it his way first, and another fellow 'll make you tell it again his way afterward; and it's odds but what the first 'll be at you again after that, till you won't know whether you stand on your heels or your head."

"That can't be right," said Mrs. Moulder.

"And why can't it be right?" said Moulder. "They're paid for it; it's their duties; just as it's my duty to sell Hubbles and Grease's sugar. It's not for me to say the sugar's bad, or the samples not equal to the last. My duty is to sell, and I sell; and it's their duty to get a verdict."

"But the truth, Moulder—!" said Kenneby.

"Gammon!" said Moulder. "Begging your pardon, Mrs. Smiley, for making use of the expression. Look you here, John; if you're paid to bring a man off not guilty, won't you bring him off if you can? I've been at trials times upon times, and listened till I've wished from the bottom of my heart that I'd been brought up a barrister. Not that I think much of myself, and I mean of course with education and all that accordingly. It's beautiful to hear them. You'll see a little fellow in a wig, and he'll get up; and there'll be a man in the box before him—some swell dressed up to his eyes, who thinks no end of strong beer of himself; and in about ten minutes he'll be as flabby as wet paper, and he'll say—on his oath, mind you—just any thing that that little fellow wants him to say. That's power, mind you, and I call it beautiful."

"But it ain't justice," said Mrs. Smiley.

"Why not? I say it is justice. You can have it if you choose to pay for it, and so can I. If I buy a great-coat against the winter, and you go out at night without having one, is it injustice because you're perished by the cold while I'm as warm as a toast? I say it's a grand thing to live in a country where one can buy a great-coat."

The argument had got so far, Mr. Moulder certainly having the best of it, when a ring at the outer door was heard.

"Now who on earth is that?" said Moulder.

"Snengkeld, I shouldn't wonder," said his wife.

"I hope it ain't no stranger," said Mrs. Smiley. "Situating as John and I are now, strangers is so disagreeable." And then the door was opened by the maid-servant, and Mr. Kantwise was shown into the room.

"Halloo, Kantwise!" said Mr. Moulder, not rising from his chair, or giving any very decided tokens of welcome. "I thought you were down somewhere among the iron foundries?"

"So I was, Mr. Moulder, but I came up yesterday. Mrs. Moulder, allow me to have the honor. I hope I see you quite well; but looking at you I need not ask. Mr. Kenneby, Sir, your very humble servant. The day's coming on fast; isn't it, Mr. Kenneby? Ma'am, your very obedient. I believe I haven't the pleasure of being acquainted."

"Mrs. Smiley, Mr. Kantwise. Mr. Kantwise, Mrs. Smiley," said the lady of the house, introducing her visitors to each other in the appropriate way.

"Quite delighted, I'm sure," said Kantwise.

"Smiley as is, and Kenneby as will be this day three weeks," said Moulder; and then they all enjoyed that little joke, Mrs. Smiley by no means appearing bashful in the matter although Mr. Kantwise was a stranger.

"I thought I should find Mr. Kenneby here," said Kantwise, when the subject of the coming nuptials had been sufficiently discussed, "and therefore I just stepped in. No intrusion, I hope, Mr. Moulder."

"All right," said Moulder; "make yourself at home. There's the stuff on the table. You know what the tap is."

"I've just parted from Mr. Dockwrath," said Kantwise, speaking in a tone of voice which implied the great importance of the communication, and looking round the table to see the effect of it upon the circle.

"Then you've parted from a very low-lived party, let me tell you that," said Moulder. He had not forgotten Dockwrath's conduct in the commercial room at Leeds, and was fully resolved that he never would forgive it.

"That's as may be," said Kantwise. "I say nothing on that subject at the present moment, either one way or the other. But I think you'll all agree as to this: that at the present moment Mr. Dockwrath fills a conspicuous place in the public eye."

"By no means so conspicuous as John Kenneby," said Mrs. Smiley, "if I may be allowed in my position to hold an opinion."

"That's as may be, ma'am. I say nothing about that. What I hold by is, that Mr. Dockwrath does hold a conspicuous place in the public eye. I've just parted with him in Gray's Inn Lane, and he says that it's all up now with Lady Mason."

"Gammon!" said Moulder. And on this occasion Mrs. Smiley did not rebuke him. "What does he know about it more than any one else? Will he bet two to one? Because, if so, I'll take it; only I must see the money down."

"I don't know what he'll bet, Mr. Moulder; only he says it's all up with her."

"Will he back his side, even-handed?"

"I ain't a betting man, Mr. Moulder. I don't think it's right. And on such a matter as this, touching the liberty and almost life of a lady whom I've had the honor of seeing, and acquainted as I am with the lady of the other party, Mrs. Mason that is of Groby Park, I should rather, if it's no offense to you, decline the subject of—betting."

"Bother!"

"Now M., in your own house, you know!" said his wife.

"So it is bother. But never mind that. Go on, Kantwise. What is this you were saying about Dockwrath?"

"Oh, that's about all. I thought you would like to know what they were doing, particularly Mr. Kenneby. I do hear that they mean to be uncommonly hard upon him."

The unfortunate witness shifted uneasily in his seat, but at the moment said nothing himself.

"Well, now, I can't understand it," said Mrs. Smiley, sitting upright in her chair, and tackling herself to the discussion as though she meant to express her opinion, let who might think differently. "How is any one to put words into my mouth if I don't choose to speak them? There's John's waistcoat is silk." Upon which they all looked at Kenneby's waistcoat, and, with the exception of Kantwise, acknowledged the truth of the assertion.

"That's as may be," said he, looking round at it from the corner of his eyes.

"And do you mean to say that all the barristers in London will make me say that it's made of cloth? It's ridiculous—nothing short of ridiculous."

"You've never tried, my dear," said Moulder.

"I don't know about being your dear, Mr. Moulder—"

"Nor yet don't I neither, Mrs. Smiley," said the wife.

"Mr. Kenneby's my dear, and I ain't ashamed to own him, before men and women. But if he allows himself to be hocussed in that way, I don't know but what I shall be ashamed. I call it hocussing—just hocussing."

"So it is, ma'am," said Kantwise, "only this, you know, if I hocus you, why you hocus me in return; so it isn't so very unfair, you know."

"Unfair!" said Moulder. "It's the fairest thing that is. It's the bulwark of the British Constitution."

"What! being badgered and brow-beat?" asked Kenneby, who was thinking within himself that if this were so he did not care if he lived somewhere beyond the protection of that blessed Ægis.

"Trial by jury is," said Moulder. "And how can you have trial by jury if the witnesses are not to be cross-questioned?"

To this position no one was at the moment ready to give an answer, and Mr. Moulder enjoyed a triumph over his audience. That he lived in a happy and blessed country Moulder was well aware, and with those blessings he did not wish any one to tamper. "Mother," said a fastidious child to his parent, "the bread is gritty and the butter tastes of turnips." "Turnips indeed, and gritty!" said the mother. "Is it not a great thing to have bread-and-butter at all?" I own that my sympathies are with the child. Bread-and-butter is a great thing; but I would have it of the best if that be possible.

After that Mr. Kantwise was allowed to dilate upon the subject which had brought him there. Mr. Dockwrath had been summoned to Bedford Row, and there had held a council of war together with Mr. Joseph Mason and Mr. Matthew Round. According to his own story Mr. Matthew had quite come round and been forced to acknowledge all that Dockwrath had done for the cause. In Bedford Row there was no doubt whatever as to the verdict. "That woman Bolster is quite clear that she only signed one deed," said Kantwise.

"I shall say nothing—nothing here," said Kenneby.

"Quite right, John," said Mrs. Smiley.

"Your feelings on the occasion become you."

"I'll lay an even bet she's acquitted," said Moulder. "And I'll do it in a ten-p'und note."

CHAPTER LXII.

WHAT THE FOUR LAWYERS THOUGHT ABOUT IT.

I HAVE spoken of the state of public opinion as to Lady Mason's coming trial, and have explained that for the most part men's thoughts and sympathies took part with her. But I can not say that such was the case with the thoughts of those who were most closely concerned with her in the matter, whatever may have been their sympathies. Of the state of Mr. Furnival's mind on the matter enough has been said. But if he had still entertained any shadow of doubt as to his client's guilt or innocence, none whatever was entertained either by Mr. Aram or by Mr. Chaffanbrass. From the day on which they had first gone into the real circumstances of the case, looking into the evidence which could be adduced against their client, and looking also to their means of rebutting that evidence, they had never felt a shadow of doubt upon the subject. But yet neither of them had ever said that she was guilty. Aram, in discussing with his clerks the work which it was necessary that they should do in the matter, had never expressed such an opinion; nor had Chaffanbrass done so in the consultations which he had held with Aram. As to the verdict they had very often expressed an opinion—differing considerably. Mr. Aram was strongly of opinion that Lady Mason would be acquitted, resting that opinion mainly on his great confidence in the powers of Mr. Chaffanbrass. But Mr. Chaffanbrass would shake his head, and sometimes say that things were not now as they used to be.

"That may be so in the City," said Mr. Aram. "But you won't find a City jury down at Alston."

"It's not the juries, Aram. It's the judges. It usedn't to be so, but it is now. When a man has the last word, and will take the trouble to use it, that's every thing. If I were asked what point I'd best like to have in my favor, I'd say a deaf judge. Or if not that, one regularly tired out. I've sometimes thought I'd like to be a judge myself, merely to have the last word."

"That wouldn't suit you at all, Mr. Chaffanbrass, for you'd be sick of it in a week."

"At any rate I'm not fit for it," said the great man, meekly. "I'll tell you what, Aram, I can look back on life and think that I've done a deal of good in my way. I've prevented unnecessary bloodshed. I've saved the country thousands of pounds in the maintenance of men who've shown themselves well able to maintain themselves. And I've made the Crown lawyers very careful as to what sort of evidence they would send up to the Old Bailey. But my chances of life have been such that they haven't made me fit to be a judge. I know that."

"I wish I might see you on the bench tomorrow—only that we shouldn't know what to do without you," said the civil attorney. It was no more than the fair everyday flattery of the world, for the practice of Mr. Solomon Aram in his profession was quite as surely attained as was that of Mr. Chaffanbrass. And it could hardly be called flattery, for Mr. Solomon Aram much valued the services of Mr. Chaffanbrass, and greatly appreciated the peculiar turn of that gentleman's mind.

The above conversation took place in Mr. Solomon Aram's private room in Bucklersbury. In that much-noted city thoroughfare Mr. Aram rented the first floor of a house over an eating establishment. He had no great paraphernalia of books and boxes and clerks' desks, as are apparently necessary to attorneys in general. Three clerks he did employ, who sat in one room, and he himself sat in that behind it. So at least they sat when they were to be found at the parent establishment; but as regarded the attorney himself and his senior assistant, the work of their lives was carried on chiefly in the courts of law. The room in which Mr. Aram was now sitting was furnished with much more attention to comfort than is usual in lawyers' chambers. Mr. Chaffanbrass was at present lying, with his feet up, on a sofa against the wall, in a position of comfort never attained by him elsewhere till the after-dinner hours had come to him, and Mr. Aram himself filled an easy lounging-chair. Some few law papers there were scattered on the library table, but none of those piles of dusty documents which give to a stranger on entering an ordinary attorney's room so terrible an idea of the difficulty and dreariness of the profession. There were no tin boxes with old names labeled on them; there were no piles of letters, and no pigeon-holes loaded with old memoranda. On the whole, Mr. Aram's private room was smart and attractive; though, like himself, it had an air rather of pretense than of steady and assured well-being.

It is not quite the thing for a barrister to wait upon an attorney, and therefore it must not be supposed that Mr. Chaffanbrass had come to Mr. Aram with any view to immediate business; but nevertheless, as the two men understood each other, they could say what they had to say as to this case of Lady Mason's, although their present positions were somewhat irregular. They were both to meet Mr. Furnival and Felix Graham on that afternoon in Mr. Furnival's chambers with reference to the division of those labors which were to be commenced at Alston on the day but one following, and they both thought that it might be as well that they should say a word to each other on the subject before they went there.

"I suppose you know nothing about the panel down there, eh?" said Chaffanbrass.

"Well, I have made some inquiries; but I don't think there's any thing especial to know—nothing that matters. If I were you, Mr. Chaffanbrass, I wouldn't have any Hamworth people on the jury, for they say that a prophet is never a prophet in his own country."

"But do you know the Hamworth people?"

"Oh yes; I can tell you as much as that. But I don't think it will matter much who is or is not on the jury."

"And why not?"

"If those two witnesses break down—that is, Kenneby and Bolster—no jury can convict her. And if they don't—"

"Then no jury can acquit her. But let me tell you, Aram, that it's not every man put into a jury-box who can tell whether a witness has broken down or not."

"But from what I hear, Mr. Chaffanbrass, I don't think either of these can stand a chance—that is, if they both come into your hands."

"But they won't both come into my hands," said the anxious hero of the Old Bailey.

"Ah! that's where it is. That's where we shall fail. Mr. Furnival is a great man, no doubt."

"A very great man—in his way," said Mr. Chaffanbrass.

"But if he lets one of those two slip through his fingers the thing's over."

"You know my opinion," said Chaffanbrass. "I think it is all over. If you're right in what you say—that they're both ready to swear in their direct evidence that they only signed one deed on that day, no vacillation afterward would have any effect on the judge. It's just possible, you know, that their memory might deceive them."

"Possible! I should think so. I'll tell you what Mr. Chaffanbrass, if the matter was altogether in your hands I should have no fear—literally no fear."

"Ah, you're partial, Aram."

"It couldn't be so managed, could it, Mr. Chaffanbrass? It would be a great thing—a very great thing." But Mr. Chaffanbrass said that he thought it could not be managed. The success or safety of a client is a very great thing—in a professional point of view a very great thing indeed. But there is a matter which in legal eyes is greater even than that. Professional etiquette required that the cross-examination of these two most important witnesses should not be left in the hands of the same barrister.

And then the special attributes of Kenneby and Bridget Bolster were discussed between them, and it was manifest that Aram knew with great accuracy the characters of the persons with whom he had to deal. That Kenneby might be made to say almost any thing was taken for granted. With him there would be very great scope for that peculiar skill with which Mr. Chaffanbrass was so wonderfully gifted. In the hands of Mr. Chaffanbrass it was not improbable that Kenneby might be made to swear that he had signed two, three, four—any number of documents on that fourteenth of July, although he had before sworn that he had only signed one. Mr. Chaffanbrass indeed might probably make him say any thing that he pleased. Had Kenneby been unsupported the case would have been made safe—so said Mr. Solomon Aram—by leaving Kenneby in the hands of Mr. Chaffanbrass. But then Bridget Bolster was supposed to be a witness of altogether a different class of character. To induce her to say exactly the reverse of that which she intended to say might, no doubt, be within the power of man. Mr. Aram thought that it would be within the power of Mr. Chaffanbrass. He thought, however, that it would as certainly be beyond the power of Mr. Furnival; and when the great man lying on the sofa mentioned the name of Mr. Felix Graham Mr. Aram merely smiled. The question with him was this: Which would be the safest course?—to make quite sure of Kenneby by leaving him with Chaffanbrass; or to go for the double stake by handing Kenneby over to Mr. Furnival, and leaving the task of difficulty to the great master?

"When so much depends upon it I do detest all this etiquette and precedence," said Aram, with enthusiasm. "In such a case Mr. Furnival ought not to think of himself."

"My dear Aram," said Mr. Chaffanbrass, "men always think of themselves first. And if we were to go out of the usual course, do you conceive that the gentlemen on the other side would fail to notice it?"

"Which shall it be, then?"

"I'm quite indifferent. If the memory of either of these two persons is doubtful—and after twenty years it may be so—Mr. Furnival will discover it."

"Then on the whole I'm disposed to think that I'd let him take the man."

"Just as you please, Aram. That is, if he's satisfied also."

"I'm not going to have my client overthrown, you know," said Aram. "And then you'll take Dockwrath also, of course. I don't know that it will have much effect upon the case, but I shall like to see Dockwrath in your hands; I shall indeed."

"I doubt he'll be too many for me."

"Ha, ha, ha!" Aram might well laugh, for when had any one shown himself able to withstand the powers of Mr. Chaffanbrass?

"They say he is a sharp fellow," said Mr. Chaffanbrass. "Well, we must be off. When those gentlemen at the West End get into Parliament it does not do to keep them waiting. Let one of your fellows get a cab." And then the barrister and the attorney started from Bucklersbury for the general meeting of their forces to be held in the Old Square, Lincoln's Inn.

We have heard how it came to pass that Felix Graham had been induced to become one of that legal phalanx which was employed on behalf of Lady Mason. It was now some days since he had left Noningsby, and those days with him had been very busy. He had never yet undertaken the defense of a person in a criminal court, and had much to learn—or perhaps he rather fancied that he had. And then that affair of Mary Snow's new lover was not found to arrange itself altogether easily. When he came to the details of his dealings with the different parties, every one wanted from him twice as much money as he had expected. The chemist was very willing to have a partner, but then a partnership in his business was, according to his view of the matter, a peculiarly expensive luxury. Snow père, moreover, came forward with claims which he rested on such various arguments that Graham found it almost impossible to resist them. At first—that is immediately subsequent to the interview between him and his patron described in a preceding chapter—Graham had been visited by a very repulsive attorney, who had talked loudly about the cruel wrongs of his ill-used client. This phasis of the affair would have been by far the preferable one; but the attorney and his client probably disagreed. Snow wanted immediate money, and as no immediate money was forthcoming through the attorney, he threw himself repentant at Graham's feet, and took himself off with twenty shillings. But his penitence, and his wants, and his tears, and the thwarted ambition of his parental mind were endless; and poor Felix hardly knew where to turn himself without seeing him. It seemed probable that every denizen of the courts of law in London would be told before long the sad tale of Mary Snow's injuries. And then Mrs. Thomas wanted money—more money than she had a right to want in accordance with the terms of their mutual agreement. "She had been very much put about," she said—"dreadfully put about. She had had to change her servant three times. There was no knowing the trouble Mary Snow had given her. She had, in a great measure, been forced to sacrifice her school." Poor woman! she thought she was telling the truth while making these false complaints. She did not mean to be dishonest, but it is so easy to be dishonest without meaning it when one is very poor! Mary Snow herself made no claim on her lost lover—no claim for money or for aught besides. When he parted from her on that day without kissing her, Mary Snow knew that all that was over. But not the less did Graham recognize her claim. The very bonnet which she must wear when she stood before the altar with Fitzallen must be paid for out of Graham's pocket. That hobby of moulding a young lady is perhaps of all hobbies the most expensive to which a young gentleman can apply himself.

And in these days he heard no word from Noningsby. Augustus Staveley was up in town, and once or twice they saw each other. But, as may easily be imagined, nothing was said between them about Madeline. As Augustus had once declared, a man does not talk to his friend about his own sister. And then hearing nothing—as, indeed, how could he have heard any thing?—Graham endeavored to assure himself that that was all over. His hopes had ran high at that moment when his last interview with the judge had taken place; but, after all, to what did that amount? He had never even asked Madeline to love him. He had been such a fool that he had made no use of those opportunities which chance had thrown in his way. He had been told that he might fairly aspire to the hand of any lady. And yet when he had really loved, and the girl whom he had loved had been close to him, he had not dared to speak to her! How could he now expect that she, in his absence, should care for him?

With all these little troubles around him he went to work on Lady Mason's case, and at first felt thoroughly well inclined to give her all the aid in his power. He saw Mr. Furnival on different occasions, and did much to charm that gentleman by his enthusiasm in this matter. Mr. Furnival himself could no longer be as enthusiastic as he had been. The skill of a lawyer he would still give if necessary, but the ardor of the loving friend was waxing colder from day to day. Would it not be better, if such might be possible, that the whole affair should be given up to the hands of Chaffanbrass who could be energetic without belief, and of Graham who was energetic because he believed? So he would say to himself frequently. But then he would think again of her pale face and acknowledge that this was impossible. He must go on till the end. But, nevertheless, if this young man could believe, would it not be well that he should bear the brunt of the battle? That fighting of a battle without belief is, I think, the sorriest task which ever falls to the lot of any man.

But, as the day drew nigh, a shadow of unbelief, a dim passing shade—a shade which would pass, and then return, and then pass again—flitted also across the mind of Felix Graham. His theory had been, and still was, that those two witnesses, Kenneby and Bolster, were suborned by Dockwraith to swear falsely. He had commenced by looking at the matter with a full confidence in his client's innocence—a confidence which had come from the outer world, from his social convictions, and the knowledge which he had of the confidence of others. Then it had been necessary for him to reconcile the stories which Kenneby and Bolster were prepared to tell with this strong confidence, and he could only do so by believing that they were both false and had been thus suborned. But what if they were not false? What if he were judging them wrongfully? I do not say that he had ceased to believe in Lady Mason; but a shadow of doubt would occasionally cross his mind, and give to the whole affair an aspect which to him was very tragical.

He had reached Mr. Furnival's chambers on this day some few minutes before his new allies, and as he was seated there discussing the matter which was now so interesting to them all, he blurted out a question which nearly confounded the elder barrister.

"I suppose there can really be no doubt as to her innocence?"

What was Mr. Furnival to say? Mr. Chaffanbrass and Mr. Aram had asked no such question. Mr. Round had asked no such question when he had discussed the whole matter confidentially with him. It was a sort of question never put to professional men, and one which Felix Graham should not have asked. Nevertheless it must be answered.

"Eh?" he said.

"I suppose we may take it for granted that Lady Mason is really innocent—that is, free from all falsehood or fraud in this matter?"

"Really innocent! Oh yes; I presume we take that for granted, as a matter of course."

"But you yourself, Mr. Furnival, you have no doubt about it? You have been concerned in this matter from the beginning, and therefore I have no hesitation in asking you."

But that was exactly the reason why he should have hesitated! At least so Mr. Furnival thought. "Who; I? No; I have no doubt; none in the least," said he. And thus the lie which he had been trying to avoid was at last told.

The assurance thus given was very complete as far as the words were concerned; but there was something in the tone of Mr. Furnival's voice which did not quite satisfy Felix Graham. It was not that he thought that Mr. Furnival had spoken falsely, but the answer had not been made in a manner to set his own mind at rest. Why had not Mr. Furnival answered him with enthusiasm? Why had he not, on behalf of his old friend, shown something like indignation that any such doubt should have been expressed? His words had been words of assurance; but, considering the subject, his tone had contained no assurance. And thus the shadow of doubt flitted backward and forward before Graham's mind.

Then the general meeting of the four lawyers was held, and the various arrangements necessary for the coming contest were settled. No such impertinent questions were asked then, or were there any communications between them of a confidential nature. Mr. Chaffanbrass and Solomon Aram might whisper together, as might also Mr. Furnival and Felix Graham; but there could be no whispering when all the four were assembled. The programme of their battle was settled, and then they parted with the understanding that they were to meet again in the court-house at Alston.

CHAPTER LXIII.

THE EVENING BEFORE THE TRIAL.

THE eve of the trial had now come, and still there had been no confidence between the mother and the son. No words of kindness had been spoken with reference to that terrible event which was so near at hand. Lucius had in his manner been courteous to his mother, but he had at the same time been very stern. He had seemed to make no allowance for her sorrows, never saying to her one of those soft words which we all love to hear from those around us when we are suffering. Why should she suffer thus? Had she chosen to lean upon him, he would have borne on her behalf all this trouble and vexation. As to her being guilty—as to her being found guilty by any twelve jurymen in England—no such idea ever entered his head.

He had said that many people had begun to suspect; but no such suspicions had reached his ears. What man, unless it should be some Dockwrath, would whisper to the son the possibility of his mother's guilt? Dockwrath had done more than whisper it; but the words of such a man could have no avail with him against his mother's character.

On that day Mrs. Orme had been with Lady Mason for some hours, and had used all her eloquence to induce the mother even then to divulge her secret to her son. Mrs. Orme had suggested that Sir Peregrine should tell him; she had offered to tell him herself; she had proposed that Lady Mason should write to Lucius. But all had been of no avail. Lady Mason had argued, and had argued with some truth, that it was too late to tell him now, with the view of obtaining from him support during the trial. If he were now told, he would not recover from the first shock of the blow in time to appear in court without showing on his brow the perturbation of his spirit. His terrible grief would reveal the secret to every one. "When it is over," she had whispered at last, as Mrs. Orme continued to press upon her the absolute necessity that Lucius should give up the property—"when it is over, you shall do it."

With this Mrs. Orme was obliged to rest contented. She had not the heart to remind Lady Mason how probable it was that the truth might be told out to all the world during the next two or three days; that a verdict of Guilty might make any further telling unnecessary. And indeed it was not needed that she should do so.

In this respect Lady Mason was fully aware of the nature of the ground on which she stood.

Mrs. Orme had sat with her the whole afternoon, only leaving herself time to be ready for Sir Peregrine's dinner; and as she left her she promised to be with her early on the following morning to go with her down to the court. Mr. Aram was also to come to the Farm for her, and a closed carriage had been ordered from the inn for the occasion.

"You won't let him prevent you?" were the last words she spoke, as Mrs. Orme then left her.

"He will not wish to do so," said Mrs. Orme. "He has already given me his permission. He never goes back from his word, you know."

This had been said in allusion to Sir Peregrine. When Mrs. Orme had first proposed to accompany Lady Mason to the court and to sit by her side during the whole trial, he had been much startled. He had been startled, and for a time had been very unwilling to accede to such a step. The place which she now proposed to fill was one which he had intended to fill himself; but he had intended to stand by an innocent, injured lady, not a perpetrator of midnight forgery. He had intended to support a spotless being, who would then be his wife, not a woman who for years had lived on the proceeds of fraud and felony, committed by herself!

"Edith," he said, "you know that I am unwilling to oppose you; but I think that in this your feelings are carrying you too far."

"No, father," she answered, not giving way at all, or showing herself minded to be turned from her purpose by any thing he might say. "Do not think so; think of her misery. How could she endure it by herself?"

"Think of her guilt, Edith!"

"I will leave others to think of that. But, father, her guilt will not stain me. Are we not bound to remember what injury she might have done to us, and how we might still have been ignorant of all this, had not she herself confessed it—for our sakes—for our sakes, father?"

And then Sir Peregrine gave way. When this argument was used to him, he was forced to yield. It was true that, had not that woman been as generous as she was guilty, he would now have been bound to share her shame. The whole of this affair, taken together, had nearly laid him prostrate; but that which had gone the farthest toward effecting this ruin, was the feeling that he owed so much to Lady Mason. As regarded the outer world, the injury to him would have been much more terrible had he married her; men would then have declared that all was over with him; but as regards the inner man, I doubt whether he would not have borne that better. It was easier for him to sustain an injury than a favor, than a favor from one whom his judgment compelled him to disown as a friend.

But he had given way, and it was understood at The Cleeve that Mrs. Orme was to remain by Lady Mason's side during the trial. To the general household there was nothing in this that was wonderful. They knew only of the old friendship. To them the question of her guilt was still an open question. As others had begun to doubt, so had they; but no one then presumed that Sir Peregrine or Mrs. Orme had any doubt. That they were assured of her innocence was the conviction of all Hamworth and its neighborhood.

"He never goes back from his word, you know," Mrs. Orme had said; and then she kissed Lady Mason, and went her way. She had never left her without a kiss, had never greeted her without a warm pressure of the hand, since that day on which the secret had been told in Sir Peregrine's library. It would be impossible to describe how great had been the worth of this affection to Lady Mason; but it may almost be said that it had kept her alive. She herself had said but little about it, uttering but few thanks; but not the less had she recognized the value of what had been done for her. She had even become more free herself in her intercourse with Mrs. Orme, more open in her mode of speech, had put herself more on an equality with her friend, since there had ceased to be any thing hidden between them. Previously Lady Mason had felt, and had occasionally expressed the feeling, that she was hardly fit to associate on equal terms with Mrs. Orme; but now there was none of this; now, as they sat together for hours and hours, they spoke, and argued, and lived together as though they were equal. But nevertheless, could she have shown her love by any great deed, there was nothing which Lady Mason would not have done for Mrs. Orme.

She was now left alone, and according to her daily custom would remain there till the servant told her that Mr. Lucius was waiting for her in the dining-room. In an early part of this story I have endeavored to describe how this woman sat alone, with deep sorrow in her heart and deep thought on her mind, when she first learned what terrible things were coming on her. The idea, however, which the reader will have conceived of her as she sat there will have come to him from the skill of the artist, and not from the words of the writer. If that drawing is now near him, let him go back to it. Lady Mason was again sitting in the same room—that pleasant room, looking out through the veranda on to the sloping lawn, and in the same chair; one hand again rested open on the arm of the chair, while the other supported her face as she leaned upon her elbow; and the sorrow was still in her heart, and the deep thought in her mind. But the lines of her face were altered, and the spirit expressed by it was changed. There was less of beauty, less of charm, less of softness; but in spite of all that she had gone through there was more of strength, more of the power to resist all that this world could do to her.

It would be wrong to say that she was in any degree a hypocrite. A man is no more a hypocrite because his manner and gait when he is alone are different from those which he assumes in company, than he is for wearing a dressing-gown in the morning, whereas he puts on a black coat in the evening. Lady Mason, in the present crisis of her life, endeavored to be true in all her dealings with Mrs. Orme; but nevertheless Mrs. Orme had not yet read her character. As she now sat thinking of what the morrow would bring upon her—thinking of all that the malice of that man Dockwraith had brought upon her—she resolved that she would still struggle on with a bold front. It had been brought home to her that he, her son, the being for whom her soul had been imperiled and all her hopes for this world destroyed—that he must be told of his mother's guilt and shame. Let him be told, and then let him leave her while his anguish and the feeling of his shame were hot upon him. Should she be still a free woman when this trial was over she would move herself away at once, and then let him be told. But still it would be well—well for his sake, that his mother should not be found guilty by the law. It was still worth her while to struggle. The world was very hard to her, bruising her to the very soul at every turn, allowing her no hope, offering to her no drop of cool water in her thirst. But still for him there was some future career; and that career perhaps need not be blotted by the public notice of his mother's guilt. She would still fight against her foes—still show to that court, and to the world that would then gaze at her, a front on which guilt should not seem to have laid its hideous, defacing hand.

There was much that was wonderful about this woman. While she was with those who regarded her with kindness she could be so soft and womanly; and then, when alone, she could be so stern and hard! And it may be said that she felt but little pity for herself. Though she recognized the extent of her misery, she did not complain of it. Even in her inmost thoughts her plaint was this—that he, her son, should be doomed to suffer so deeply for her sin! Sometimes she would utter to that other mother a word of wailing, in that he would not be soft to her; but even in that she did not mean to complain of him. She knew in her heart of hearts that she had no right to expect such softness. She knew that it was better that it should be as it now was. Had he staid with her from morn till evening, speaking kind words to her, how could she have failed to tell him? In sickness it may irk us because we are not allowed to take the cool drink that would be grateful; but what man in his senses would willingly swallow that by which his very life would be endangered? It was thus she thought of her son, and what his love might have been to her.

Yes; she would still bear up, as she had borne up at that other trial. She would dress herself with care, and go down into the court with a smooth brow. Men, as they looked at her, should not at once say, "Behold the face of a guilty woman!" There was still a chance in the battle, though the odds were so tremendously against her. It might be that there was but little to which she could look forward, even though the verdict of the jury should be in her favor; but all that she regarded as removed from her by a great interval. She had promised that Lucius should know all after the trial—that he should know all, so that the property might be restored to its rightful owner; and she was fully resolved that this promise should be kept. But nevertheless there was a long interval. If she could battle through this first danger—if by the skill of her lawyers she could avert the public declaration of her guilt, might not the chances of war still take some further turn in her favor? And thus, though her face was pale with suffering and thin with care, though she had realized the fact that nothing short of a miracle could save her—still she would hope for that miracle.

But the absolute bodily labor which she was forced to endure was so hard upon her! She would dress herself, and smooth her brow for the trial; but that dressing herself, and that maintenance of a smooth brow would impose upon her an amount of toil which would almost overtask her physical strength. Oh reader, have you ever known what it is to rouse yourself and go out to the world on your daily business, when all the inner man has revolted against work, when a day of rest has seemed to you to be worth a year of life? If she could have rested now it would have been worth many years of life, worth all her life. She longed for rest—to be able to lay aside the terrible fatigue of being ever on the watch. From the burden of that necessity she had never been free since her crime had been first committed. She had never known true rest. She had not once trusted herself to sleep without the feeling that her first waking thought would be one of horror, as the remembrance of her position came upon her. In every word she spoke, in every trifling action of her life, it was necessary that she should ask herself how that word and action might tell upon her chances of escape. She had striven to be true and honest—true and honest with the exception of that one deed. But that one deed had communicated its poison to her whole life. Truth and honesty—fair, unblemished truth and open-handed, fearless honesty—had been impossible to her. Before she could be true and honest it would be necessary that she should go back and cleanse herself from the poison of that deed. Such cleansing is to be done. Men have sinned deep as she had sinned, and, lepers though they have been, they have afterward been clean. But that task of cleansing one's self is not an easy one; the waters of that Jordan in which it is needful to wash are scalding hot. The cool neighboring streams of life's pleasant valleys will by no means suffice.

Since she had been home at Orley Farm she had been very scrupulous as to going down into the parlor both at breakfast and at dinner, so that she might take her meals with her son. She had not as yet omitted this on one occasion, although sometimes the task of sitting through the dinner was very severe upon her. On the present occasion, the last day that remained to her before the trial—perhaps the last evening on which she would ever watch the sun set from those windows, she thought that she would spare herself. "Tell Mr. Lucius," she said to the servant who came to summon her, "that I would be obliged to him if he would sit down without me. Tell him that I am not ill, but that I would rather not go down to dinner!" But before the girl was on the stairs she had changed her mind. Why should she now ask for this mercy? What did it matter? So she gathered herself up from the chair, and going forth from the room, stopped the message before it was delivered. She would bear on to the end.

She sat through the dinner, and answered the ordinary questions which Lucius put to her with her ordinary voice, and then, as was her custom, she kissed his brow as she left the room. It must be remembered that they were still mother and son, and that there had been no quarrel between them. And now, as she went up stairs, he followed her into the drawing-room. His custom had been to remain below, and though he had usually seen her again during the evening, there had seldom or never been any social intercourse between them. On the present occasion, however, he followed her, and closing the door for her as he entered the room, he sat himself down on the sofa close to her chair.

"Mother," he said, putting out his hand and touching her arm, "things between us are not as they should be."

She shuddered, not at the touch, but at the words. Things were not as they should be between them. "No," she said. "But I am sure of this, Lucius, that you never had an unkind thought in your heart toward me."

"Never, mother. How could I—to my own mother, who has ever been so good to me? But for the last three months we have been to each other nearly as though we were strangers."

"But we have loved each other all the same," said she.

"But love should beget close social intimacy, and above all close confidence in times of sorrow. There has been none such between us."

What could she say to him? It was on her lips to promise him that such love should again prevail between them as soon as this trial should be over; but the words stuck in her throat. She did not dare to give him so false an assurance. "Dear Lucius," she said, "if it has been my fault I have suffered for it."

"I do not say that it is your fault—nor will I say that it has been my own. If I have seemed harsh to you, I beg your pardon."

"No, Lucius, no; you have not been harsh. I have understood you through it all."

"I have been grieved because you did not seem to trust me—but let that pass now. Mother, I wish that there may be no unpleasant feeling between us when you enter on this ordeal to-morrow."

"There is none—there shall be none."

"No one can feel more keenly—no one can feel so keenly as I do, the cruelty with which you are treated. The sight of your sorrow has made me wretched."

"Oh, Lucius!"

"I know how pure and innocent you are—"

"No, Lucius, no."

"But I say yes; and knowing that, it has cut me to the quick to see them going about a defense of your innocence by quips and quibbles, as though they were struggling for the escape of a criminal."

"Lucius!" And she put her hands up, praying for mercy, though she could not explain to him how terribly severe were his words.

"Wait a moment, mother. To me such men as Mr. Chaffanbrass and his comrades are odious. I will not, and do not believe that their services are necessary to you—"

"But, Lucius, Mr. Furnival—"

"Yes; Mr. Furnival! It is he that has done it all. In my heart I wish that you had never known Mr. Furnival—never known him as a lawyer that is," he added, thinking of his own strong love for the lawyer's daughter.

"Do not upbraid me now, Lucius. Wait till it is all over."

"Upbraid you! No. I have come to you now that we may be friends. As things have gone so far, this plan of defense must of course be carried on. I will say no more about that. But, mother, I will go into the court with you to-morrow. That support I can at any rate give you, and they shall see that there is no quarrel between us."

But Lady Mason did not desire this. She would have wished that he might have been miles away from the court had that been possible. "Mrs. Orme is to be with me," she said.

Then again there came a black frown upon his brow—a frown such as there had often been there of late. "And will Mrs. Orme's presence make the attendance of your own son improper?"

"Oh no; of course not. I did not mean that, Lucius."

"Do you not like to have me near you?" he asked; and as he spoke he rose up, and took her hand as he stood before her.

She gazed for a moment into his face while the tears streamed down from her eyes, and then rising from her chair, she threw herself on to his bosom and clasped him in her arms. "My boy! my boy!" she said. "Oh, if you could be near me, and away from this—away from this!"

She had not intended thus to give way, but the temptation had been too strong for her. When she had seen Mrs. Orme and Peregrine together—when she had heard Peregrine's mother, with words expressed in a joyful tone, affect to complain of the inroads which her son made upon her, she had envied her that joy. "Oh, if it could be so with me also!" she always thought; and the words too had more than once been spoken. Now at last, in this last moment, as it might be, of her life at home, he had come to her with kindly voice, and she could not repress her yearning.

"Lucius," she said; "dearest Lucius! my own boy!" And then the tears from her eyes streamed hot on to his bosom.

"Mother," he said, "it shall be so. I will be with you."

But she was now thinking of more than this—of much more. Was it possible for her to tell him now? As she held him in her arms, hiding her face upon his breast, she struggled hard to speak the word. Then in the midst of that struggle, while there was still something like a hope within her that it might be done, she raised her head and looked up into his face. It was not a face pleasant to look at, as was that of Peregrine Orme. It was hard in its outlines, and perhaps too manly for his age. But she was his mother, and she loved it well. She looked up at it, and raising her hands she stroked his cheeks. She then kissed him again and again, with warm, clinging kisses. She clung to him, holding him close to her, while the sobs which she had so long repressed came forth from her with a violence that terrified him. Then again she looked up into his face with one long wishful gaze; and after that she sank upon the sofa and hid her face within her hands. She had made the struggle, but it had been of no avail. She could not tell him that tale with her own voice.

"Mother," he said, "what does this mean? I can not understand such grief as this." But for a while she was quite unable to answer. The flood-gates were at length opened, and she could not restrain the torrent of her sobbings.

"You do not understand how weak a woman can be," she said at last.

But in truth he understood nothing of a woman's strength. He sat down by her, now and then taking her by the hand when she would leave it to him, and in his way endeavored to comfort her. All comfort, we may say, was out of the question; but by degrees she again became tranquil. "It shall be to-morrow as you will have it. You will not object to her being with me also?"

He did object, but he could not say so. He would have much preferred to be the only friend near to her, but he felt that he could not deny her the solace of a woman's aid and a woman's countenance. "Oh no," he said, "if you wish it." He would have found it impossible to define even to himself the reason for his dislike to any assistance coming from the family of the Ormes; but the feeling was there, strong within his bosom.

"And when this is over, mother, we will go away," he said. "If you would wish to live elsewhere, I will sell the property. It will be better perhaps after all that has passed. We will go abroad for a while."

She could make no answer to this except pressing his hand. Ah, if he had been told—if she had allowed Mrs. Orme to do that kindness for her, how much better for her would it now have been! Sell the property! Ah, me! Were they not words of fearful sound in her ears—words of terrible import?

"Yes, it shall be so," she said, putting aside that last proposition of his. "We will go together to-morrow. Mr. Aram said that he would sit at my side, but he can not object to your being there between us." Mr. Aram's name was odious to Lucius Mason. His close presence would be odious to him. But he felt that he could urge nothing against an arrangement that had now become necessary. Mr. Aram, with all his quibbles, had been engaged, and the trial must now be carried through with all the Aram tactics.

After that Lucius left his mother, and took himself out into the dark night, walking up and down on the road between his house and the outer gate, endeavoring to understand why his mother should be so despondent. That she must fear the result of the trial, he thought, was certain, but he could not bring himself to have any such fear. As to any suspicion of her guilt, no such idea had even for one moment cast a shadow upon his peace of mind.

CHAPTER LXIV.

THE FIRST JOURNEY TO ALSTON.

AT that time Sir Richard Leatherham was the Solicitor-General, and he had been retained as leading counsel for the prosecution. It was quite understood by all men who did understand what was going on in the world, that this trial had been in truth instituted by Mr. Mason, of Groby, with the hope of recovering the property which had been left away from him by his father's will. The whole matter had now been so much discussed that the true bearings of it were publicly known. If on the former trial Lady Mason had sworn falsely, then there could be no doubt that that will, or the codicil to the will, was an untrue document, and the property would in that case revert to Mr. Mason, after such further legal exertations on the subject as the lawyers might find necessary and profitable. As far as the public were concerned, and as far as the Masons were concerned, it was known and acknowledged that this was another struggle on the part of the Groby Park family to regain the Orley Farm estate. But then the question had become much more interesting than it had been in the days of the old trial, through the allegation which was now made of Lady Mason's guilt. Had the matter gone against her in the former trial, her child would have lost the property, and that would have been all. But the present issue would be very different. It would be much more tragical, and therefore of much deeper interest.

As Alston was so near to London, Sir Richard, Mr. Furnival, Mr. Chaffanbrass, and others, were able to go up and down by train—which arrangement was at ordinary assizes a great heart-sore to the hotel-keepers and owners of lodging-houses in Alston. But on this occasion the town was quite full in spite of this facility. The attorneys did not feel it safe to run up and down in that way, nor did the witnesses. Mr. Aram remained, as did also Mr. Mat Round. Special accommodation had been provided for John Kenneby and Bridget Bolster, and Mr. Mason, of Groby, had lodgings of his own.

Mr. Mason, of Groby, had suggested to the attorneys in Bedford Row that his services as a witness would probably be required, but they had seemed to think otherwise. "We shall not call you," Mr. Round had said, "and I do not suppose that the other side will do so. They can't if they do not first serve you." But in spite of this Mr. Mason had determined to be at Alston. If it were true that this woman had robbed him; if it could be proved that she had really forged a will, and then by crime of the deepest dye taken from him for years that which was his own, should he not be there to see? Should he not be a witness to her disgrace? Should he not be the first to know and feel his own tardy triumph? Pity! Pity for her! When such a word was named to him, it seemed to him as though the speaker were becoming to a certain extent a partner in her guilt. Pity! Yes; such pity as an Englishman who had caught the Nena Sahib might have felt for his victim. He had complained twenty times since this matter had been mooted of the folly of those who had altered the old laws. That folly had probably robbed him of his property for twenty years, and would now rob him of half his revenge. Not that he ever spoke even to himself of revenge. "Vengeance is mine, saith the Lord." He would have been as able as any man to quote the words, and as willing. Justice, outraged justice, was his theme. Whom had he ever robbed? To whom had he not paid all that was owing? "All that have I done from my youth upward." Such were his thoughts of himself; and with such thoughts was it possible that he should willingly be absent from Alston during such a trial?

"I really would stay away if I were you," Mat Round had said to him.

"I will not stay away," he had replied, with a look black as a thunder-cloud. Could there really be any thing in those suspicions of Dockwrath, that his own lawyer had willfully thrown him over once, and was now anxious to throw him over again? "I will not stay away," he said; and Dockwrath secured his lodgings for him. About this time he was a good deal with Mr. Dockwrath, and almost regretted that he had not followed that gentleman's advice at the commencement of the trial, and placed the management of the whole concern in his hands.

Thus Alston was quite alive on the morning of the trial, and the doors of the court-house were thronged long before they were opened. They who were personally concerned in the matter, whose presence during the ceremony would be necessary, or who had legal connection with the matter in hand, were of course not driven to this tedious manner of obtaining places. Mr. Dockwrath, for instance, did not stand waiting at the door, nor did his friend Mr. Mason. Mr. Dockwrath was a great man as far as this day was concerned, and could command admittance from the door-keepers and others about the court. But for the outer world, for men and women who were not lucky enough to be lawyers, witnesses, jurymen, or high sheriff, there was no means of hearing and seeing the events of this stirring day except what might be obtained by exercise of an almost unlimited patience.

There had been much doubt as to what arrangement for her attendance at the court it might be best for Lady Mason to make, and some difficulty too as to who should decide as to these arrangements. Mr. Aram had been down more than once, and had given a hint that it would be well that something should be settled. It had ended in his settling it himself—he, with the assistance of Mrs. Orme. What would Sir Peregrine have said had he known that on any subject these two had been leagued in council together?

"She can go from hence in a carriage—a carriage from the inn," Mrs. Orme had said.

"Certainly, certainly; a carriage from the inn; yes. But in the evening, ma'am?"

"When the trial is over?" said Mrs. Orme, inquiring from him his meaning.

"We can hardly expect that it shall be over in one day, ma'am. She will continue to be on bail, and can return home. I will see that she is not annoyed as she leaves the town."

"Annoyed?" said Mrs. Orme.

"By the people, I mean."

"Will there be any thing of that, Sir?" she asked, turning pale at the idea. "I shall be with her, you know."

"Through the whole affair, ma'am?"

"Yes, through the whole affair."

"They'll want to have a look at her, of course; but, Mrs. Orme, we'll see that you are not annoyed. Yes; she had better come back home the first day. The expense won't be much, will it?"

"Oh no," said Mrs. Orme. "I must return home, you know. How many days will it be, Sir?"

"Well, perhaps two—perhaps three. It may run on all the week. Of course you know, Mrs. Orme—"

"Know what?" she asked.

"When the trial is over, if—if it should go against us—then you must return alone."

And so the matter had been settled, and Mr. Aram himself had ordered the carriage from the inn. Sir Peregrine's carriage would have been at their disposal—or rather Mrs. Orme's own carriage; but she had felt that The Cleeve arms on The Cleeve panels would be out of place in the streets of Hamworth on such an occasion. It would of course be impossible that she should not be recognized in the court, but she would do as little as possible to proclaim her own presence.

When the morning came, the very morning of the terrible day, Mrs. Orme came down early from her room, as it was necessary that she should breakfast two hours before the usual time. She had said nothing of this to Sir Peregrine, hoping that she might have been able to escape in the morning without seeing him. She had told her son to be there; but when she made her appearance in the breakfast-parlor she found that his grandfather was already with him. She sat down and took her cup of tea almost in silence, for they all felt that on such a morning much speech was impossible for them.

"Edith, my dear," said the baronet, "you had better eat something. Think of the day that is before you."

"Yes, father, I have," said she, and she lifted a morsel of bread to her mouth.

"You must take something with you," said he, "or you will be faint in the court. Have you thought how many hours you will be there?"

"I will see to that," said Peregrine, speaking with a stern decision in his voice that was by no means natural to him.

"Will you be there, Perry?" said his mother.

"Of course I shall. I will see that you have what you want. You will find that I will be near you."

"But how will you get in, my boy?" asked his grandfather.

"Let me alone for that. I have spoken to the sheriff already. There is no knowing what may turn up; so if any thing does turn up you may be sure that I am near you."

Then another slight attempt at eating was made, the cup of tea was emptied, and the breakfast was finished. "Is the carriage there, Perry?" asked Mrs. Orme.

"Yes; it is at the door."

"Good-by, father; I am so sorry to have disturbed you."

"Good-by, Edith; God bless you, and give you strength to bear it. And Edith—"

"Sir?"—and she held his hand as he whispered to her.

"Say to her a word of kindness from me—a word of kindness. Tell her that I have forgiven her; but tell her also that man's forgiveness will avail her nothing."

"Yes, father, I will."

"Teach her where to look for pardon. But tell her all the same that I have forgiven her."

And then he handed her into the carriage. Peregrine, as he stood aside, had watched them as they whispered, and to his mind also as he followed them to the carriage a suspicion of what the truth might be now made its way. Surely there would be no need of all this solemn mourning if she were innocent. Had she been esteemed as innocent, Sir Peregrine was not the man to believe that any jury of his countrymen could find her guilty. Had this been the reason for that sudden change—for that breaking off of the intended marriage? Even Peregrine, as he went down the steps after his mother, had begun to suspect the truth; and we may say that he was the last within all that household who did so. During the last week every servant at The Cleeve had whispered to her fellow-servant that Lady Mason had forged the will.

"I shall be near you, mother," said Peregrine as he put his hand into the carriage; "remember that. The judge and the other fellows will go out in the middle of the day to get a glass of wine: I'll have something for both of you near the court."

Poor Mrs. Orme as she pressed her son's hand felt much relieved by the assurance. It was not that she feared any thing, but she was going to a place that was absolutely new to her—to a place in which the eyes of many would be fixed on her—to a place in which the eyes of all would be fixed on the companion with whom she would be joined. Her heart almost sank within her as the carriage drove away. She would be alone till she reached Orley Farm, and there she would take up not only Lady Mason but Mr. Aram also. How would it be with them in that small carriage while Mr. Aram was sitting opposite to them? Mrs. Orme by no means regretted this act of kindness which she was doing, but she began to feel that the task was not a light one. As to Mr. Aram's presence in the carriage, she need have been under no uneasiness. He understood very well when his presence was desirable, and also when it was not desirable.

When she arrived at the door of Orley Farm house she found Mr. Aram waiting there to receive her. "I am sorry to say," said he, raising his hat, "that Lady Mason's son is to accompany us."

"She did not tell me," said Mrs. Orme, not understanding why this should make him sorry.

"It was arranged between them last night, and it is very unfortunate. I can not explain this to her; but perhaps—"

"Why is it unfortunate, Sir?"

"Things will be said which—which—which would drive me mad if they were said about my mother." And immediately there was a touch of sympathy between the high-bred lady and the Old Bailey Jew lawyer.

"Yes, yes," said Mrs. Orme. "It will be dreadful."

"And then if they find her guilty? It may be so, you know. And how is he to sit there and hear the judge's charge, and then the verdict, and the sentence? If he is there he can not escape. I'll tell you what, Mrs. Orme, he should not be there at all."

But what could she do? Had it been possible that she should be an hour alone with Lady Mason, she would have explained all this to her—or if not all, would have explained much of it. But now, with no minutes to spare, how could she make this understood? "But all that will not come to-day, will it, Sir?"

"Not all—not the charge or the verdict. But he should not be there even to-day. He should have gone away, or if he remained at home, he should not have shown himself out of the house."

But this was too late now, for as they were still speaking Lady Mason appeared at the door, leaning on her son's arm. She was dressed from head to foot in black, and over her face there was a thick black veil. Mr. Aram spoke no word further as she stepped up the steps from the hall door to the carriage, but stood back, holding the carriage-door open in his hand. Lucius merely bowed to Mrs. Orme as he assisted his mother to take her place; and then following her, he sat himself down in silence opposite to them. Mr. Aram, who had carefully arranged his own programme, shut the door, and mounted on to the box beside the driver.

Mrs. Orme had held out her own hand, and Lady Mason having taken it still held it after she was seated. Then they started, and for the first mile no word was spoken between them. Mrs. Orme was most anxious to speak, if it might only be for the sake of breaking the horrid stillness of their greeting; but she could think of no word which it would be proper on such an occasion to say, either to Lucius or even before him. Had she been alone with Lady Mason there would have been enough of words that she could have spoken. Sir Peregrine's message was as a burden upon her tongue till she could deliver it; but she could not deliver it while Lucius Mason was sitting by her.

Lady Mason herself was the first to speak. "I did not know yesterday that Lucius would come," she said, "or I should have told you."

"I hope it does not inconvenience you," he said.

"Oh no; by no means."

"I could not let my mother go out without me on such an occasion as this. But I am grateful to you, Mrs. Orme, for coming also."

"I thought it would be better for her to have some lady with her," said Mrs. Orme.

"Oh yes, it is better—much better." And then no further word was spoken by any of them till the carriage drove up to the court-house door. It may be hoped that the journey was less painful to Mr. Aram than to the others, seeing that he solaced himself on the coach-box with a cigar.

There was still a great crowd round the front of the court-house when they reached it, although the doors were open, and the court was already sitting. It had been arranged that this case—the great case of the assize—should come on first on this day, most of the criminal business having been completed on that preceding; and Mr. Aram had promised that his charge should be forthcoming exactly at ten o'clock. Exactly at ten the carriage was driven up to the door, and Mr. Aram, jumping from his seat, directed certain policemen and sheriff's servants to make a way for the ladies up to the door, and through the hall of the court-house. Had he lived in Alston all his life, and spent his days in the purlieus of that court, he could not have been more at home or have been more promptly obeyed.

"And now I think we may go in," he said,

opening the door and letting down the steps with his own hands.

At first he took them into a small room within the building, and then bustled away himself into the court. "I shall be back in half a minute," he said; and in half a dozen half-minutes he was back. "We are all ready now, and shall have no trouble about our places. If you have any thing to leave—shawls, or things of that sort—they will be quite safe here: Mrs Hitcham will look after them." And then an old woman, who had followed Mr. Aram into the room on the last occasion, courtesied to them. But they had nothing to leave, and their little procession was soon made.

Lucius at first offered his arm to his mother, and she had taken it till she had gone through the door into the hall. Mr. Aram also had, with some hesitation, offered his arm to Mrs. Orme; but she, in spite of that touch of sympathy, had managed, without speaking, to decline it. In the hall, however, when all the crowd of gazers had turned their eyes upon them, and was only kept off from pressing on them by the policemen and sheriff's officers, Lady Mason remembered herself, and suddenly dropping her son's arm, she put out her hand for Mrs. Orme. Mr. Aram was now in front of them, and thus they two followed him into the body of the court. The veils of both of them were down; but Mrs. Orme's veil was not more than ordinarily thick, and she could see every thing that was around her. So they walked up through the crowded way, and Lucius followed them by himself.

They were very soon in their seats, the crowd offering them no impediment. The judge was already on the bench—not our old acquaintance Justice Staveley, but his friend and colleague Baron Maltby. Judge Staveley was sitting in the other court. Mrs. Orme and Lady Mason soon found themselves seated on a bench, with a slight standing desk before them, much as though they were seated in a narrow pew. Up above them, on the same seat, were the three barristers employed on Lady Mason's behalf; nearest to the judge was Mr. Furnival; then came Felix Graham, and below him sat Mr. Chaffanbrass, somewhat out of the line of precedence, in order that he might more easily avail himself of the services of Mr. Aram. Lucius found himself placed next to Mr. Chaffanbrass, and his mother sat between him and Mrs. Orme. On the bench below them, immediately facing a large table which was placed in the centre of the court, sat Mr. Aram and his clerk.

Mrs. Orme, as she took her seat, was so confused that she could hardly look around her; and it may be imagined that Lady Mason must have suffered at any rate as much in the same way. But they who were looking at her—and it may be said that every one in the court was looking at her—were surprised to see that she raised her veil as soon as she was seated. She raised her veil, and never lowered it again till she left the court, and repassed out into the hall. She had thought much of this day—even of the little incidents which would occur—and she was aware that her identification would be necessary. Nobody should tell her to unveil herself, nor would she let it be thought that she was afraid to face her enemies. So there she sat during the whole day, bearing the gaze of the court.

She had dressed herself with great care. It may be said of most women who could be found in such a situation, that they would either give no special heed to their dress on such a morning, or that they would appear in garments of sorrow studiously unbecoming and lachrymose, or that they would attempt to outface the world, and have appeared there in bright trappings, fit for happier days. But Lady Mason had dressed herself after none of these fashions. Never had her clothes been better made, or worn with a better grace; but they were all black, from her bonnet-ribbon down to her boot, and were put on without any attempt at finery or smartness. As regards dress, she had never looked better than she did now; and Mr. Furnival, when his eye caught her as she turned her head round toward the judge, was startled by the grace of her appearance. Her face was very pale, and somewhat hard; but no one on looking at it could say that it was the countenance of a woman overcome either by sorrow or by crime. She was perfect mistress of herself, and as she looked round the court, not with defiant gaze, but with eyes half raised, and a look of modest but yet conscious intelligence, those around her hardly dared to think that she could be guilty.

As she thus looked her gaze fell on one face that she had not seen for years, and their eyes met. It was the face of Joseph Mason, of Groby, who sat opposite to her, and as she looked at him her own countenance did not quail for a moment. Her own countenance did not quail; but his eyes fell gradually down, and when he raised them again she had averted her face.

MARGINALIA, BY JOHN ADAMS.

THE following Marginalia are copied from books in the library of JOHN ADAMS, second President of the United States; and were all found in his own handwriting, some of them being written after he had arrived at a great age.

I.—NOTES WRITTEN IN CONDORCET ON THE MIND.

"God has established no equality among men in practice or theory, but a moral equality. The giant has a natural right to his stature of eight feet, and his strength equal to 500 lbs.; and the dwarf to his three feet, and his strength equal to 50 lbs."

"Aug. 14, 1811. This book is more learned and entertaining than the Sophiometer of John Stewart, the pedestrian traveler, which I received from him in England, three days ago, but not much more solid."

"The Logos of Plato, the Ratio of Manlius, and the Mind of Condorcet, all plausible and specious as they are, will be, three thousand year longer, more delusive than useful. Not one of them takes human nature as it is for his foundation. Equality is one of those equivocal words which the philosophy of the eighteenth century has made fraudulent. The word, as it is used, is a swindler. In the last twenty-five years it has cheated millions out of their lives, and tens of millions out of their property."

"The public mind was improving in knowledge, and the public heart in humanity, equity, and benevolence. The fragments of Feudality, the Inquisition, the Rack, the Cruelty of Punishments, Negro Slavery, were giving way. But the Philosophers must arrive at perfection per saltum. Ten times more furious than Jack in the Tale of a Tub, they rent and tore the whole government to pieces, and left not one thread in it. They have been compelled to resort to Napoleon, and Gibbon himself became an advocate of the Inquisition. What an amiable and glorious Equality, Fraternity, and Liberty they have established in Europe!"

II.—NOTES WRITTEN IN "THE SOCIAL COMPACT" OF ROUSSEAU.

[On the fly-leaf.] "Jean Jac! Thou art eloquent, brilliant, profound; but wild, whimsical, chimerical—in one word, injudicious—more wit than sense—more fancy than judgment—more eloquence than reason—more elegance and harmony than solidity. Thou hast many good ideas borrowed from English writers, especially Sidney and Locke; but this work is not well digested."

A whole people never can be corrupted, but they may be often mistaken, and it is in such a case only that they appear to seek their own disadvantage.—Rousseau.

"May not a majority be corrupt?"

There is often a considerable difference between the will of all the members and the general will of the whole body; and the latter regards only the common interest, the other respects the private interests of individuals, and is the aggregated sum of their particular wills; but if we take from this sum those contradictory wills that mutually destroy each other, the sum of the remaining differences is the general will.—Rousseau.

"This is too witty or too mathematical to be clear."

It is requisite, therefore, in order that each resolution may be dictated by the general will, that no such partial societies shall be formed in a State, and that each citizen should think for himself.—Rousseau.

"Not very accurate, nor quite intelligible."

In the most flourishing age of Rome that city suffered under flagitious acts of tyranny, and beheld itself on the brink of ruin for having intrusted the sovereign power and the legislative authority to the same hands.—Rousseau.

"Inaccurate."

I can not but surmise that the little island of Corsica will, one day or other, be the astonishment of Europe.—Rousseau.

"It has been, and it is!"

No one citizen should be rich enough to buy another; and none should be so poor as to be obliged to sell himself. This supposes a moderation of possessions and credit on the side of the great, and the moderation of desires and covetousness on the part of the little.—Rousseau.

"But when or where did such moderation ever exist? Absolutely never, where riches existed."

Would you give a State consistency and strength, prevent the two extremes as much as possible; let there be no rich men nor beggars.—Rousseau.

"What becomes of the commandment, 'Thou shalt not steal?' Must you steal from the rich men their property and give it to the beggars? Property! property!—that is the difficulty. Without property there would be no rich men to be sure—but there would not be fewer beggars for that."

Remain barbarous and illiterate; you will live the more at ease, and be, perhaps, more virtuous, assuredly more happy.—Rousseau.

"The ease is doubted; and the virtue and happiness denied."

A nation is in any case at liberty to change even the best law when it pleases; for if the people have a mind even to do themselves an injury, who hath a right to prevent them?—Rousseau.

"These cases may be pushed too far. A great way. Who has a right to prevent a madman from hurting himself?"

Every citizen should live in a state of perfect independence on all the rest, and in a state of the greatest dependence on the city.—Rousseau.

"An admirable maxim of government and liberty."

It is the power of the State only that constitutes the liberty of its members.—Rousseau.

"A principle of liberty not so well relished as his doctrine of equality by the populace."

III.—MEMORANDUM IN GIBBON.

If the French nation had been contented with a liberal translation of our system, if they had respected the prerogatives of the crown, and the privileges of the nobles, they might have raised a solid fabric on the only true foundation, the natural aristocracy.—Gibbon to Lord Sheffield.

"These sentiments are so exactly mine that I know this was derived from my book."

IV.—NOTES IN BRYANT'S MYTHOLOGY.

[These are very numerous, and only a selection is given.]

The later Greek antiquaries and historians condescended to quote innumerable authors, and some of great antiquity; to whom the pride of Greece never would have appealed.—Dissert. on the Hellad. Writers.

"Can accident alone account for the perdition of all these writers?"

The most dry and artless historians are in general the most authentic.—Same.

"Is not Rapin more authentic than Hume?"

Diodorus, Josephus, Cedrenus, Syncellus, Zonaras, and numberless more, are crowded with extracts from the most curious and most ancient histories.—Diss. on Hellad.

"Have all these authors been destroyed by accident or design. Superstition, priestcraft, and despotism have been burning fiery furnaces for offensive books in all ages down to the missionary who boasted that he burned manuscripts in India. Man! how long will you continue to put out your own eyes—to be your own willful deceiver, tempter, and tormentor?"

It is said of Pythagoras and Solon that they resided for some time in Egypt, where the former was instructed by a Sen-chen or priest. But I could never hear of any great good that was the consequences of his travels.—Diss. on Hellad.

"Pythagoras and Plato resided in Greece—so did Solon. But neither dared to tell the Greeks the truth. Priests and demagogues were as popular in Greece as elsewhere, and as dangerous. Socrates felt their power."

The Athenians were greatly affected by the example of the Asiatic Greeks. They awoke, as it were, out of a long and deep sleep, and as if they had been in the training of science for ages.—Diss. on Hellad.

"Such perfection is not attained in a moment."

The Greeks had no love for any thing genuine, no desire to be instructed. Their history could not be reformed but by an acknowledgment which their pride would not suffer them to make.—Diss. on Hellad.

"This may be said of all nations. No wonder Solon, Pythagoras, and Plato did not tell them the truth."

They (the Greeks) went so far as to deem inquiry a crime, and thus precluded the only means by which the truth could be obtained.—Myth., i., 154.

"Just so now (1817)."

Such were the principles that gave birth to the mythology of the Grecians; from which their ancient history is in great measure derived.—Myth., i., 163.

"What a mass of testimony of the willful ignorance and falsification of the Greeks!"

Among those who have given a list of the Argive Kings is Tatianus Assyrius, who advises every person of sense, when he meets with these high pretensions, to consider attentively that there was not even a single voucher, not even a tradition of any record to authenticate these histories.—Myth., i., 165.

"Vouchers or not, it is not possible to account for the language of Homer without the supposition of nations of great antiquity before him. These Kings may have existed."

Herodotus informs us that Amphitritus was a diviner of Acharnan, and that he came to Pisistratus with a commission from heaven. By this he induced the prince to prosecute a scheme which he recommended.—Myth., i., 257.

"So did Christopher Macpherson, Parson Austin, and Abraham Brown come to me; but they never induced me to prosecute any scheme which they recommended."

The narrow strait into the Euxine Sea was a passage of difficult navigation. This is the reason that upon each side were temples, and sacred columns erected to the deity of the country to obtain his assistance. And there is room to think that the pillars and obelisks were made use of for beacons, and that every temple was a Pharos.—Myth., i., 262.

"The tower at Corunna? Has this monument ever been examined? I have seen it, and wondered at its obscurity among the learned."

Among the Hebrews, the word Iōnas signifies a revealer of the will, or the voice of the Most High; also a pigeon or dove.—Myth., ii., p. 294.

"I wonder not that a pigeon brought down the vial of holy oil to Rheims."

The person who escaped the deluge, being a messenger of the Deity and an interpreter of His will, was, in consequence of these properties, particularly represented by the dove, Iōnah.—Myth., ii., 299.

"The dove, John, after whom, it seems, I have the honor to be named. How deep a thinker thou art, my friend Bryant! Thy name has been familiar to me from my infancy; thy person has been known, esteemed, and revered by me, and I have a grandson-in-law who bears thy name. From these materials you could build a system, and so could I. But I do not believe that the salvation of the human race depends upon a critical decision of all the questions between Bryant, Jones, Gibelin, and Dupuis."

It is said of the Patriarch, after the deluge, that he became a man of earth, or husbandman.—Myth., ii., 300.

"Noah a farmer! Salve, Frater, Man of Earth!"

The confusion of language was a partial event; the whole of mankind are by no means to be included in the dispersion from Babel.... It related chiefly to the sons of Chus, whose intention was to have founded a great, if not a universal empire; but by this judgment their purpose was defeated.—Myth., iii., 28.

"Americans! have a care. Form no scheme of Universal Empire! The Lord will always come down and defeat all such projects."

All the best architecture in Greece may be traced to its original in Egypt.—Myth., iii., 300.

"See even the Catholic and classical priest, Eustace."

Isaiah, xix., 14: The Lord hath mingled a perverse spirit in the midst of Egypt, etc.—Myth., iii., 303.

"A little like Voltaire; but his censures were universal—the Prophet's only particular. There are the prophecies of common sense as well as of divine wisdom. THE RUIN OF A DIVIDED PEOPLE IS A THING OF COURSE! One Deity, the sublimest, profoundest of all philosophy, all religion, all policy, all manners! What circumstance in antiquity is not attended with some absurdity?"

The priests of Egypt delighted in obscurity.—BRYANT, Myth, iii., 531.

"And so have all priests."

MISTRESS AND MAID.

A HOUSEHOLD STORY.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "JOHN HALIFAX, GENTLEMAN."

CHAPTER XIV.

WHEN Miss Hilary reached home, Elizabeth opened the door to her; the parlor was deserted.

Miss Leaf had gone to lie down, and Miss Selina was away to see the Lord Mayor's Show with Mr. Peter Ascott.

"With Mr. Peter Ascott!" Hilary was a little surprised; but on second thoughts she found it natural; Selina was glad of any amusement—to her, not only the narrowness but the dullness of their poverty was inexpressibly galling. "She will be back to dinner, I suppose?"

"I don't know," said Elizabeth, briefly.

Had Miss Hilary been less preoccupied, she would have noticed something not quite right about the girl—something that at any other time would have aroused the direct question, "What is the matter, Elizabeth?" For Miss Hilary did not consider it beneath her dignity to observe that things might occasionally go wrong with this solitary young woman, away from her friends, and exposed to all the annoyances of London lodgings; that many trifles might happen to worry and perplex her. If the mistress could not set them right, she could at least give the word of kindly sympathy, as precious to "a poor servant" as to the Queen on her throne.

This time, however, it came not, and Elizabeth disappeared below stairs immediately.

The girl was revolving in her own mind a difficult ethical question. To-day, for the first time in her life, she had not "told Miss Hilary every thing." Two things had happened, and she could not make up her mind as to whether she ought to communicate them.

Now Elizabeth had a conscience, by nature a very tender one, and which, from circumstances, had been cultivated into a much higher sensitiveness than, alas! is common among her class, or, indeed, in any class. This, if an error, was Miss Hilary's doing: it probably caused Elizabeth a few more miseries, and vexations, and painful shocks in the world than she would have had had she imbibed only the ordinary tone of morality, especially the morality of ordinary domestic servants; but it was an error upon which, in summing up her life, the Recording Angel would gravely smile.

The first trial had happened at breakfast-time. Ascott, descending earlier than his wont, had asked her, Did any gentleman, short and dirty, with a hooked-nose, inquire for him yesterday?

Elizabeth thought a minute, and recollected that some person answering the above not too flattering description had called, but refused to leave his name, saying he did not know the ladies, but was a particular friend of Mr. Leaf's.

Ascott laughed. "So he is—a very particular friend; but my aunts would not fancy him, and I don't want him to come here. Say, if he calls, that I'm gone out of town."

"Very well, Sir. Shall you start before dinner?" said Elizabeth, whose practical mind immediately recurred to that meal, and to the joint, always contrived to be hot on the days that Ascott dined at home.

He seemed excessively tickled. "Bless you, you are the greatest innocent! Just say what I tell you, and never mind—hush! here's Aunt Hilary."

And Miss Hilary's anxious face, white with long wakefulness, had put out of Elizabeth's head the answer that was coming; indeed the matter slipped from her mind altogether, in consequence of another circumstance which gave her much more perplexity.

During her young mistress's absence, supposing Miss Selina out too, and Miss Leaf up stairs, she had come suddenly into the parlor without knocking. There, to her amazement, she saw Miss Selina and Mr. Ascott standing, in close conversation, over the fire. They were so engrossed that they did not notice her, and she shut the door again immediately. But what confounded her was, that she was certain, absolutely certain, Mr. Ascott had his arm round Miss Selina's waist!

Now that was no business of hers, and yet the faithful domestic was a good deal troubled; still more so, when, by Miss Leaf's excessive surprise at hearing of the visitor who had come and gone, carrying Miss Selina away to the city, she was certain the elder sister was completely in the dark as to any thing going to happen in the family.

Could it be a wedding? Could Miss Selina really love, and be intending to marry, that horrid little man? For, strange to say, this young servant had, what many a young beauty of rank and fashion has not, or has lost forever—the true, pure, womanly creed, that loving and marrying are synonymous terms; that to let a man put his arm round your waist when you do not intend to marry him, or to intend to marry him for money or any thing else when you do not really love him, are things quite impossible and incredible to any womanly mind. A creed somewhat out of date, and perhaps existing only in stray nooks of the world; but, thank God! it does exist. Hilary had it, and she had taught it to Elizabeth.

"I wonder whether Miss Hilary knows of this? I wonder what she would say to it?"

And now arose the perplexing ethical question aforesaid, as to whether Elizabeth ought to tell her.

It was one of Miss Hilary's doctrines—the same for the kitchen as for the parlor, nay, preached strongest in the kitchen, where the mysteries of the parlor are often so cruelly exposed—that a secret accidentally found out should be kept as sacred as if actually confided; also, that the secret of an enemy should no more be betrayed than that of a beloved and trusting friend.

"Miss Selina isn't my enemy," smiled Elizabeth; "but I'm not overfond of her, and so I'd rather not tell of her, or vex her if I can help it. Any how, I'll keep it to myself for a bit."

But the secret weighed heavily upon her, and besides, her honest heart felt a certain diminution of respect for Miss Selina. What could she see to like in that common-looking, commonplace man, whom she could not have met a dozen times, of whose domestic life she knew nothing, and whose personality Elizabeth, with the sharp observation often found in her class, probably because coarse people do not care to hide their coarseness from servants, had speedily set down at her own valuation—"Neither carriage nor horses, nor nothing, will ever make him a gentleman!"

He, however, sent Miss Selina home magnificently in the said carriage; Ascott with her, who had been picked up somewhere in the City, and who came in to his dinner, without the slightest reference to going "out of town."

But in spite of her Lord Mayor's Show, and the great attention which she said she had received from "various members of the Common Council of the City of London," Miss Selina was, for her, meditative, and did not talk quite so much as usual. There was in the little parlor an uncomfortable atmosphere, as if all of them had something on their minds. Hilary felt the ice must be broken, and if she did not do it nobody else would. So she said, stealing her hand into Johanna's, under shelter of the dim fire-light,

"Selina, I wanted to have a little family consultation. I have just received an offer."

"An offer!" repeated Miss Selina, with a visible start. "Oh, I forgot; you went to see your friend, Miss Balquidder, this morning. Did you get any thing out of her? Has she any nephews and nieces wanting a governess?"

"She has no relations at all. But I will just tell you the story of my visit."

"I hope it's interesting," said Ascott, who was lying on the sofa, half asleep, his general habit after dinner. He woke, however, during his Aunt Hilary's relation, and when she reached its climax, that the offer was for her to manage a stationer's shop, he burst out, heartily laughing:

"Well, that is a rich idea. I'll come and buy of you. You'll look so pretty standing behind a counter."

But Selina said, angrily, "You can not even think of such a thing. It would be a disgrace to the family."

"No," said Hilary, clasping tightly her eldest sister's hand—they two had already talked the matter over: "I can not see any disgrace. If our family is so poor that the women must earn their living as well as the men, all we have to see is that it should be honestly earned. What do you say, Ascott?"

She looked earnestly at him; she wanted sorely to find out what he really thought.

But Ascott took it, as he did every thing, very easily. "I don't see why Aunt Selina should make such a fuss. Why need you do any thing, Aunt Hilary? Can't we hold out a little longer, and live upon tick till I get into practice? Of course, I shall then take care of you all; I'm the head of the family. How horridly dark this room is!"

He started up, and gave the fire a fierce poke, which consumed in five minutes a large lump of coal that Hilary had hoped—oh, cruel, sordid economy—would have lasted half the evening.

She broke the uneasy silence which followed by asking Johanna to give her opinion.

Johanna roused herself and spoke:

"Ascott says right; he is the head of the family, and, by-and-by, I trust will take care of us all. But he is not able to do it now, and meantime we must live."

"To be sure we must, Auntie."

"I mean, my boy, we must live honestly; we must not run into debt:" and her voice sharpened as with the reflected horror of her young days—if, alas! there ever had been any youth for Henry Leaf's eldest daughter. "No, Ascott, out of debt out of danger. For myself"—she laid her thin old fingers on his arm, and looked up at him with a pitiful mixture of reliance and hopelessness—"I would rather see you breaking stones in the road than living like a gentleman, as you call it, and a swindler, as I call it, upon other people's money."

Ascott sprang up, coloring violently. "You use strong language, Aunt Johanna. Never mind. I dare say you are right. However, it's no business of mine. Good-night, for I have an engagement."

Hilary said, gravely, she wished he would stay and join in the family consultation.

"Oh no; I hate talking over things. Settle it among yourselves. As I said, it isn't my business."

"You don't care, then, what becomes of us all? I sometimes begin to think so."

Struck by the tone, Ascott stopped in the act of putting on his lilac kid gloves. "What have I done? I may be a very bad fellow, but I'm not quite so bad as that, Aunt Hilary."

"She didn't mean it, my boy," said Aunt Johanna, tenderly.

He was moved, more by the tenderness than the reproach. He came and kissed his eldest aunt in that warm-hearted, impulsive way which had won him forgiveness for many a boyish fault. It did so now.

"I know I'm not half good enough to you, Auntie, but I mean to be. I mean to work hard, and be a rich man some day; and then you may be sure I shall not let my Aunt Hilary keep a shop. Now, good-night, for I must meet a fellow on business—really business—that may turn out good for us all, I assure you.”

He went away whistling, with that air of untroubled, good-natured liveliness peculiar to Ascott Leaf, which made them say continually that he was “only a boy,” living a boy’s life, as thoughtless and as free. When his handsome face disappeared the three women sat down again round the fire.

They made no comments on him whatever; they were women, and he was their own. But—passing him over as if he had never existed—Hilary began to explain to her sisters all particulars of her new scheme for maintaining the family. She told these details in a matter-of-fact way, as already arranged; and finally hoped Selina would make no more objections.

“It is a thing quite impossible,” said Selina, with dignity.

“Why impossible? I can certainly do the work; and it can not make me less of a lady. Besides, we had better not be ladies if we can not be honest ones. And, Selina, where is the money to come from? We have none in the house; we can not get any till Christmas.”

“Opportunities might occur. We have friends.”

“Not one in London; except, perhaps, Mr. Ascott, and I would not ask him for a farthing. You don’t see, Selina, how horrible it would be to be helped, unless by some one dearly loved. I couldn’t bear it! I’d rather beg, starve; almost steal!”

“Don’t be violent, child.”

“Oh, but it’s hard!” and the cry of long-smothered pain burst out. “Hard enough to have to earn one’s bread in a way one doesn’t like; harder still to have to be parted from Johanna from Monday morning till Saturday night. But it must be. I’ll go. It’s a case between hunger, debt, and work; the first is unpleasant, the second impossible, the third is my only alternative. You must consent, Selina, for I will do it.”

“Don’t!” Selina spoke more gently, and not without some natural emotion. “Don’t disgrace me, child; for I may as well tell you—I meant to do so to-night—Mr. Ascott has made me an offer of marriage, and I—I have accepted it.”

Had a thunder-bolt fallen in the middle of the parlor at No. 15, its inmates—that is, two of them—could not have been more astounded.

No doubt this surprise was a great instance of simplicity on their part. Many women would have prognosticated, planned the thing from the first; thought it a most excellent match; seen glorious visions of the house in Russell Square, of the wealth and luxury that would be the portion of “dear Selina,” and the general benefit that the marriage would be to the whole Leaf family.

But these two were different from others. They only saw their sister Selina, a woman no longer young, and not without her peculiarities, going to be married to a man she knew little or nothing about—a man whom they themselves had endured rather than liked, and for the sake of gratitude. He was trying enough merely as a chance visitor; but to look upon Mr. Ascott as a brother-in-law, as a husband—

“Oh, Selina! you can not be in earnest?”

“Why not? Why should I not be married as well as my neighbors?” said she, sharply.

Nobody arguing that point, both being indeed too bewildered to argue at all, she continued, majestically,

“I assure you, sisters, there could not be a more unexceptionable offer. It is true, Mr. Ascott’s origin was rather humble; but I can overlook that. In his present wealth, and with his position and character, he will make the best of husbands.”

Not a word was answered; what could be answered? Selina was free to marry if she liked, and whom she liked. Perhaps, from her nature, it was idle to expect her to marry in any other way than this; one of the thousand and one unions where the man desires a handsome, lady-like wife for the head of his establishment, and the woman wishes an elegant establishment to be mistress of; so they strike a bargain—possibly as good as most other bargains.

Still, with one faint lingering of hope, Hilary asked if she had quite decided.

“Quite. He wrote to me last night, and I gave him his answer this morning.”

Selina certainly had not troubled any body with her “love affairs.” It was entirely a matter of business.

The sisters saw at once that she had made up her mind. Henceforward there could be no criticism of Mr. Peter Ascott.

Now all was told, she talked freely of her excellent prospects.

“He has behaved handsomely—very much so. He makes a good settlement on me, and says how happy he will be to help my family, so as to enable you always to make a respectable appearance.”

“We are exceedingly obliged to him.”

“Don’t be sharp, Hilary. He means well. And he must feel that this marriage is a sort of—ahem! condescension on my part, which I never should have dreamed of twenty years ago.”

Selina sighed: could it be at the thought of that twenty years ago? Perhaps, shallow as she seemed, this woman might once have had some fancy, some ideal man whom she expected to meet and marry; possibly a very different sort of man from Mr. Peter Ascott. However, the sigh was but momentary; she plunged back again into all the arrangements of her wedding, every one of which, down to the wedding-dress, she had evidently decided.

“And therefore you see,” she added, as if the unimportant, almost forgotten item of discussion had suddenly occurred to her, “it’s quite impossible that my sister should keep a shop. I shall tell Mr. Ascott, and you will see what he says to it.”

But when Mr. Ascott appeared next day in solemn state as an accepted lover, he seemed to care very little about the matter. He thought it was a good thing for every body to be independent; did not see why young women—he begged pardon, young ladies—should not earn their own bread if they liked. He only wished that the shop were a little further off than Kensington, and hoped the name of Leaf would not be put over the door.

But the bride-elect, indignant and annoyed, begged her lover to interfere, and prevent the scheme from being carried out.

“Don’t vex yourself, my dear Selina,” said he, dryly—how Hilary started to hear this stranger use the household name—“but I can’t see that it’s my business to interfere. I marry you; I don’t marry your whole family.”

“Mr. Ascott is quite right; we will end the subject,” said Johanna, with grave dignity: while Hilary sat with burning cheeks, thinking that, miserable as the family had been, it had never till now known real degradation.

But her heart was very sore that day. In the morning had come the letter from India, never omitted, never delayed; Robert Lyon was punctual as clock-work in every thing he did. It came, but this month it was a short and somewhat sad letter—hinting of failing health, uncertain prospects; full of a bitter longing to come home, and a dread that it would be years before that longing was realized.

“My only consolation is,” he wrote, for once betraying himself a little, “that however hard my life out here may be, I bear it alone.”

But that consolation was not so easy to Hilary. That they two should be wasting their youth apart, when just a little heap of yellow coins—of which men like Mr. Ascott had such profusion—would bring them together; and, let trials be many or poverty hard, give them the unutterable joy of being once more face to face and heart to heart—oh, it was sore, sore!

Yet when she went up from the parlor, where the newly-affianced couple sat together, “making-believe” a passion that did not exist, and acting out the sham courtship, proper for the gentleman to pay and the lady to receive—when she shut her bedroom door, and there, sitting in the cold, read again and again Robert Lyon’s letter to Johanna, so good, so honest; so sad, yet so bravely enduring—Hilary was comforted. She felt that true love, in its most unsatisfied longings, its most cruel delays, nay, even its sharpest agonies of hopeless separation, is sweeter ten thousand times than the most “respectable” of loveless marriages such as this.

So, at the week’s end, Hilary went patiently to her work at Kensington, and Selina began the preparations for her wedding.

She was a person easy enough to be overlooked. She never put herself forward, not even now, when Miss Hilary’s absence caused the weight of housekeeping and domestic management to fall chiefly upon her. She went about her duties as soberly and silently as she had done in her girlhood; even Miss Leaf could not draw her into much demonstrativeness: she was one of those people who never “come out” till they are strongly needed, and then— But it remained to be proved what this girl would be.

Years afterward Hilary remembered with what a curious reticence Elizabeth used to go about in those days: how she remained as old-fashioned as ever; acquired no London ways, no fripperies of dress or flippancies of manner. Also, that she never complained of any thing; though the discomforts of her lodging-house life must have been great—greater than her mistresses had any idea of at the time. Slowly, out of her rough, unpliant girlhood, was forming that character of self-reliance and self-control, which, in all ranks, makes of some women the helpers rather than the helped, the laborers rather than the pleasure-seekers; women whose constant lot it seems to be to walk on the shadowed side of life, to endure rather than to enjoy.

Elizabeth had very little actual enjoyment. She made no acquaintances, and never asked for holidays. Indeed she did not seem to care for any. Her great treat was when, on a Sunday afternoon, Miss Hilary sometimes took her to Westminster Abbey or St. Paul’s; when her pleasure and gratitude always struck her mistress—nay, even soothed her, and won her from her own many anxieties. It is such a blessing to be able to make any other human being, even for an hour or two, entirely happy!

Except these bright Sundays, Elizabeth’s whole time was spent in waiting upon Miss Leaf, who had seemed to grow suddenly frail and old. It might be that living without her child six days out of the seven was a greater trial than had at first appeared to the elder sister, who until now had never parted with her since she was born; or it was perhaps a more commonplace and yet natural cause, the living in London lodgings, without even a change of air from room to room; and the want of little comforts and luxuries, which, with all Hilary’s care, were as impossible as ever to their limited means.

For Selina’s engagement, which, as a matter of decorum, she had insisted should last six months, did not lessen expenses. Old gowns were shabby, and omnibuses impossible to the future Mrs. Ascott of Russell Square; and though, to do her justice, she spent as little as to her self-pleasing nature was possible, still she spent something.

“It’s the last; I shall never cost you any more,” she would say, complacently; and revert to that question of absorbing interest, her trousseau, an extremely handsome one, provided liberally by Mr. Ascott. Sorely had this arrangement jarred upon the pride of the Leaf family; yet it was inevitable. But no personal favors

CHAPTER XV.

IN relating so much about her mistresses, I have lately seemed to overlook Elizabeth Hand.

would the other two sisters have accepted from Mr. Ascott, even had he offered them—which he did not—save a dress each for the marriage, and a card for the marriage-breakfast, which, he also arranged, was to take place at a hotel.

So, in spite of the expected wedding, there was little change in the dull life that went on at No. 15. Its only brightness was when Miss Hilary came home from Saturday to Monday. And in those brief glimpses, when, as was natural, she on her side, and they on theirs, put on their best face, so to speak, each trying to hide from the other any special care, it so fell out that Miss Hilary never discovered a thing which, week by week, Elizabeth resolved to speak to her about, and yet never could. For it was not her own affair; it seemed like presumptuously meddling in the affairs of the family. Above all, it involved the necessity of something which looked like tale-bearing and backbiting of a person she disliked, and there was in Elizabeth—servant as she was—an instinctive chivalrous honor which made her especially anxious to be just to her enemies.

Enemy, however, is a large word to use; and yet day by day her feelings grew more bitter toward the person concerned—namely, Mr. Ascott Leaf. It was not from any badness in him: he was the sort of young man always likely to be a favorite with what would be termed his "inferiors;" easy, good-tempered, and gentlemanly, giving a good deal of trouble certainly, but giving it so agreeably that few servants would have grumbled, and paying for it—as he apparently thought every thing could be paid for—with a pleasant word and a handful of silver.

But Elizabeth's distaste for him had deeper roots. The principal one was his exceeding indifference to his aunts' affairs, great and small, from the marriage, which he briefly designated as a "jolly lark," to the sharp economies which, even with the addition of Miss Hilary's salary, were still requisite. None of these latter did he ever seem to notice, except when they pressed upon himself; when he neither scolded nor argued, but simply went out and avoided them.

He was now absent from home more than ever, and apparently tried as much as possible to keep the household in the dark as to his movements—leaving at uncertain times, never saying what hour he would be back, or if he said so, never keeping to his word. This was the more annoying as there were a number of people continually inquiring for him, hanging about the house, and waiting to see him "on business;" and some of these occasionally commented on the young gentleman in such unflattering terms that Elizabeth was afraid they would reach the ear of Mrs. Jones, and henceforward tried always to attend to the door herself.

But Mrs. Jones was a wide-awake woman. She had not let lodgings for thirty years for nothing. Ere long she discovered, and took good care to inform Elizabeth of her discovery, that Mr. Ascott Leaf was what is euphuistically termed "in difficulties."

And here one word, lest in telling this poor lad's story I may be supposed to tell it harshly or uncharitably, as if there was no crime greater than that which a large portion of society seems to count as none; as if, at the merest mention of the ugly word debt, this rabid author flew out, and made all the ultra-virtuous persons whose history is here told, fly out, like turkeys after a bit of red cloth, which is a very harmless scrap of red cloth after all.

Most true, some kind of debt deserves only compassion. The merchant suddenly failing; the tenderly reared family who by some strange blunder or unkind kindness have been kept in ignorance of their real circumstances, and been spending pounds for which there was only pence to pay; the individuals, men or women, who, without any laxity of principle, are such utter children in practice, that they have to learn the value and use of money by hard experience, much as a child does, and are little better than children in all that concerns L. S. D. to the end of their days.

But these are debtors by accident, not error. The deliberate debtor, who orders what he knows he has no means of paying for; the pleasure-loving debtor, who can not renounce one single luxury for conscience' sake; the well-meaning, lazy debtor, who might make "ends meet," but does not, simply because he will not take the trouble; upon such as these it is right to have no mercy—they deserve none.

To which of these classes young Ascott Leaf belonged his story will show. I tell it, or rather let it tell itself, and point its own moral; it is the story of hundreds and thousands.

That a young fellow should not enjoy his youth would be hard; that it should not be pleasant to him to dress well, live well, and spend with open hand upon himself as well as others, no one will question. No one would ever wish it otherwise. Many a kindly spendthrift of twenty-one makes a prudent paterfamilias at forty, while a man who in his twenties showed a purposeless niggardliness, would at sixty grow into the most contemptible miser alive. There is something even in the thoughtless liberality of youth to which one's heart warms, even while one's wisdom reproves. But what struck Elizabeth was that Ascott's liberalities were always toward himself, and himself only.

Sometimes when she took in a parcel of new clothes, while others yet unpaid for were tossing in wasteful disorder about his room, or when she cleaned indefinite pairs of handsome boots, and washed dozens of the finest cambric pocket-handkerchiefs, her spirit grew hot within her to remember Miss Hilary's countless wants and contrivances in the matter of dress, and all the little domestic comforts which Miss Leaf's frail health required—things which never once seemed to cross the nephew's imagination. Of course not, it will be said; how could a young man be expected to trouble himself about these things?

But they do though. Answer, many a widow's son; many a heedful brother of orphan sisters; many a solitary clerk living and paying his way upon the merest pittance; is it not better to think of others than one's self? Can a man, even a young man, find his highest happiness in mere personal enjoyment?

However, let me cease throwing these pebbles of preaching under the wheels of my story; as it moves on it will preach enough for itself.

Elizabeth's annoyances, suspicions, and conscience-pricks as to whether she ought or ought not to communicate both, came to an end at last. Gradually she made up her mind that, even if it did look like tale-bearing, on the following Saturday night Miss Hilary must know all.

It was an anxious week; for Miss Leaf had fallen ill. Not seriously: and she never complained until her sister had left, when she returned to her bed and did not again rise. She would not have Miss Hilary sent for, nor Miss Selina, who was away paying a ceremonious pre-nuptial visit to Mr. Ascott's partner's wife at Dulwich.

"I don't want any thing that you can not do for me. You are becoming a first-rate nurse, Elizabeth," she said, with that passive, peaceful smile which almost frightened the girl; it seemed as if she were slipping away from this world and all its cares into another existence. Elizabeth felt that to tell her any thing about her nephew's affairs was perfectly impossible. How thankful she was that in the quiet of the sick-room her mistress was kept in ignorance of the knocks and inquiries at the door, and especially of a certain ominous paper which had fallen into Mrs. Jones's hands, and informed her, as she took good care to inform Elizabeth, that any day "the bailiffs" might be after her young master.

"And the sooner the whole set of you clear out of my house the better; I am a decent, respectable woman," said Mrs. Jones, that very morning; and Elizabeth had had to beg her as a favor not to disturb her sick mistress, but to wait one day, till Miss Hilary came home.

Also, when Ascott, ending with a cheerful and careless countenance his ten minutes' after-breakfast chat in his aunt's room, had met Elizabeth on the staircase, he had stopped to bid her say if any body wanted him he was gone to Birmingham, and would not be home till Monday. And on Elizabeth's hesitating, she having determined to tell no more of these involuntary lies, he had been very angry, and then stooped to entreaties, begging her to do as he asked, or it would be the ruin of him. Which she understood well enough when, all the day, she—grown painfully wise, poor girl!—watched a Jewish-looking man hanging about the house, and noticing every body that went in or out of it.

Now, sitting at Miss Leaf's window, she fancied she saw this man disappear into the gin-palace opposite, and at the same moment a figure darted hurriedly round the street-corner, and into the door of No. 15.

Elizabeth looked to see if her mistress were asleep, and then crept quietly out of the room, shutting the door after her. Listening, she heard the sound of the latch-key, and of some one coming stealthily up stairs.

"Hollo!—Oh, it's only you, Elizabeth."

"Shall I light your candle, Sir?"

But when she did the sight was not pleasant. Drenched with rain, his collar pulled up, and his hat slouched, so as in some measure to act as a disguise, breathless and trembling—hardly any body would have recognized in this discreditable object that gentlemanly young man, Mr. Ascott Leaf.

He staggered into his room and threw himself across the bed.

"Do you want any thing, Sir?" said Elizabeth, from the door.

"No—yes—stay a minute. Elizabeth, are you to be trusted?"

"I hope I am, Sir."

"The bailiffs are after me. I've just dodged them. If they know I'm here the game's all up—and it will kill my aunt."

Shocked as she was, Elizabeth was glad to hear him say that—glad to see the burst of real emotion with which he flung himself down on the pillow, muttering all sorts of hopeless self-accusations.

"Come, Sir, 'tis no use taking on so," said she, much as she would have spoken to a child, for there was something childish rather than man-like in Ascott's distress. Nevertheless, she pitied him, with the unreasoning pity a kind heart gives to any creature who, blameworthy or not, has fallen into trouble. "What do you mean to do?"

"Nothing. I'm cleaned out. And I haven't a friend in the world."

He turned his face to the wall in perfect despair.

Elizabeth tried hard not to sit in judgment upon what the catechism would call her "betters;" and yet her own strong instinct of almost indefinite endurance turned with something approaching contempt from this weak, lightsome nature, broken by the first touch of calamity.

"Come, it's no use making things worse than they are. If nobody knows that you are here, lock your door and keep quiet. I'll bring you some dinner when I bring up Missis's tea, and not even Mrs. Jones will be any the wiser."

"You're a brick, Elizabeth—a regular brick!" cried the young fellow, brightening up at the least relief. "That will be capital. Get me a good slice of beef, or ham, or something. And mind you, don't forget!—a regular stunning bottle of pale ale."

"Very well, Sir."

The acquiescence was somewhat sullen, and had he watched Elizabeth's face he might have seen there an expression not too flattering. But she faithfully brought him his dinner, and kept his secret, even though, hearing from over the staircase Mrs. Jones resolutely deny that Mr. Leaf had been at home since morning, she felt very much as if she were conniving at a lie.

With a painful, half-guilty consciousness she waited for her mistress's usual question, "Is my nephew come home?" but fortunately it was not asked. Miss Leaf lay quiet and passive, and her faithful nurse settled her for the night with a strangely solemn feeling, as if she were leaving her to her last rest, safe and at peace before the overhanging storm broke upon the family.

But all shadow of this storm seemed to have passed away from him who was its cause. As soon as the house was still Ascott crept down and fell to his supper with as good an appetite as possible. He even became free and conversational.

"Don't look so glum, Elizabeth. I shall soon weather through. Old Ascott will fork out; he couldn't help it. I'm to be his nephew, you know. Oh, that was a clever catch of Aunt Selina's. If only Aunt Hilary would try another like it."

"If you please, Sir, I'm going to bed."

"Off with you, then, and I'll not forget the gown at Christmas. You're a sharp young woman, and I'm much obliged to you." And for a moment he looked as if he were about to make the usual unmannerly acknowledgment of civility from a young gentleman to a servant maid, viz., kissing her, but he pulled a face and drew back. He really couldn't; she was so very plain.

At this moment there came a violent ring, and "Fire!" was shouted through the keyhole of the door. Terrified, Elizabeth opened it, when, with a burst of laughter, a man rushed in and laid hands upon Ascott.

It was the sheriff's officer.

When his trouble came upon him Ascott's manliness returned. He turned very white, but he made no opposition; had even enough of his wits about him—or something better than wits—to stop Mrs. Jones from rushing up in alarm and indignation to arouse Miss Leaf.

"No; she'll know it quite soon enough. Let her sleep till morning. Elizabeth, look here." He wrote upon a card the address of the place he was to be taken to. "Give Aunt Hilary this. Say if she can think of a way to get me out of this horrid mess; but I don't deserve—Never mind. Come on, you fellows."

He pulled his hat over his eyes, jumped into the cab, and was gone. The whole thing had not occupied five minutes.

Stupefied, Elizabeth stood and considered what was best to be done. Miss Hilary must be told; but how to get at her in the middle of the night, thereby leaving her mistress to the mercy of Mrs. Jones. It would never do. Suddenly she thought of Miss Balquidder. She might send a message. No, not a message—for the family misery and disgrace must not be betrayed to a stranger—but a letter to Kensington.

With an effort Elizabeth composed herself sufficiently to write one—her first—to her dear Miss Hilary.

"HONORED MADAM,—Mr. Leaf has got himself into trouble, and is taken away somewhere; and I dare not tell missis; and I wish you was at home, as she is not well, but better than she has been, and she shall know nothing about it till you come.—Your obedient and affectionate servant,

ELIZABETH HAND."

Taking Ascott's latch-key she quitted the house and slipped out into the dark night, almost losing her way among the gloomy squares, where she met not a creature except the solitary policeman, plashing steadily along the wet pavement. When he turned the glimmer of his bull's-eye upon her she started like a guilty creature, till she remembered that she really was doing nothing wrong, and so need not be afraid of any thing. This was her simple creed, which Miss Hilary had taught her, and it upheld her, even till she knocked at Miss Balquidder's door.

There, poor girl, her heart sank, especially when Miss Balquidder, in an anomalous costume and a severe voice, opened the door herself, and asked who was there, disturbing a respectable family at this late hour?

Elizabeth answered, what she had before determined to say, as sufficiently explaining her errand, and yet betraying nothing that her mistress might wish concealed.

"Please, ma'am, I'm Miss Leaf's servant. My missis is ill, and I want a letter sent at once to Miss Hilary."

"Oh! come in, then. Elizabeth, I think, your name is?"

"Yes, ma'am."

"What made you leave home at this hour of the night? Did your mistress send you?"

"No."

"Is she so very ill? It seems sudden. I saw Miss Hilary to-day, and she knew nothing at all about it."

Elizabeth shrank a little before the keen eye that seemed to read her through.

"There's more amiss than you have told me, young woman. Is it because your mistress is in serious danger that you want to send for her sister?"

"No."

"What is it, then? You had better tell me at once. I hate concealment."

It was a trial; but Elizabeth held her ground.

"I beg your pardon, ma'am; but I don't think missis would like any body to know, and therefore I'd rather not tell you."

Now the honest Scotswoman, as she said, hated any thing underhand; but she respected the right of every human being to maintain silence if necessary. She looked sharply in Elizabeth's face, which apparently reassured her, for she said not unkindly,

"Very well, child, keep your mistress's secrets by all means. Only tell me what you want. Shall I take a cab and fetch Miss Hilary at once?"

Elizabeth thanked her, but said she thought that would not do; it would be better just to send the note the first thing to-morrow morning, and then Miss Hilary would come home just as if nothing had happened, and Miss Leaf would not be frightened by her sudden appearance.

"You are a good, mindful girl," said Miss Balquidder. "How did you learn to be so sensible?"

At the kindly word and manner, Elizabeth, bewildered and exhausted with the excitement she had gone through, and agitated by the feeling of having, for the first time in her life, to act on her own responsibility, gave way a little. She did not actually cry, but she was very near it.

Miss Balquidder called over the stair-head, in her quick, imperative voice—

"David, is your wife away to her bed yet?"

"No, ma'am."

"Then tell her to fetch this young woman to the kitchen and give her some supper. And afterward, will you see her safe home, poor lassie? She's awfully tired, you see."

"Yes, ma'am."

And following David's gray head, Elizabeth, for the first time since she came to London, took a comfortable meal in a comfortable kitchen, seasoned with such stories of Miss Balquidder's goodness and generosity, that when, an hour after, she went home and to sleep, it was with a quieter and more hopeful spirit than she could have believed possible under the circumstances.

SOUTH CAROLINA NULLIFICATION.

"THAT we are essentially aristocratic I can not deny; but we can and do yield much to Democracy," said John C. Calhoun to the now venerable Commodore Stewart in the year 1812. "This is our sectional policy," he continued: "we are from necessity thrown upon and solemnly wedded to that party, however it may occasionally clash with our feelings, for the conservation of our interests. It is through an affiliation with that party in the Middle and Western States we control, under the Constitution, the Government of these United States; but when we cease thus to control this nation, through a disjointed Democracy or any material obstacle in that party which shall tend to throw us out of that rule and control, we shall then resort to the dissolution of the Union."*

Thus spoke the great Preacher of Disunion fifty years ago.

"When the President of the United States commands me to do one act, and the Executive of Mississippi commands me to do another thing inconsistent with the first order, I obey the Governor of my State," wrote Jacob Thompson from his seat in the National House of Representatives in the early autumn of 1850. "To Mississippi," he said, "I owe allegiance; and because she commands me I owe obedience to the United States. But when she says I owe obedience no longer, right or wrong, come weal or woe, I stand for my legitimate sovereign; and to disobey her behests is, to my conscience, treason."*

Thus spoke a Disciple of Calhoun, the great Preacher of Disunion, seven years before President Buchanan invited that Disciple to a seat in his Cabinet as one of his constitutional advisers.

In 1832 the Preacher attempted to execute his threat made in 1812. He thought the contingency had occurred—that the political supremacy of his "section" in the National Government was passing away. The Disciple plotted treason after the prescription of the Preacher while nourished in the very bosom of the Republic, and honored with its confidence from 1857 to 1861. The Preacher had been lying in his grave almost six months when the Disciple uttered his disloyal sentiments in 1850. Twelve years later that Disciple was in arms as a rebel against his Government—the natural result of such dangerous teachings and apt scholarship.

The avowed principles which actuated both the Preacher and the Disciple found birth and sustenance in the political heresy by which the actors in and abettors of the Great Rebellion of 1861 seek to justify it, namely, SUPREME STATE SOVEREIGNTY. This was the justification offered by the disappointed Calhoun and his followers in 1832-'33 for their defiance of the authority of the National Government and their attempt to dissolve the Union. Let us see what the records say about that defiance and attempt, thirty years ago, which is known in history as SOUTH CAROLINA NULLIFICATION.

The commercial restrictions imposed by the Congress of the United States and the hostile position toward neutrals of England and France from 1809 until the close of the war with Great Britain in 1815, stimulated home industry to a remarkable degree. During that war a large number of manufacturing establishments had been nurtured into vigorous life by great demands and high prices; but when peace returned, and European manufactures flooded the country at very low prices, wide-spread ruin ensued, and thousands of men were compelled to seek other employments. Real estate and every product of industry and skill fell immensely in value; and labor found an inadequate demand for its services, and an equally inadequate remuneration. Cotton alone, of all the staple productions of the United States, was exempted from the depression. It was raw material for which the skill and industry of two hemispheres loudly called.

Statesmen were appalled when appealed to for a remedy for existing distress, and wise men devised many schemes for the public good. Then it was that the idea of a tariff for the protection of home manufactures filled the minds of a few, and national legislation was soon evoked to aid in the establishment of what was called The American System, the great champion of which was Henry Clay, of Kentucky. Hamilton's financial scheme, adopted in 1790, established a tariff for revenue chiefly, and had worked admirably for more than thirty years; the new scheme (an amplification of one on similar principles put in operation in 1816) ingrafted upon that old system of duties on imports the policy of protection in such a form that it was not obnoxious to the charge of unconstitutionality. It was also thought to be desirable, for it would increase the revenue and enhance the means for liquidating the public debt, which at the period in question (the closing year of Monroe's second administration) was $90,000,000.

It was early in 1824 that a revision of the tariff and augmentation of duties were proposed; and on that subject Henry Clay made one of his ablest speeches on the last day of March, in which he drew a most dismal picture of the condition of the country. "It was indicated," he said, "by the diminished exports of native produce; by the depressed and reduced state of our foreign navigation; by our diminished commerce; by successive unthrashed crops of grain perishing in our barns and barn-yards for the want of a market; by the alarming diminution of the circulating medium; by the numerous bankruptcies, not limited to the trading classes but extending to all orders of society; by a universal complaint of the want of employment and a consequent reduction of the wages of labor; by the ravenous pursuit after public situations, not for the sake of their honors and the performance of their public duties, but as a means of private subsistence; by the reluctant resort to the perilous use of paper money; by the intervention of legislation in the delicate relation between debtor and creditor; and, above all, by the low and depressed state of the value of almost every description of the whole mass of the property of the nation, which has, on an average, sunk not less than about fifty per cent. within a few years." Such was the sad picture drawn by the eminent statesman of Kentucky. "I have exaggerated nothing," he said. "Perfect fidelity to the original would have authorized me to have thrown on deeper and darker hues."

Mr. Webster, the representative of New England feeling and policy—New England, where the class to be benefited by a high protective tariff most abounded—denied that the distress spoken of was universal. He claimed exemption for his section. He denied the assumed cause for the distress where it did exist, and attributed it chiefly to the over-expansion and recent collapse of the paper-money system, which had encouraged over-trading, excited speculation, and communicated an artificial value to property. He denied the necessity for protection to domestic manufactures, and deprecated high and prohibitory duties for such a purpose, believing that the tendency of the enlightened age was toward free trade. "Society," he said, "is full of excitement; competition comes in place of monopoly; and intelligence and industry ask only for fair play and an open field."

The bill for an increase of the tariff was finally passed by a small majority in each House—in the Senate, 25 to 21; in the Representatives, 107 to 102. The measure formed one of the elements of dispute in the canvass for the election of President of the United States during the ensuing autumn, when John Quincy Adams, known to be in favor of it, was elected. The cotton-growing States professed to be much dissatisfied, for they regarded the measure as injurious to their particular interests, because it would, as they said, curtail the foreign demand for their staple.

Forgetting that, at the very outset of the Government (1790), a tariff for the protection of cotton-growers was laid; forgetting that, because a member of the Senate from South Carolina had declared in his place that cotton was "in contemplation" in his own and the neighboring State of Georgia, and that "if good seed could be procured he hoped it might succeed," a duty of three cents a pound was laid on imported cotton, to the injury of manufacturers, then in struggling competition with Arkwright's machines in the hands of English operatives exclusively; forgetting that, as Mr. Everett has said, "radicle and plumule, root and branch, blossom and boll, the culture of the cotton-plant in the United States was, in its infancy, the foster-child of the protective system," the ungenerous cry of "aggression" was raised. It had a deeper meaning than its sound indicated. The then undiscovered voice of old Virginia disloyalty was in the tones. The "Southern heart must be fired."

The census of 1820 had appeared like the dim, mysterious hand of fate writing prophetically upon the walls of the National Capitol the sentence, "Found wanting," against the political domination of Mr. Calhoun's "section." But he, the high-priest of the great heresy of State Supremacy, was sitting upon the throne of power next to the Chief Ruler, for he had been elected Vice-President of the Republic. From that eminence he surveyed the whole field of national politics, and with vigilant and comprehensive appreciation of every event, he watched the signs of the times for eight consecutive years, and moulded the minds of the leaders of the people of his section for unholy deeds.

In 1828 another revision of the tariff laws took place. In July, 1827, a National Convention was held at Harrisburg, in Pennsylvania, to discuss the subject of protective tariffs. For reasons which the light of subsequent history revealed, only four slave States were represented in that Convention. The result of the conference was a memorial to Congress, asking an augmentation of duties on several articles then manufactured in the United States. The Secretary of the Treasury called the attention of Congress to it in his report in December following, and early in the session that ensued that body took up the matter. It had become a political and sectional measure; and as Mr. Clay had avowed the intention of the new tariff laws of 1824 to be for the protection of domestic interests, a great variety of such interests were now clamorous for recognition.

A presidential election was approaching. The tariff had been made an Administration measure, and was to be an issue in the canvass. Mr. Webster who, in 1824, had opposed the policy, now advocated it, chiefly on the ground that it having become a part of the Government policy, his constituency and their neighbors had adapted their industrial operations to it. Under the guardianship of protective duties New England manufactures had prospered, and they, too, notwithstanding they were warned not to wed their interests to politics, were mostly in favor of still higher protective duties. It was charged that this new tariff bill was brought forward exclusively for the benefit of New England, and by her agency, to gratify the cupidity of her wealthy manufacturers—a charge wholly untrue.

The South, as the cotton-planting States were now called, had become excessively jealous of the North, as the region including Pennsylvania and all east of it was called. "The South," says Mr. Benton, "believed itself impoverished to enrich the North by this system; and certainly a singular and unexpected result had been seen in these two sections. In the colonial state the Southern were the rich part of the colonies, and expected to do well in a state of independence. They had the exports, and felt sure of their prosperity. Not so of the North, whose agricultural resources were few, and who expected privations from the loss of British favor. But in the first half century after independence this expectation was reversed. The wealth of the North was enormously aggrandized; that of the South had declined. Northern towns had become great cities; Southern cities had decayed, or become stationary; and Charleston, the principal port of the South, was less considerable than before the Revolution. The North became a money-lender to the South, and Southern citizens made pilgrimages to Northern cities to raise money upon the hypothecation of their patrimonial estates. And this in the face of Southern exports since the Revolution to the value of eight hundred millions of dollars—a sum equal to the product of the Mexican mines since the days of Cortez. The Southern States attributed this result to the action of the Federal Government—its alleged double action of levying revenue upon the industry of one section of the Union and expending it on another—and especially to its protective tariffs. But the protective system, in any degree, except in favor of cotton-planting, had been in existence only twelve years, and this reversed condition of the two sections had commenced long before that time. Philosophy and observation have long since discovered the cause to be found, not in the operations of the National Government, which has always been beneficent, but in the social character and the industrial systems of the two sections. But such was the pretense—a mere pretense, as President Jackson alleged—used by Mr. Calhoun and his associates for justifying disloyal speech in Congress, and action in South Carolina.

The tariff bill of 1828 became a law. It laid a heavy duty on woolen and cotton fabrics, making the former dearer for the Southern consumer and promising a decreased demand for raw cotton abroad. But this deficiency was more than made up by the increased demand of Northern looms. The Southern consumers felt the tariff on woolen goods, and disloyal politicians took advantage of the fact to declare it to be the result of "Northern exaction," and "a tribute to Northern capital." Bitter sectional feelings were excited for treasonable purposes; and public meetings were held in South Carolina at which resolutions were adopted indicative of a determination of the people to resist the act. The politicians had obtained possession of much of the common mind in that State, and large numbers were led by them in abject submission to the behests of mere demagogues, who, strutting in State pride, talked in a defiant manner of State supremacy and independence.

This extreme State Rights doctrine was at length, and for the first time, distinctly avowed in the National Congress. At the commencement of the session of 1829-'30, a Connecticut Senator offered a resolution of inquiry into the expediency of limiting the sales of the public lands to those then in the market, to suspend the surveys of the public lands, and to abolish the office of Surveyor-General. This brought the Western Senators to their feet. It was regarded as a proposition to check emigration, and to surrender the great West to the dominion of wild beasts. It was regarded as a most injurious and insulting proposition, and one not fit to be considered by a committee, much less to be reported upon and adopted. "I take my stand," said a Western Senator, "upon a great moral principle: that it is never right to inquire into the expediency of doing wrong."

The debate took wide latitude, and became at times very acrimonious. It also assumed strong sectional features. The Western members reiterated the old charges against the people of New England, that it was their early and persistent policy to check the growth of the West, so as to maintain political power in the Eastern and Middle States. Crimination and recrimination followed, until Mr. Webster endeavored to get rid of the unprofitable proceedings by moving an indefinite postponement of the whole subject. In arguing in defense of his motion he was led into remarks that kindled other fires, and instead of ending the discussion he enlarged the scope of debate and extended it. The ordinance of 1787 and the Missouri Compromise were brought in as topics, and these opened anew the slavery question. In the course of his remarks Mr. Webster spoke of the depressing effects of slavery upon the progress and prosperity of a State; and, in illustration of his position, he pointed to Ohio and Kentucky, lying opposite each other, in contrasting which the latter appeared very unfavorably. This was a most tender point for the Southerners; and the impetuous Robert Y. Hayne, of South Carolina, resented as an insult the disadvantageous comparison which Mr. Webster had made. He assailed New England, and inveighed sharply against the Free States for expressing any opinion concerning a subject which, he alleged, was none of their business. At length the relations of the State and National Governments formed a topic in the debate, when Mr. Hayne—speaking, it was understood, the sentiments of Mr. Calhoun—boldly asserted the right and duty of a State to decide upon the constitutionality of a National law, and to refuse to obey it if thus decided to be unconstitutional—in other words, to pronounce it null and void. He had made some pointed remarks about the disloyalty of the New England people during the war of 1812, and pointed to the Hartford Convention as an assemblage of traitors; when Mr. Webster retorted by calling attention to the public meetings recently held in South Carolina, in which contemplated resistance to the tariff laws was plainly manifested. In a warm reply Mr. Hayne avowed nullification sentiments freely—sentiments which, if correct in theory and feasible in practice, might not only produce but justify a dissolution of the Union if a single State should so elect. State authority was magnified, and placed higher than that of the National Government. Allegiance was due to the State, and only obedience to the National Government by the permission or command of the State, was the leading idea.

This bold utterance of not only heretical but disloyal doctrines—this plain defiance of the clause of the National Charter which says, "The Constitution, and the laws of the United States made in pursuance thereof, shall be the SUPREME LAW OF THE LAND, any thing in the Constitution and laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding"—that disorganizing claim of State authority to the right of deciding whether laws passed by Congress are constitutional or not, in plain rebellion to that other article of the National Charter which declares "that the judicial power shall extend to all cases arising under the Constitution and laws of the United States"—aroused Mr. Webster, and evoked that "Reply to Hayne" which stands peerless among the productions of mind upon the records of our National Legislature. He answered sophistry with reason, and assertion with argument. With prophetic sagacity he delineated in vivid colors a programme of performances in South Carolina, should an attempt be made there to put Hayne's nullification doctrines into practice, which was about literally followed in that State two years later.

In this speech Webster demolished every battery and intrenchment and bulwark of the great acting leader of nullification in South Carolina—the chief instrument in the hands of the high-priest of disunion in the Vice-President's chair—and closed it with the following magnificent peroration, then misunderstood and unappreciated, but now fearfully significant in every line: "When my eyes shall be turned to behold, for the last time, the sun in the heavens," he said, "may I not see him shining on the broken and dishonored fragments of a once glorious Union; on States dissevered, discordant, belligerent; on a land rent with civil feuds, or drenched, it may be, in fraternal blood! Let their last feeble and lingering glance rather behold the gorgeous ensign of the republic, now known and honored throughout the earth, still full high advanced, its arms and trophies streaming in their original lustre, not a stripe erased or polluted, nor a single star obscured, bearing for its motto no such miserable interrogative as What is all this worth? nor those other words of delusion and folly, Liberty first, and Union afterward; but every where spread all over in characters of living light, blazing on all its ample folds, as they float over the sea and over the land, that other sentiment, dear to every American heart: LIBERTY AND UNION, NOW AND FOREVER, ONE AND INSEPARABLE!"*

On the 13th of April, 1830, there was a remarkable dinner-party in the National metropolis. It was the birthday of Thomas Jefferson, and those who attended the party did so avowedly for the purpose of honoring the memory of the author of the Declaration of Independence. Such was the tenor of the invitation. Andrew Jackson, the President of the United States, was there. So was John C. Calhoun, the Vice-President. Three of the cabinet ministers, namely, Van Buren, Eaton, and Branch were also present; and members of Congress and citizens not a few. The guests assembled early, and soon there were clusters of them in the ante-rooms warmly discussing some of the regular toasts for the occasion. It soon became manifest to the more sagacious ones that this dinner-party and the day were to be made the occasion for inaugurating the new doctrine of nullification, and to fix the paternity of it on Mr. Jefferson, the great apostle of Democracy in America, and author of the nullifying resolutions offered to the Kentucky Legislature in 1798. With

* The late Thomas H. Benton, who took part in this debate, utterly unable to comprehend its significance then, ridiculed this peroration. "Among the novelties of this debate," he said, "is that part of the speech of the Senator from Massachusetts which dwells with such elaboration of declamation and ornament upon the love and blessings of union—the hatred and horror of disunion." He then ridiculed it as entirely uncalled-for and out of place. It might have been appropriate, he said, "when the five-striped banner was waving over the North—when the Hartford Convention was in session! But here, in this loyal and quiet assemblage, in this season of general tranquillity and universal allegiance, the whole performance has lost its effect for want of affinity, connection, or relation to any subject depending or sentiment expressed in the Senate; for want of any application, or reference to any event impending in this country."

Twenty-five years later Mr. Benton acknowledged his own blindness and Webster's wonderful sagacity at that time. He saw no sign of the calamity hinted at, he said. "I was slow to believe in any design to subvert this Union. I positively discredited it, and publicly proclaimed my incredulity. I did not want to believe it."—BENTON'S Thirty Years' View, etc., i., 142.

such noble parentage as the father of the Democratic party, it was believed that that party would accept the new doctrine and become the instruments of the South Carolina conspirators in their attempts to destroy the Union. They believed that it would produce a "divided North," and that secession would be made easy. Many gentlemen present, perceiving the drift of the whole performance, withdrew in disgust before summoned to the table; but the sturdy old President, perfectly informed, remained.

When the dinner was over and the cloth removed, a call was made for the regular toasts. These were twenty-four in number, eighteen of which, it is alleged, were written by Mr. Calhoun. These, in multifarious forms, shadowed forth, now dimly, now clearly, the new doctrine. They were all received and honored in various degrees, when Volunteer Toasts were announced as in order. The President was, of course, first called upon for a sentiment. His tall form rose majestically, and with the sternness appropriate to the peculiar occasion, he cast that appalling bomb-shell of words into the camp of the conspirators, which will forever be a theme for the commendation of the patriot and the historian—THE FEDERAL UNION: IT MUST BE PRESERVED! He was followed by the Vice-President, who gave as his sentiment—"The Union: next to our Liberty the most dear: may we all remember that it can only be preserved by respecting the rights of the States, and distributing equally the benefit and burden of the Union!" Those who before doubted the intentions of Calhoun and his South Carolina friends, and were at a loss to understand the exact meaning of the dinner-party to which they were bidden, were no longer embarrassed by ignorance. In that toast was presented the issue—liberty before Union—supreme State sovereignty—false complaint of inequality of benefits and burdens—our rights, as we choose to define them, or disunion. In that toast was seen the soul of Hayne's speech, and its light revealed the deep significance of Webster's peroration. From that moment the conviction took possession of the public mind that there was a party in the country intent upon the destruction of the American Government, and that the Vice-President of the United States was the animating soul and leader of that party. From that hour the vigilant old President watched the South Carolina conspirator, his lieutenant, with the searching eyes of unslumbering suspicion.

The Nullifiers intended, for all time, to celebrate annually the birthday of Mr. Jefferson; but that was the first and the last time that the attempt was made. The Virginia Legislature soon afterward passed resolves intended to wipe from Mr. Jefferson's fair fame the stigma of nullification which Calhoun and his partisans had thus attempted to fasten upon it; and Mr. Madison, the author of the Virginia Resolutions of 1789, which Mr. Hayne declared contained his political creed, scornfully resented this attempt "of the nullifiers to make the name of Mr. Jefferson the pedestal of their colossal heresy."

Timid men in Congress, alarmed by these demonstrations, hastened to modify the tariff laws so as to appease the dissatisfied people of the cotton-growing States. They did not go far enough to meet the demand of Calhoun and his friends, but sufficiently so to give them courage and make them more bold and exacting. Their attitude became more threatening and defiant, and to the uninformed their pretended grievances assumed the aspect of real ones. Then came the Presidential election in 1832. The American System bore a conspicuous part in the canvass. South Carolina had virtually threatened to secede from the Union unless the policy of that system should be abandoned by the Government. A nervous apprehension of some dire impending calamity appears to have taken possession of the public mind, and the Congressional elections resulted unfavorably to the system. It was evident that its speedy extinction would ensue, and those who loved peace in the National household fondly expected to see the smile of satisfaction on the face of South Carolina. They were disappointed. She was sulky, and her frowns were more ominous than ever. She refused to take an honest part in the Presidential election, and petulantly gave her votes to citizens who were not candidates. She had resolved (or rather the conspirators had resolved for her) not to be pacified; and she hastened to assert her disloyalty and disturb the integrity of the Union before the pretense for her disloyalty should become untenable by the removal of the ostensible cause.

Jackson, the chosen standard-bearer of the Democratic party, which the conspirators professed to pet as their darling so long as it was docile and subservient to their wishes, was re-elected, and the way for the accomplishment of their schemes seemed unobstructed; yet they continued to defy the Government, and exhibited the falsity of their professions of attachment to that party by immediately, when the result of the election was known, calling a convention of the delegates of the people of South Carolina at Columbia, their State capital, for a rebellious purpose. In that convention, composed of politicians, the professed representatives of the people took into their own hands violent instrumentalities for the redress of alleged grievances, which the chief conspirators had prescribed. Just a fortnight after the election (November 24, 1832), which really decided the fate of the American System, they sent forth from that convention an Ordinance of Nullification against it, its title being, "An ordinance to nullify certain acts of the Congress of the United States, purporting to be laws laying duties and imposts on the importation of foreign commodities." Mr. Hayne was the President of that convention, and chairman of the committee of twenty-one who reported the Ordinance of Nullification. A fortnight after this labor was performed the Legislature of his State, made up chiefly of Calhoun's disciples, evinced their sympathy with his political opinions by electing him Governor of that commonwealth.

The Ordinance of Nullification forbade all constituted authorities, State or National, within the boundaries of South Carolina, to enforce the payment of duties imposed by the tariff laws; and that in no case of law or equity, decided in the courts of South Carolina, touching the authority of the Ordinance, or the validity of acts of the Legislature of that commonwealth for giving effect thereto, should there be an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States. It was also ordained that all public officers should take an oath to obey that Ordinance on penalty of forfeiture of office. Having thus bound the people of the State hand and foot to self-created despotism (for they did not submit the ordinance to the people), without a chance of appeal to the accustomed tribunal, the conspirators defiantly declared that they would not submit to "coercion" by the United States, and that they should consider the passage by Congress of any act declaring the ports of that State abolished or closed, or in any way interfering with their commerce, as "inconsistent with the longer continuance of South Carolina in the Union;" and that the people of the State would henceforth "hold themselves absolved from all further obligation to maintain or preserve their political connection with the people of the other States," and would proceed forthwith to "organize a separate government, and do all other acts and things which sovereign and independent States may of right do." The ordinance was to take effect on the first day of February ensuing after its passage. It was signed by more than one hundred leading citizens of South Carolina, and thus officially communicated to the President of the United States.

Fortunately for the country there was a man at the head of the Government whose patriotism and courage had never been found wanting. It was equal to this emergency. South Carolina, through her unscrupulous politicians, had been placed in the attitude of open, forcible resistance to the laws of the United States, which the President had solemnly sworn to execute. Andrew Jackson was not a man to be trifled with. He quickly perceived his duty, and as quickly hastened to the performance of it. The Ordinance of Nullification reached him on the 1st of December. On the 10th of the same month he issued a Proclamation, kind but firm, persuasive but admonitory, in which he denounced the pernicious doctrine of State supremacy, and warned the people of South Carolina that they had been deceived by demagogues. "Eloquent appeals to your passions, to your State pride, to your native courage, to your sense of real injury," he said, "were used to prepare you for the period when the mask, which concealed the hideous features of disunion, should be taken off. It fell, and you were made to look with complacency on objects which, not long since, you would have regarded with horror." He reasoned fraternally with them, and begged them to retrace their steps. "Snatch from the archives of your State the disorganizing edict of its convention; bid its members to reassemble, and promulgate the decided expression of your will to remain in the path which alone can conduct you to safety, prosperity, and honor. Tell them that, compared to disunion, all other evils are light, because that brings with it an accumulation of all. Declare that you will never take the field unless the star-spangled banner of your country shall float over you; that you will not be stigmatized when dead, and dishonored and scorned while you live, as the authors of the first attack on the Constitution of your country. Its destroyers you can not be. You may disturb its peace; you may interrupt the course of its prosperity; you may cloud its reputation for stability; but its tranquillity will be restored, its prosperity will return, and the stains upon its national character will be transferred and remain an eternal blot on the memory of those who caused the disorder."

Meanwhile Governor Hayne had called the Legislature of South Carolina together to take measures for enforcing the Ordinance of Nullification. They authorized the Governor to call out the militia of the State for the purpose, and ordered the purchase of ten thousand stand of arms, and a requisite quantity of equipments and munitions of war. The feelings of the politicians of other States were consulted. Those of Virginia, Georgia, and Alabama approved of the action of the "Palmetto State," and gave assurance that, in the event of secession, those States would join her in forming a Southern Confederacy. But North Carolina, always patriotic at heart, nobly refused to stain her annals with even the semblance of treason and rebellion.

The time for action had now arrived, and Calhoun resigned the Vice-Presidency and took his seat in the Senate of the United States, where he might do battle for disunion more potently. The President had resolved to arrest him on his arrival at Washington, have him tried for high treason, and hung if found guilty. This, in the then condition of public feeling in the Southern States, might have been a most pernicious step, one that would have kindled the flames of civil war instantly. Webster and others persuaded Jackson not to adopt that extreme measure, but endeavor to win back the deluded people. The proclamation already mentioned followed; and on the assembling of Congress the President, in his annual Message, called attention to the attitude of South Carolina, and asked for co-operation in suppressing the rising rebellion. He had already taken precautionary measures. Quite a large body of troops, under General Scott, were stealthily thrown into Fort Moultrie in Charleston harbor, and a sloop of war was sent to the same waters to protect the national officers of customs, if necessary, in the performance of their duties. Before the inhabitants of Charleston were aware that the President would resort to force in the maintenance of the laws these troops were before their faces, and the guns of Fort Moultrie were silently but admonishingly telling them to be careful not to interfere with the business of the Charleston Custom-house.

The President had declared, in substance, in his Message that his policy would be a peaceful one toward the rebellious State so long as peaceful measures promised to be effectual; but in the event of persistent contumacy, he was prepared to force South Carolina into submission. This determination of the Government, the presence of General Scott with a competent force, and the sloop of war in the harbor, caused a material abatement of rebellious zeal in the capital of the turbulent State, and it became evident to the leaders there that South Carolina would not be permitted to sever the bond that bound her to the Union. Her famous Ordinance was not enforced; the revenues were regularly collected; and the national laws continued to be executed without interruption. Such being the case, the conspirators in the Convention, illy concealing their mortification after such a display of arrogance, resolved to postpone their intended forcible resistance until the first of February.

On the very first day of the session of Congress bills for the reduction of the tariff were introduced. One reported by Mr. Verplanck, from the Committee of Ways and Means, was very favorably received, especially by those who wished to conciliate the radical opponents of the tariff, of the South Carolina school. But long debates followed, and February, as well as the session of Congress, was drawing to a close, when, to the astonishment of every body, Mr. Letcher, of Kentucky, an ardent friend of Mr. Clay, rose in his place and moved to strike out every word of the bill except the enacting clause, and insert in lieu of it a bill introduced in the Senate by Mr. Clay, which has since been called the Compromise Bill. It was a formal abandonment of the American System, and confessedly a measure to heal disaffection and save the Union. It proposed a gradual reduction of the tariff in the course of ten years, in such a way that all interests would be unharmed. Mr. Clay professed to believe that it would not only heal all present dissensions, but prevent future ones; and that by separating the question of tariffs from politics, the business of the country would become more stable. It was ably opposed in the House by John Davis, of Massachusetts, who sagaciously remarked: "You propose to bind us [New England] hand and foot, to pour out our blood upon the altar, and sacrifice us as a burnt-offering to appease the unnatural and unfounded discontent of the South—a discontent, I fear, having deeper root than the tariff, and will continue when that is forgotten." John Davis simply wrote history in advance of events.

This Compromise Bill was passed, and the voice of disunion was hushed for a while. The secret history of the measure will be noticed presently.

In a Message to Congress on the subject of affairs in South Carolina, the President recommended that body to revive some old acts which would enable him to enforce the revenue laws in that State, and crush rebellion in the bud. In accordance with this recommendation, Mr.

Wilkins, of Pennsylvania, from the Judiciary Committee, submitted a bill on the 21st of January, known as the Force Bill. It was immediately assailed with the greatest violence as unconstitutional. At about the same time Mr. Calhoun introduced his series of Resolutions on the Powers of the Government, in which were involved the doctrines of nullification and the right of secession. In the course of the debates on these Resolutions and the Force Bill, he first promulgated, publicly, those mischievous sentiments concerning the nature of our government, the bitter fruit of which is the present rebellion. He made the Virginia Resolutions of 1798 his text, and the avowed source of his political creed; and with his clear, logical, subtle mind he framed utterances of such amazing sophistries, in most ingenious aspects, that many were confounded, and a few were, for the moment, half converted to his views. But he so misrepresented the real character and design of those resolutions, so falsely declared that they afforded a warrant for nullification and secession, that Senator Rives, of Virginia, for the honor of his State and the truth of history, rebuked him. Madison, their author, had already declared that the resolutions and the debates in the Virginia House of Delegates disclosed "no reference whatever to a constitutional right in an individual State to arrest by force the operation of a law of the United States."* And that venerable statesman, then over eighty years of age, vehemently spurned the doctrine of the nullifiers, that our government is only a league of States, saying, "What can be more preposterous than to say that the United States, as united, are in no respect or degree a nation, which implies a sovereignty?"†

It is worthy of notice, that in the course of these debates Calhoun, generally reticent and cautious, revealed, almost unconsciously, the secret spring of his desires for a dissolution of the Union and a Southern Confederacy to be inordinate personal ambition. He was a disappointed man. He had ardently desired a nomination for the office of Chief Magistrate of the Republic. In this aspiration he had totally failed, and as he viewed the growing wealth, population, and political strength of the Free States, the possibility of ever being crowned with such honor seemed more remote than ever. With the bitterness of a disappointed spirit he said, in the course of these debates, "The contest between the North and the South will, in fact, be a contest between power and liberty, and such he considered the present—a contest in which the weaker section, with its peculiar labor, productions, and situation, has at stake all that is dear to freemen. Should they be able to maintain in their full vigor their reserved rights, liberty and prosperity will be their portion; but if they yield, and permit the stronger interest to consolidate within itself all the powers of the government,‡ then will its fate be more wretched than that of the Aborigines whom they have expelled, or of their slaves..... Every Southern man, true to the interests of his section, and faithful to the duties which Providence has allotted him, will be forever excluded from the honors and emoluments of this government, which will be reserved for those only who have qualified themselves, by political prostitution, for admission into the Magdalen Asylum." Past and subsequent history convict that malignant conspirator of uttering a willful untruth—uttered for the sole purpose of "firing the Southern heart," until, in the language of an Alabama conspirator of our day (Yancey), "at the proper moment, by an organized concerted action, they could precipitate the Cotton States into a revolution."

‡ A favorite design of Mr. Calhoun was to secure, by

Allusion has been made to the secret history of the Compromise Bill, which, for the time, quelled the turbulence of the South Carolina politicians, and foiled the weapons of disunion so adroitly wielded by Calhoun and his fellow-conspirators. He and Clay had long been rival aspirants for the Presidency and antagonistic in political principles. Now, to the surprise of every body, they appeared to be in coalition. It was a deep mystery to the uninitiated, and remained so until in after years, when Clay and Calhoun became more bitterly antagonistic, that the latter revealed some of the secret history of that apparent coalition. It was substantially this, according to Mr. Benton:

The relative position of the National Government and South Carolina, and of the President of the United States and Mr. Calhoun, in the winter of 1833, placed the latter in great personal peril, which his friends perceived and tried to avert. Among others consulted on the subject by them was Letcher, of Kentucky, Clay's warm personal friend. He knew that South Carolina must yield, on some terms, to the authority and power of the National Government, and he conceived the idea of a compromise by which, in so yielding, she might preserve her dignity. He proposed it to Mr. Clay, who, sincerely desiring reconciliation, entertained the idea, and submitted it to Webster. The amazing intellectual plummet of the latter had fathomed the turbid waters of Nullification far deeper than had the brilliant Kentuckian, and he instantly said, "No—it will be yielding great principles to faction. The time has come to test the strength of the Constitution and the Government." He had heartily supported the Force Bill. Although opposed, politically, to the Administration, he had said: "I believe the country is in considerable danger; I believe an unlawful combination threatens the integrity of the Union. I believe the crisis calls for a mild, temperate, forbearing, but inflexibly firm execution of the laws. And, under this conviction, I give a hearty support to this Administration in all measures which I deem to be fair, just, and necessary. And in supporting these measures I mean to take my fair share of responsibility, to support them frankly and fairly, without reflections on the past and mixing other topics in their discussion." He was utterly opposed to compromising and temporizing measures with a rebellious faction, and told Mr. Clay so; and from that time he was not approached by those who were willing to shield conspirators from the sword of justice.

Mr. Clay drew up a compromise bill and sent it to Mr. Calhoun by Mr. Letcher. Calhoun objected to parts of the bill most decidedly, and remarked that if Clay knew the nature of his objections he would at least modify those portions of the bill. Letcher made arrangements for a personal interview between these eminent Senators, who had not been on speaking terms for some time. The imperious Clay demanded that it should be at his own room. The imperiled Calhoun consented to go there. The meeting was civil but icy. The business was immediately entered upon. The principals were unyielding, and the conference ended without results.

Letcher now hastened to the President and sounded him on the subject of compromise. "Compromise!" said the stern old man, stern only toward wickedness, "I will make no compromise with traitors. I will have no negotiations. I will execute the laws. Calhoun shall be tried for treason, and hanged if found guilty, if he does not instantly cease his rebellious course." Letcher now flew to M'Duffie, Calhoun's ardent friend, and alarmed him with a startling picture of the President's wrath. That night, after he had retired to bed, Letcher was aroused by a Senator from Louisiana, who informed him that Jackson would not allow any more delay, and that Calhoun's arrest might take place any hour. He begged Letcher to warn Calhoun of his danger. He did so. He found the South Carolinian in bed. He told him of the temper and the intentions of the President, and the conspirator was much alarmed.

Meanwhile Mr. Clay and J. M. Clayton of Delaware had been in frequent consultations on the subject. Clayton had said to Clay, while his bill was lingering in the House, "These South Carolinians act very badly, but they are good fellows, and it is a pity to let Jackson hang them;" and advised him to get his bill referred to a new committee, and so modify it as to make it acceptable to a majority. Clay did so, and Clayton exerted all his influence to avert the an amendment to the Constitution, what he adroitly termed "the rights of the minority," by giving to the States the veto power, by which every law passed by the Congress of the United States might be made null and void. This was nullification in its mildest form. If it had been ingrafted upon the national Constitution the Slave States would have controlled the government forever. But such a doctrine was opposed to the fundamental idea of a republican government, namely, submission to the will of the majority; and Mr. Calhoun and his followers, knowing such an amendment to the Constitution could never be obtained, resolved to secede, and form what the modern conspirators call a "homogeneous government"—that is, an aristocratic government, representing slaveholding communities only, and having no affinity with men who believe in the doctrines of the Declaration of Independence, written by one of their caste.

calamity which hung over Calhoun and his friends. He assembled the manufacturers who had hurried to the capital when they heard of the Compromise Bill, to see whether they would not yield something for the sake of conciliation and the Union. At a sacrifice of their interests, these loyal men did yield, and agreed to withdraw all opposition to the bill, and let it pass the Senate, providing all the nullifiers should vote for certain amendments made by the Lower House, as well as the bill itself. The nullifiers in committee would not yield. The crisis had arrived. The gallows was placed before Calhoun's eyes. Clayton earnestly remonstrated with him. He pointed out the danger, the folly, the wickedness of his course; and notified him that unless the amendments were adopted, and that by the votes of himself and political friends, the bill should not pass; that he (Clayton) would move to lay it on the table when it should be reported to the Senate, and that he had strength enough in that House pledged to do it. "The President will then," he said, "be left free to execute the laws in full rigor." His object, he told them plainly, was to put them squarely on the record; to make all the nullifiers vote for the amendments and the bill, and thus cut them off from the plea of "unconstitutionality," which they would raise if the bill and amendments did not receive their votes. Unless they were so bound he knew that the present pacification would be only a hollow truce, and that they would make this very measure, probably, a pretense for renewing their resistance to what they were pleased to call "unconstitutional measures" of the National Government, and for resuming their march toward secession and independence. He was peremptory with both Clay and Calhoun, and warned them that this was the last chance for compromise.

Mr. Clayton was inexorable. Clay and Calhoun agreed to the amendments. These with the bill were reported to the Senate. All the nullifiers voted for the amendments in order, until they came to the last, that of home valuation, which was so revolting to the great leader of the conspirators. When that came up Calhoun and his friends met it with the most violent opposition. It was the last day but one of the session, and a late hour in the day. Finding the nullifiers persistent in their opposition, Clayton, to their great consternation, suddenly executed his threat. He moved to lay the bill on the table, and declared it should continue to lie there. Mr. Clay begged him to withdraw his motion. Others entreated him to give a little more time. He was inflexible. There was fluttering in the bevy of nullifiers. Calhoun and his friends retired behind the colonnade back of the Speaker's chair, over which was the portrait of Washington, the great Unionist, and there held a brief consultation. It was very brief, for time and opportunity were precious. Senator Bibb came from the trembling conclave and asked Clayton to give a little more time. This was a token of yielding, and he complied. He withdrew his motion, but with the declaration that unless the measure, in full, was voted for by all the nullifiers he should renew it. Instantly one of their friends moved an adjournment. It was carried, and the conspirators went home on their predicament. They knew of only one way, and that a most thorny one for their pride, still open for their escape. They all knew the character of the President, and the reliability of his promises. So they concluded to vote as Mr. Clayton demanded, but begged that gentleman to spare Mr. Calhoun the mortification of appearing on the record in favor of a measure against which at that very time, and at his instance, troops were being raised in South Carolina, and because of which the politicians of that State were preparing to declare her secession from the Union! Mr. Clayton would not yield a jot. Calhoun was the chief of sinners in this matter, and he, of all others, must give the world public and recorded evidence of penitence, whatever his "mental reservations" might be. "Nothing would be secured," Mr. Clayton said, "unless his vote appears in favor of the measure."

The Senate met; the bill was taken up; and the nullifiers and their friends, one after another, yielded their objections on various pretenses. At length, when all had voted but Mr. Calhoun, he arose, pale and haggard, for he had had a most terrible struggle. He declared that he had then to determine which way he should vote, and at the termination of his brief remarks he gave his voice in the affirmative with the rest. It was a bitter pill for that proud man to swallow. The alternative presented to him was absolute humiliation or the gallows. He chose the former. With that act fell the great conspiracy to break up the Government of the United States in 1832. The violent clamors raised in South Carolina and the Gulf States on the appearance of Jackson's Proclamation soon ceased. The Ordinance of Nullification was repealed, and Nullifier became, as it deserved to be, a term of reproach throughout most of the Union.

Jackson warned his countrymen that slavery would be the next pretense used by the conspirators against the life of the nation. The fulfillment of that prophecy commenced almost on the day of its utterance. About the year 1831 there was established in the city of Washington a newspaper entitled the United States Telegraph, which was the confidential organ if not the private property of Mr. Calhoun. "Of all the vehicles—tracts, pamphlets, and newspapers—circulated by the abolitionists," said Governor Hill, of New Hampshire, in 1836, in allusion to it, "there is no ten or twenty of them that have contributed so much to the excitement as a single newspaper printed in this city. I need not name this paper when I inform you that, for the last five years, it has been laboring to produce a Northern and a Southern party—to fan the flame of sectional prejudice, to open wider the breach, to drive harder the wedge which shall divide the North from the South." In the columns of that paper, and in his speeches, Mr. Calhoun became the eulogist of slavery, and ungenerously and falsely accused the people of the North of a desire to interfere with that system in the Southern States. "Until he spoke," says a late writer, "the South generally felt that slavery was only to be regarded as a choice of evils—an unfortunate inheritance, to be endured as long as it must be endured, to be abolished as soon as it could be abolished safely. It was John C. Calhoun that effaced from the heart of the South the benign sentiments of Washington, Jefferson, Madison, and Randolph. It was Calhoun who began all that is to be deplored in the agitation of slavery questions. It was he who strove to rob the people of the North of their right to petition, and the right of the people of the South to receive what they chose through the mail. It was he who cut the magnetic cord that connected the South with the feeling of the age, and thus made the peaceful solution of the problem difficult."*

CHARLES DICKENS.

THERE are few readers of the works of any popular author who have not felt an ardent curiosity to see the Man as well as the Writer; and in the absence of the ability to see him, their curiosity is equally great to "hear all about him;" to learn how he looks, acts, "walks, and talks;" each particular as to his personal appearance, dress, manners, etc.; whether he is shy and silent in company, or scintillating and brilliant in conversation, etc., etc.

Perhaps no writer in modern times has excited this very natural desire more generally, or to a greater degree, than Charles Dickens. Even as we write, we see by the public journals that an offer has been made, "from responsible parties" in New York, to guarantee to Mr. Dickens fifty thousand dollars for one year's "Readings" (three times a week) from his popular works in this country; while a similar sum, with his expenses paid, awaited his acceptance in Australia. Now in all this there is only the evidence of a general desire to see and hear the Author and the Man; for every work from which he will read is as "familiar as household words" to all who will attend his "Readings." How many hundreds has the writer known who have made pilgrimages from our city to Sunnyside, simply to look upon Washington Irving; possibly with the hope to hear him in familiar conversation, but at all events to see him; and failing in that, at least to look upon the place where he "lived, and moved, and had his being." "And were the journey for this purpose one of fifty miles, and on foot," said a friend not long ago, an enthusiastic admirer of the writings of Irving, "it would be well repaid to hear once more his living voice."

The first announcement of Mr. Dickens's intended visit to America was made in the following characteristic letter to his friend and correspondent, Mr. L. Gaylord Clark, then editor of the Knickerbocker Magazine:

"Twenty-eighth September, 1841.

"MY DEAR SIR,—I condole with you from my heart on the loss you have sustained,* and I feel proud of your permitting me to sympathize with your affliction. It is a great satisfaction to me to have been addressed, under similar circumstances, by many of your countrymen since the 'Curiosity Shop' came to a close. Some simple and honest hearts in the remote wilds of America have written me letters on the loss of children—so numbering my little book, or rather heroine, with their household gods; and so pouring out their trials, and sources of comfort in them, before me as a friend, that I have been inexpressibly moved, and am whenever I think of them, I do assure you. You have already all the comfort that I could lay before you; all, I hope, that the affectionate spirit of your brother, now in happiness, can shed into your soul.

..... "On the Fourth of next January, if it please God, I am coming with my wife on a three or four months' visit to America. The British and North American packet will bring me, I hope, to Boston, and enable me, in the third week of the new year, to set my foot upon the soil I have trodden in my day-dreams many times, and whose sons (and daughters) I yearn to know and to be among.

"I hope you are surprised, and I hope not unpleasantly. Faithfully yours, CHAS. DICKENS."

Not long after his arrival at New York Mr. Dickens, with a number of gentlemen who had been specially invited to meet him, dined with the correspondent to whom the foregoing letter was addressed. I have preserved some memoranda of the things which most interested myself on this occasion. That Mr. Dickens was also interested appears from a postscript to a letter written after his return to England, in which he says: "This day twelvemonth I dined at your house: the pleasantest dinner I enjoyed in America. What a company!"

The notes of acceptance to the invitation to meet Mr. Dickens at dinner of the gentlemen who were present were pleasant and characteristic. That of Mr. Henry Inman, which I regret to have lost, was couched in a few well-chosen words, which embodied a perfect "picture in little" of Mr. Dickens's peculiar artistic characteristics. Halleck, in closing his note, in reference to an incidental hint in the letter of invitation of his host that he "must not forget the hour of dining"—a fault which his friend "John Waters" had woefully lamented—playfully said:

"A letter from you will always give me pleasure; but yours of yesterday was quite unnecessary:

"The bridegroom may forget the bride
Was made his wedded wife yestreen;
The monarch may forget the crown
That on his head an hour has been;
The mother may forget the child
That smiles so sweetly on her knee:"

but I am not in the habit of forgetting the day or the hour appointed for such a dinner as that with which you tempt me."

It was certainly a great satisfaction to find seated at the same table, in all the enjoyment which mutual regard and affection could create, men so well known to the reading world in both hemispheres, and equally honored in each, as

Washington Irving, Charles Dickens, William Cullen Bryant, Fitz-Greene Halleck, Bishop Wainwright, Henry Brevoort, the life-long friend of Irving; Henry Inman, the eminent artist; David Graham, Jun., the distinguished counselor and advocate; Henry Cary, the opulent banker and most delightful writer under the nom de plume of "John Waters"—a refined lover of refined literature and art, in all things himself the most elegant and accomplished of social hosts—"our Samuel Rogers, of Hudson Square," was a pseudonym by which he was often designated); and others, including the ladies of the host and his distinguished English guest.

Mr. Dickens's manner in personally describing an amusing incident was as remarkable as his written pictures. Something was said, we remember, touching the curiosity with which he was regarded by "outsiders," who were not expected to be present at the great dinner which was given to him at the old City Hotel—the crowded caravanserai of our city's old friends, Messrs. Jennings and Willard. They pressed into the large reception apartment simply to "have a look" at the great author who had so often amused and delighted them. He was reminded by the host that not a few were the exclamations of surprise that, "after all, it was only a bright-eyed young man, with 'lots' of long, curly, brown hair, and big, laughing, blue eyes."

"Yes," said Mr. Dickens; "and I heard many another shrewd criticism which was equally whimsical and expressive, and not a few which were far less flattering. I noticed especially one young fellow, who, after examining me from a near 'stand-point' very attentively, retired to take a distant or birds-eye view, surveying me from top to toe, and up again, making an inventory of my 'p'int's,' as if I had been a building, and he was anxious to secure in his mind my architectural proportions!"

It will not be amiss, let it be hoped, at so long an interval of time, to record a few of the many objects of interest which were adverted to or discussed, and the "good things" which were said on the occasion in question.

Mr. Dickens had brought a letter of introduction to Rev. Dr. Wainwright from his friend the Rev. Dr. Harness, a distinguished clergyman of the Episcopal Church in London; and in allusion to this fact, and in the semi-clerical conversation which ensued, mention was casually made of the Rev. Sydney Smith, whom Dr. Wainwright had frequently met while in London, and many pleasant anecdotes were recorded of him, of which few present had ever heard before, but which have since become familiar to the public through the different volumes. It was here that we first heard of the reply said to have been made to a letter of Landseer's, the great "canine artist," who had asked the learned and witty prelate to sit to him for his portrait: "Is thy servant a dog, that he should do this thing?" was the characteristic biblical reply. Some doubt was expressed as to the authenticity of this anecdote, as it indicated a want of courtesy: "And Smith," said Dr. Wainwright, "was the most courteous of gentlemen."

Mr. Irving remarked, it is well remembered, that at the time he was in the way of meeting Sydney Smith in the highest society of the British metropolis, it was easy to trace the witty clergyman through the brilliant salons of the English nobility "by the circles of light which surrounded him in the beaming countenances of his auditors." He "radiated humor; and neither bishops in their stoles, nor reverend divines, nor the most gracious and beautiful of the high-born ladies of the land were capable of resisting his quick wit and inexhaustible humor. And it was always 'good humor, too,'" added Mr. Irving.

"You were in our Sessions Court yesterday," said Mr. Graham, "and saw our mode of transacting criminal business. Is there any important difference between your forms and ours?"

"In many respects most marked," said Mr. Dickens: "in the first place, one misses the robes and wigs of the presiding judges, the badges of minor officials, and the pompous, impressive proceedings of opening and closing court. Here, I perceive, your prisoner sits by his counsel, and probably is only known to a portion of the spectators by that fact as the culprit, or by being pointed out as the principal 'party in interest.' With us, the prisoner is elevated in a dock, where he may be seen by every person in the crowd. Between him and the bench is usually a table, on which are placed certain dry herbs, as disinfectants against jail-fever." Other English customs in courts of justice were mentioned, which are entirely unknown in the courts of the United States.

But we remember an anecdote narrated by Mr. Dickens, connected with the use of disinfecting herbs as above described, which, as he told it, made an evident impression upon the guests at the table. He said that on one occasion, in the chief criminal court of London, a nervous, guilty culprit, before whom were placed the usual accompaniment of dried herbs, began to crumble them into a fine powder upon the table; and while a witness was testifying in relation to the crime which he was charged with having committed, and describing minutely the locality (a spot which, from circumstances mentioned and collateral testimony, it was contended by the prisoner's counsel he had never visited), the prisoner, all unconsciously to himself, was drawing a house, a door-yard, a Lombardy poplar-tree, a fence-paling, and a gate, in the powdered herbs upon the table—a rude but faithful picture of the very scene and surroundings, in all particulars, which it had been argued he had never seen! The guilty man's hands were seized; attention was called to the involuntary impromptu sketch; and it was considered as the strongest circumstantial evidence of guilt, which indeed was subsequently confessed.

The conversation at the head of the table turning for a moment upon circumstantial evidence, Mr. Irving adverted to a singular instance in point, narrated in his presence on one occasion, if we remember rightly, by Lord Eldon, before whose "Worship" the strange incident occurred:

A man, whose features alone indicated a character of the worst description, was on trial for a murder committed near midnight in a lonely spot near Hampstead Heath. His supposed murderer was arrested about half a mile from where the deed was committed; but the only evidence which could be adduced against him was that there was found upon him a gun which bore evident marks of having been recently discharged. The bullet had been extracted from the body of the murdered man. The bearing of the suspected murderer was bold and defiant. He alleged his entire innocence of the crime for the commission of which he had been arrested; said that his gun was his own, and he had taken it for "a day's shooting" in the country; and being anxious to be off early in the morning, had started about midnight for the journey. In short, he so managed to represent the objects he had in view that there appeared scarcely a circumstance which could be reasonably regarded as connecting him with the homicide. In the mean time the bullet which had been taken from the body of the murdered man was lying on the desk before the Judge; and during the examination of the witness and the explanations of the accused he had, unconsciously to himself, been rolling it slowly between his thumb and forefinger. After a little, a small piece of thin cloth or paper, stained with blood, was rolled off from the bullet by the manipulation, when all at once the object arrested the attention of the Judge, who proceeded to moisten it and to spread it out carefully upon the desk. After a moment's hesitation he asked:

"Was there any thing found upon the person of the prisoner?"

"Nothing, your Lordship," answered the counsel for the accused, "except a single sovereign, with a few pennies, a knife, tobacco-box, and a torn street-ballad."

"Pass the torn ballad up to the Bench," said his Lordship, which request was at once complied with.

The Judge looked at the crumpled paper attentively, smoothed it out, and then compared it with the three-cornered piece which had been unrolled from the bullet.

The "fit" was perfect! The paper which had constituted the wad of the bullet, and which his Lordship had separated from it, was a part of the very street-ballad which had been found upon the person of the prisoner, and which thus providentially secured his conviction, the admission of his guilt, and his final execution upon the gallows.

Among the guests at the table was an old and esteemed friend of the host, Mr. D——, a scholar, a gentleman, and one of the most kind-hearted and best of men. In person he was very comfortably fleshy and compact; of fair complexion, and with the sweetest expression gleaming through gold spectacles from his fine blue-gray eyes. He was so partridge-plump that it was jocosely remarked of him that he "looked as if his limbs had been melted and run into his garments, until they were just handsomely filled." Yes,

"Mr. D——, the beloved friend was there,
With a beautiful head, but not very much hair,
So little, in fact, that a wig he must wear," it was thought and predicted, although he never "thatched," for he scorned to falsify nature, especially on so prominent a point as the top of his head.

This excellent gentleman (and most faithful of friends) was playfully nicknamed "Pickwick," because of his supposed personal resemblance to that world-renowned philosopher. This was mentioned to Mr. Dickens, and he was asked whether there really were not a great resemblance in form, feature, and kindliness of manner to his immortal creation.

"Something like the character and physique which my pictorial illustrator of 'Pickwick' has represented in that work," answered Mr. Dickens; "but not nearly so much like the veritable Pickwick in manner as an elderly gentleman whom I met yesterday, while dining at his son's table in Hudson Square. The blandness of his features, the benevolence, the sweetness of expression which shone through his gold spectacles, the deliberateness of his 'walk and conversation'—all these, to my immediate perception, were exceedingly Pickwickian."

Now who does the reader—the New York reader particularly—suppose was this gentleman who so forcibly reminded Mr. Dickens of his own great character of Pickwick? None other than the venerable George Griffin!—the long and long-celebrated New York lawyer; a man some six feet four inches in height, of large frame, broad, but by no means as "broad as he was long," and lathy and angular in his general appearance to a most remarkable degree. Still, when one recalls the benevolence and simplicity of this eminent lawyer and most excellent of men, his charming kindness of manner, and the good heart which beamed in every expression and lineament of his face, it is not difficult to perceive many of the personal and moral features which go to make up the character of Pickwick in the minds and imaginations of Mr. Dickens's readers.

In Mr. Dickens's correspondence may be traced the same felicitous expressions, the same whimsical associations of thought which are so frequently to be met with in his works. The writer has been for many years an occasional correspondent of the distinguished novelist, and there is scarcely any one of his letters in which there is not something, some striking sentence or odd conceit, which none but himself "could or would" have written. One or two of these occur to us here, which there can be no impropriety in our citing in corroboration of the preceding remark:

Mr. Dickens was charged with being greatly embittered against this country because of the non-passage of an International Copyright Law. We have reason, however, to know that he had not been in this country three weeks before he had ceased altogether to expect the passage of such a measure—although, perhaps, in his own case, the offer of liberal payment for advanced sheets of his popular works may have somewhat lessened his disappointment at this result. That he did not anticipate the passage of an International Copyright Law at any time after his return, even when informed by the present writer that there had sprung up a strong feeling in the country in favor of such a measure, may be gathered from the following characteristic passage from a letter of his, written while the early monthly numbers of "Chuzzlewit" were appearing in England:

"What impossible odds shall I wager against some piece of property of yours, that we shall not be in our graves, and out of them, in particles of dust, impalpable, before those worthy men at Washington, in their earthy riots, care one miserable d—n for Mind? I believe that, in this respect, Justice and the Millennium will walk down the shore of Time together."

In a letter from London, dated the 22d of October, 1849, Mr. Dickens writes:

"I have not been in London for between three and four months, having had a cottage in the Isle of Wight during that time. As no parcels were forwarded to me (only letters) I did not receive your package, with its accompanying note, until my return home on Friday last. I immediately got a portrait—an impression of one which was originally published in 'Nickleby'—and sent it by railroad, indorsed as you direct; and I hope it will reach you safely some day or other.

"The cholera has been, as no doubt you know ere this, very bad in London, chiefly among the poor and badly lodged. I am happy to say we are all well, and have not lost any friends by the dire disease. It is supposed to be quite passed now, and I trust in God it is."

....."Macready is playing with enormous success at the Haymarket. 'Copperfield' takes a great hold, and goes on bravely. I think that is all the news I have, after my long sojourn on the sea-shore, except that my girls, like yours, are growing taller, though they are not tall yet; that my oldest son is going to Eton at Christmas; and that Mrs. Dickens sends her love, in which I join as far as I lawfully may, to your other half."

In a letter, written about this period, in explanation of the reason why he had not been able to furnish a paper for the Magazine with which the writer had been for many years the editor, Mr. Dickens says:

"When I finish a chapter of —, which has an entire scene, capable of segregation, I can promise to send — (A long dash). But I will lay down no more pieces of stone in the Infernal pavement."

His intention, of course, was to do us the great kindness, in fulfilling a promise which he had conditionally made; but as "Hell is paved with good intentions," he would not farther commit himself. He adds, in the same note:

"I never commit thoughts to paper until I am obliged to write, being better able to keep them in regular order, on different shelves of my brain, ready ticketed and labeled to be brought out when I want them."

Much was said and written in America after Mr. Dickens's return, and before and during the publication of "Chuzzlewit," which undoubtedly a good deal exasperated him: until at length he said, in a letter to the writer: "All the newspapers, journals, and unrecognized letters which reach me from America, go, unopened, at once into the fire: and I find my self-respect and peace of mind entirely preserved by such a course, I do assure you."

It may be remarked, in passing, that this is as good a plan as could be adopted in all similar cases. A man who can deliberately sit down and write an anonymous letter is a character so contemptible that he can only be reached by perfect contempt.

The spirit of the American portions of "Chuzzlewit" was not acceptable to our countrymen. It was thought to be unkind; and (especially after it had been followed by the "American Notes") it was deemed an ungrateful return for the attentions which had been bestowed upon the author in every part of the country. It could not be denied, however, and in fact was not denied that much of the satire, particularly the political parts of it—the egotism, for example, of candidates, and their ridiculous ideas of the effect which their "speeches" were to have upon the "policy" of the British Queen and the British Government, should the interrogated author "dare to lay them before Her Majesty and the British Parliament"—these things were really "well put;" and however distasteful as facts, were admitted to be scarcely distorted likenesses. How many pompous political "Elijah Pograms" have been recognized, ticketed, and labeled since the first publication of "Chuzzlewit!"

But the genius of the work; its humor, its pathos; the portraits of "Pecksniff" and "Mrs. Gamp," of "Tom Pinch" and his sister; and the retributions which gave to each their "portion in due season;" these took away the sting of the satire of such characters as the Hon. Elijah Pogram, Congressman; and, finally, admiration almost obliterated a general sense of injustice. But apropos of "Chuzzlewit," from its author:

"You will not, I think," wrote Mr. Dickens, at the time, to the present writer, "like 'Chuzzlewit' the less the farther it gets on. I especially commend to you a certain Tom Pinch and his sister, who will one day appear upon the scene."

It is worthy of a passing remark here that this was written some time before these admirable characters had been introduced: a fact which entirely disproves the charge brought first, I think, by the Edinburgh Review (possibly it may have been Blackwood) against Dickens, that he evidently had no well-conceived plan of the characters and scenes of any of his works, but that from daily observation, and perhaps from current events, these were connected and used from month to month as he wrote the successive "Parts" of his novels.

But "let that pass," as the little dog said to the thundering railroad train. Suffice it to say, that it was thought "on this side" that it was "not well to be angry" with a writer, however his slurs upon our "progress" and "institutions" might have annoyed us, whose heart could have suggested the beautiful, the simple, the good, the loving and lovable creations of Tom Pinch and his sister.

As we close this desultory paper we perceive, by extracts from the London papers in our daily journals, that Mr. Dickens has recently celebrated his fiftieth birthday. What an affluent Life of Literature hath been his! How copious, how various, and how rich the golden intellectual stream which has flowed, reflowed, and is still flowing from his fertile pen! His years seem but to add to the exuberance, the ripeness of his genius. New creations spring from his teeming brain invested with undying life; and even now, while simple-hearted "Joe," and "Pip," and pompous "Pumblechook" are stored away in the cells of Memory, we can not for a moment doubt that, in the new story upon which Dickens is now engaged, there are being characters depicted which will be as lasting in the minds and hearts of his readers as any which he has given to the world. May the Great Story speedily be given to the Public of two hemispheres, and may it be ours to be among the first to read it!—for it is one of the results of reading Dickens in numbers that, having once begun to read them, you must devour them consecutively as they appear. No writer of our time, unless it be Wilkie Collins, knows so well as he how to stimulate without satisfying curiosity; and yet his chapters are almost invariably complete in themselves; convergent sketches still, however, which in the end are to form one great Narrative Picture.

ROMOLA.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "ADAM BEDE."

PROEM.

MORE than three centuries and a half ago, in the mid spring-time of 1492, we are sure that the star-quenching angel of the dawn, as he traveled with broad slow wing from the Levant to the Pillars of Hercules, and from the summits of the Caucasus across all the snowy Alpine ridges to the dark nakedness of the western isles, saw nearly the same outline of firm land and unstable sea—saw the same great mountain shadows on the same valleys as he has seen to-day—saw olive mounts, and pine forests, and the broad plains, green with young corn or rain-freshened grass—saw the domes and spires of cities rising by the river sides or mingled with the sedge-like masts on the many-curved sea-coast, in the same spots where they rise to-day. And as the faint light of his course pierced into the dwellings of men, it fell, as now, on the rosy warmth of nestling children; on the haggard waking of sorrow and sickness; on the hasty uprising of the hard-handed laborer; and on the late sleep of the night-student, who had been questioning the stars or the sages, or his own soul, for that hidden knowledge which would break through the barrier of man's brief life, and show its dark path, that seemed to bend no whither, to be an arc in an immeasurable circle of light and glory. The great river-courses which have shaped the lives of men have hardly changed; and those other streams, the life-currents that ebb and flow in human hearts, pulsate to the same great needs, the same great loves and terrors. As our thought follows close in the slow wake of the dawn, we are impressed with the broad sameness of the human lot, which never alters in the main headings of its history—hunger and labor, seed-time and harvest, love and death.

Even if, instead of following the dim day-break, our imagination pauses on a certain hiserical spot, and awaits the fuller morning, we may see a world-famous city, which has hardly changed its outline since the days of Columbus, seeming to stand as an almost unviolated symbol, amidst the flux of human things, to remind us that we still resemble the men of the past more than we differ from them, as the great mechanical principles on which those domes and towers were raised must make a likeness in human building that will be broader and deeper than all possible change. And doubtless, if the spirit of a Florentine citizen, whose eyes were closed for the last time while Columbus was still waiting and arguing for the three poor vessels with which he was to set sail from the port of Palos, could return from the shades, and pause where our thought is pausing, he would believe that there must still be fellowship and understanding for him among the inheritors of his birth-place.

Let us suppose that such a Shade has been permitted to revisit the glimpses of the golden morning, and is standing once more on the famous hill of San Miniato, which overlooks Florence from the south.

The Spirit is clothed in his habit as he lived; he folds of his well-lined black silk garment or cuccio hang in grave unbroken lines from neck to ankle; his plain cloth cap, with its becchetto, or long hanging strip of drapery, to serve as a scarf in case of need, surmounts a penetrating face, not, perhaps, very handsome, but with a firm, well-cut mouth, kept distinctly human by a close-shaven lip and chin. It is a face charged with memories of a keen and various life passed below there on the banks of the gleaming river; and as he looks at the scene before him, the sense of familiarity is so much stronger than the perception of change that he thinks it might be possible to descend once more among the streets and take up that busy life where he left it. For it is not only the mountains and the westward-bending river that he recognizes; not only the dark sides of Mount Morello opposite to him, and the long valley of the Arno that seems to stretch its gray, low-tufted luxuriance to the far-off ridges of Carrara; and the steep height of Fiesole, with its crown of monastic walls and cypresses; and all the green and gray slopes sprinkled with villas which he can name as he looks at them. He sees other familiar objects much closer to his daily walks. For though he misses the seventy or more towers that once surmounted the walls, and encircled the city as with a regal diadem, his eyes will not dwell on that blank; they are drawn irresistibly to the unique tower springing, like a tall flower-stem drawn toward the sun, from the square turreted mass of the Old Palace in the very heart of the city—the tower that looks none the worse for the four centuries that have passed since he used to walk under it. The great dome, too, greatest in the world, which, in his early boyhood, had been only a daring thought in the mind of a small quick-eyed man—there it raises its large curves still, eclipsing the hills. And the well-known bell-towers—Giotto's, with its distant hint of rich color, and the graceful spired Badia, and the rest—he looked at them all from the shoulder of his nurse.

"Surely," he thinks, "Florence can still ring her bells with the solemn hammer-sound that used to beat on the hearts of her citizens and strike out the fire there. And here, on the right, stands the long dark mass of Santa Croce, where we buried our famous dead, laying the laurel on their cold brows and fanning them with the breath of praise and of banners. But Santa Croce had no spire then: we Florentines were too full of great building projects to carry them all out in stone and marble; we had our frescoes and our shrines to pay for, not to speak of rapacious condottieri, bribed royalty, and purchased territories, and our façades and spires must needs wait. But what architect can the Frati Minori* have employed to build that spire for them? If it had been built in my day, Filippo Brunelleschi or Michelozzo would have devised something of another fashion than that—something worthy to crown the church of Arnolfo."

At this the Spirit, with a sigh, lets his eyes travel on to the city walls, and now he dwells on the change there with wonder at these modern times. Why have five out of the eleven convenient gates been closed? And why, above all, should the towers have been leveled that were once a glory and defense? Is the world become so peaceful, then, and do Florentines dwell in such harmony, that there are no longer conspiracies to bring ambitious exiles home again with armed bands at their back? These are difficult questions: it is easier and pleasanter to recognize the old than to account for the new. And there flows Arno, with its bridges just where they used to be—the Ponte Vecchio, least like other bridges in the world, laden with the same quaint shops, where our Spirit remembers lingering a little, on his way, perhaps, to look at the progress of that great palace which Messer Luca Pitti had set a-building with huge stones got from the Hill of Bogoli† close behind, or, perhaps, to transact a little business with the cloth-dressers in Oltrarno. The exorbitant line of the Pitti roof is hidden from San Miniato; but the yearning of the old Florentine is not to see Messer Luca's too ambitious palace which he built unto himself; it is to be down among those narrow streets and busy humming Piazzes where he inherited the eager life of his fathers. Is not the anxious voting with black and white beans still going on down there? Who are the Priori in these months, eating soberly-regulated official dinners in the Palazzo Vecchio, with removes of tripe and boiled partridges, seasoned by practical jokes against the ill-fated butt among those potent signors? Are not the significant banners still hung from the windows—still distributed with decent pomp under Orcagna's Loggia every two months?

Life had its zest for the old Florentine when he, too, trod the marble steps and shared in those dignities. His politics had an area as wide as his trade, which stretched from Syria to Britain, but they had also the passionate intensity, and the detailed practical interest, which could belong only to a narrow scene of corporate action; only to the members of a community shut in close by the hills and by walls of six miles' circuit, where men knew each other as they passed in the street, set their eyes every day on the memorials of their commonwealth, and were conscious of having not only the right to vote, but the chance of being voted for. He loved his honors and his gains, the business of his counting-house, of his guild, of the public council-chamber; he loved his enmities, too, and fingered the white bean which was to keep a hated name out of the borsa with more complacency than if it had been a golden florin. He loved to strengthen his family by a good alliance, and went home with a triumphant light in his eyes after concluding a satisfactory parentado, or marriage for his son or daughter, under his favorite loggia in the evening cool; he loved his game at chess under that same loggia, and his biting jest, and even his coarse joke, as not beneath the dignity of a man eligible for the highest magistracy. He had gained an insight into all sorts of affairs at home and abroad; he had been of the "Ten" who managed the war department, of the "Eight" who attended to home discipline, of the Priori or Signori who were the heads of the executive government; he had even risen to the supreme office of Gonfaloniere; he had made one in embassies to the Pope and to the Venetians; and he had been commissary to the hired army of the Republic, directing the inglorious bloodless battles in which no man died of brave breast wounds—virtuosi colpi—but only of casual falls and trappings. And in this way he had learned to distrust men without bitterness; looking on life mainly as a game of skill, but not dead to traditions of heroism and clean-handed honor. For the human soul is hospitable, and will entertain conflicting sentiments and contradictory opinions with much impartiality. It was his pride, besides, that he was duly tinctured with the learning of his age, and judged not altogether with the vulgar, but in harmony with the ancients: he, too, in his prime, had been eager for the most correct manuscripts, and had paid many florins for antique vases and for disinterred busts of the ancient immortals—some, perhaps, truncis naribus, wanting as to the nose, but not the less authentic; and in his old age he had made haste to look at the early sheets of that fine Homer which was among the early glories of the Florentine press. But he had not, for all that, neglected to hang up a waxen image or double of himself under the protection of the Madonna Annunziata, or to do penance for his sins in large gifts to the shrines of saints whose lives had not been modeled on the study of the classics; he had not even neglected making liberal bequests toward buildings for the Fрати, against whom he had leveled many a jest.

For the Unseen Powers were mighty. Who knew—who was sure—that there was any name given to them behind which there was no angry force to be appeased, no intercessory pity to be won? Were not gems medicinal, though they only pressed the finger? Were not all things charged with occult virtues? Lucretius might be right—he was an ancient and a great poet; Luigi Pulci, too, who was suspected of not believing any thing from the roof upward (dal tetto in su), had very much the air of being right over the supper-table, when the wine and riboboli were circulating fast, though he was only a poet in the vulgar tongue. There were even learned personages who maintained that Aristotle, wisest of men (unless, indeed, Plato were wiser?), was a thoroughly irreligious philosopher; and a liberal scholar must entertain all speculations. But the negatives might, after all, prove false; nay, seemed manifestly false, as the circling hours swept past him, and turned round with graver faces. For had not the world become Christian? Had he not been baptized in San Giovanni, where the dome is awful with the symbols of coming judgment, and where the altar bears a crucified Image disturbing to perfect complacency in one's self and the world? Our resuscitated Spirit was not a pagan philosopher, nor a philosophizing pagan poet, but a man of the fifteenth century, inheriting its strange web of belief and unbelief; of Epicurean levity and fetichistic dread; of pedantic impossible ethics uttered by rote, and crude passions acted out with childish impulsiveness; of inclination toward a self-indulgent paganism, and inevitable subjection to that human conscience which, in the unrest of a new growth, was filling the air with strange prophecies and presentiments.

He had smiled, perhaps, and shaken his head dubiously, as he heard simple folk talk of a Pope Angelico, who was to come by-and-by and bring in a new order of things, to purify the Church from simony, and the lives of the clergy from scandal—a state of affairs too different from what existed under Innocent the Eighth for a shrewd merchant and politician to regard the prospect as worthy of entering into his calculations. But he felt the evils of the time, nevertheless; for he was a man of public spirit, and public spirit can never be wholly immoral, since its essence is care for a common good. That very Quaresima, or Lent, of 1492, in which he died, still in his erect old age, he had listened in San Lorenzo, not without a mixture of satisfaction, to the preaching of a Dominican friar, who denounced with a rare boldness the worldliness and vicious habits of the clergy, and insisted on the duty of Christian men not to live for their own ease when wrong was triumphing in high places, and not to spend their wealth in outward pomp even in the churches, when their fellow-citizens were suffering from want and sickness. The Frate carried his doctrine rather too far for elderly ears; yet it was a memorable thing to see a preacher move his audience to such a pitch that the women even took off their ornaments, and delivered them up to be sold for the benefit of the needy.

"He was a noteworthy man, that Prior of San Marco," thinks our Spirit; "somewhat arrogant and extreme, perhaps, especially in his denunciations of speedy vengeance. Ah, *Iddio non paga il Sabato—the wages of men's sins often linger in their payment, and I myself saw much established wickedness of long-standing prosperity. But a Frate Predicatore who wanted to move the people—how could he be moderate? He might have been a little less defiant and curt, though, to Lorenzo de' Medici, whose family had been the very makers of San Marco: was that quarrel ever made up? And our Lorenzo himself, with the dim outward eyes and the subtle inward vision, did he get over that illness at Careggi? It was but a sad, uneasy-looking face that he would carry out of the world which had given him so much, and there were strong suspicions that his handsome son would play the part of Rehoboam. How has it all turned out? Which party is likely to be banished and have its houses sacked just now? Is there any successor of the incomparable Lorenzo, to whom the great Turk is so gracious as to send over presents of rare animals, rare relics, rare manuscripts, or fugitive enemies, suited to the tastes of a Christian Magnifico who is at once lettered and devout—and also slightly vindictive? And what famous scholar is dictating the Latin letters of the Republic—what fiery philosopher is lecturing on Dante in the Duomo, and going home to write bitter invectives against the father and mother of the bad critic who may have found fault with his classical spelling? Are our wiser heads leaning toward alliance with the Pope and the Regno,† or are they rather inclining their ears to the orators of France and of Milan?

"There is knowledge of these things to be had in the streets below, on the beloved Marmi in front of the churches, and under the sheltering Loggie, where surely our citizens have still their gossips and debates, their bitter and merry jests as of old. For are not the well-remembered buildings all there? The changes have not been so great in those uncounted years. I will go down and hear—I will tread the familiar pavement, and hear once again the speech of Florentines."

Go not down, good Spirit! for the changes are great, and the speech of Florentines would sound as a riddle in your ears. Or, if you go, mingle with no politicians on the Marmi or elsewhere; ask no questions about trade in the Calimara; confuse yourself with no inquiries into scholarship, official or monastic. Only look at the sunlight and shadows on the grand walls that were built solidly, and have endured in their grandeur; look at the faces of the little children, making another sunlight amidst the shadows of age; look, if you will, into the churches, and hear the same chants, see the same images as of old—the images of willing anguish for a great end, of beneficent love and ascending glory; see upturned living faces and lips moving to the old prayers for help. These things have not changed. The sunlight and shadows bring their old beauty and waken the old heart-strains at morning, noon, and eventide; the little children are still the symbol of the eternal marriage between love and duty; and men still yearn for the reign of peace and righteousness—still own that life to be the highest which is a conscious voluntary sacrifice. For the Pope Angelico is not come yet.

CHAPTER I.

THE SHIPWRECKED STRANGER.

THE Loggia de' Cerchi stood in the heart of old Florence, within a labyrinth of narrow streets behind the Badia, now rarely threaded by the stranger, unless in a dubious search for a certain severely-simple door-place, bearing this inscription:

QUI NACQUE IL DIVINO POETA.

To the ear of Dante the same streets rang with the shout and clash of fierce battle between rival families; but in the fifteenth century they were only noisy with the unhistorical quarrels and broad jests of wood-carders in the cloth-producing quarters of San Martino and Garbo.

Under this loggia, in the early morning of the 9th of April, 1492, two men had their eyes fixed on each other: one was stooping slightly, and looking downward with the scrutiny of curiosity; the other, lying on the pavement, was looking upward with the startled gaze of a suddenly-awakened dreamer.

The standing figure was the first to speak. He was a gray-haired, broad-shouldered man, of the type which, in Tuscan phrase, is moulded with the fist and polished with the pickaxe; but the self-important gravity which had written itself out in the deep lines about his brow and mouth seemed intended to correct any contemptuous inferences from the hasty workmanship which Nature had bestowed on his exterior. He had deposited a large well-filled bag, made of skins, on the pavement, and before him hung a peddler's basket, garnished partly with small woman's-ware, such as thread and pins, and partly with fragments of glass, which had probably been taken in exchange for those commodities.

"Young man," he said, pointing to a ring on the finger of the reclining figure, "when your chin has got a stiffer crop on it, you'll know better than to take your nap in street corners with a ring like that on your fore-finger. By the holy 'vangelis! if it had been any body but me standing over you two minutes ago—but Bratti Ferravecchj is not the man to steal. The cat couldn't eat her mouse if she didn't catch it alive, and Bratti couldn't relish gain if it had no taste of a bargain. Why, young man, one San Giovanni, three years ago, the Saint sent a dead body in my way—a blind beggar, with his cap well-lined with pieces—but, if you'll believe me, my stomach turned against the testoni I'd never bargained for, till it came into my head that San Giovanni owed me the pieces for what I spend yearly at the Festa: besides, I buried the body and paid for a mass—and so I saw it was a fair bargain. But how comes a young man like you, with the face of Messer San Michele, to be sleeping on a stone bed with the wind for a curtain?"

The deep guttural sounds of the speaker were scarcely intelligible to the newly-waked, bewildered listener, but he understood the action of pointing to his ring: he looked down at it, and, with a half-automatic obedience to the warning, took it off and thrust it within his doublet, rising at the same time and stretching himself.

"Your tunic and hose match ill with that jewel, young man," said Bratti, deliberately. "Any body might say the saints had sent you a dead body; but if you took the jewels, I hope you buried him—and you can afford a mass or two for him into the bargain."

Something like a painful thrill appeared to dart through the frame of the listener, and arrest the careless stretching of his arms and chest. For an instant he turned on Bratti with a sharp frown; but he immediately recovered an air of indifference, took off the red Levantine cap which hung like a great purse over his left ear, pushed back his long dark-brown curls, and glancing at his dress, said, smilingly,

"You speak truth, friend: my garments are as weather-stained as an old sail, and they are not old either, only, like an old sail, they have had a sprinkling of the sea as well as the rain. The fact is, I'm a stranger in Florence, and when I came in foot-sore last night I preferred flinging myself in a corner of this hospitable porch to hunting any longer for a chance hostelry, which might turn out to be a nest of blood-suckers of more sorts than one."

"A stranger in good sooth," said Bratti, "for the words come all melting out of your throat, so that a Christian and a Florentine can't tell a hook from a hanger. But you're not from Genoa? More likely from Venice, by the cut of your clothes?"

"At this present moment," said the stranger, smiling, "it is of less importance where I come from than where I can go to for a mouthful of breakfast. This city of yours turns a grim look on me just here: can you show me the way to a more lively quarter, where I can get a meal and a lodging?"

"That I can," said Bratti, "and it is your good fortune, young man, that I have happened to be walking in from Rovezzano this morning, and turned out of my way to Mercato Vecchio to say an Ave at the Badia. That, I say, is your good fortune. But it remains to be seen what is my profit in the matter. Nothing for nothing, young man. If I show you the way to Mercato Vecchio, you'll swear by your patron saint to let me have the bidding for that stained suit of yours when you set up a better—as doubtless you will."

"Agreed, by San Niccolò," said the other, laughing. "But now let us set off to this said Mercato, for I promise you I feel the want of a better lining to this doublet of mine which you are coveting."

"Coveting? Nay," said Bratti, heaving his bag on his back and setting out. But he broke off in his reply, and burst out in loud, harsh tones, not unlike the creaking and grating of a cart-wheel: "Chi abbaratta—baratta—b'ratta—chi abbaratta cenci e vetri—b'ratta ferri vecchj?"*

"It's worth but little," he said presently, relapsing into his conversational tone. "Hose and altogether, your clothes are worth but little. Still, if you've a mind to set yourself up with a lute worth more than any new one, or with a sword that's been worn by a Ridolfi, or with a paternoster of the best mode, I could let you have a great bargain by making an allowance for the clothes; for, simple as I stand here (così fatto come tu mi vedi), I've got the best-furnished shop in the Ferravecchj, and it's close by the Mercato. The Virgin be praised! it's not a pumpkin I carry on my shoulders. But I don't stay caged in my shop all day: I've got a wife and a raven to stay at home and mind the stock. Chi abbaratta—baratta—b'ratta?..... And now, young man, where do you come from, and what's your business in Florence?"

"I thought you liked nothing that came to you without a bargain," said the stranger.

* "Who wants to exchange rags, broken glass, or old iron?"

"You've offered me nothing yet in exchange for that information."

"Well, well; a Florentine doesn't mind bidding a fair price for news: it stays the stomach a little, though he may win no hose by it. If I take you to the prettiest damsel in the Mercato to get a cup of milk—that will be a fair bargain."

"Nay; I can find her myself if she be really in the Mercato; for pretty heads are apt to look forth of doors and windows. No, no. Besides, a sharp trader like you ought to know that he who bids for nuts and news may chance to find them hollow."

"Ah! young man," said Bratti, with a sideways glance of some admiration, "you were not born of a Sunday—the salt shops were open when you came into the world. You're not a Hebrew, eh?—come from Spain or Naples, eh? Let me tell you the Frati Minori are trying to make Florence as hot as Spain for those dogs of hell that want to get all the profits of usury to themselves and leave none for Christians; and when you walk the Calimara with a piece of yellow cloth in your cap, it will spoil your beauty more than a sword-cut across that smooth live cheek of yours.—Abbaratta, baratta—chi abbaratta?—I tell you, young man, gray cloth against yellow cloth; and there's as much gray cloth in Florence as would make a gown and cowl for the Duomo, and there's not so much yellow cloth as would make hose for Saint Christopher—blessed be his name, and send me sight of him this day!—Abbaratta, baratta, baratta—chi abbaratta?"

"All that is very amusing information you're parting with for nothing," said the stranger, rather scornfully; "but it happens not to concern me. I am no Hebrew."

"See, now!" said Bratti, triumphantly; "I've made a good bargain with mere words. I've made you tell me something, young man, though you're as hard to hold as a lamprey. San Giovanni be praised! a blind Florentine is a match for two one-eyed men. But here we are in Mercato."

They had now emerged from the narrow streets into a broad piazza, known to the elder Florentine writers as the Mercato Vecchio, or the Old Market. This piazza, though it had been the scene of a provision market from time immemorial, and may perhaps, says fond imagination, be the very spot to which the Fesulean ancestors of the Florentines descended from their high fastness to traffic with the rustic population of the valley, had not been shunned as a place of residence by Florentine wealth. In the early decades of the fifteenth century, which was now near its end, the Medici and other powerful families of the popolani grassi, or commercial nobility, had their houses there, not, perhaps, finding their ears much offended by the loud roar of mingled dialects, or their eyes much shocked by the butchers' stalls, which the old poet Antonio Pucci accounts a chief glory, or dignità, of a market that, in his esteem, eclipsed the markets of all the earth besides. But the glory of mutton and veal (well attested to be the flesh of the right animals; for were not the skins, with the heads attached, duly displayed, according to the decree of the Signoria?) was just now wanting to the Mercato, the time of Lent not being yet over. The proud corporation, or "Art," of butchers was in abeyance, and it was the great harvest-time of the market-gardeners, the cheese-mongers, the vendors of macaroni, corn, eggs, milk, and dried fruits: a change which was apt to make the women's voices predominant in the chorus. But in all seasons there was the experimental ringing of pots and pans, the chinking of the money-changers, the tempting offers of cheapness at the old-clothes' stalls, the challenges of the dicers, the vaunting of new linens and woolens, of excellent wooden-ware, kettles, and frying-pans; there was the choking of the narrow inlets with mules and carts, together with much uncomplimentary remonstrance in terms remarkably identical with the insults in use by the gentler sex of the present day, under the same imbrowning and heating circumstances. Ladies and gentlemen who came to market looked on at a larger amount of amateur fighting than could easily be seen in these later times, and beheld more revolting rags, beggary, and rascaldom than modern householders could well picture to themselves. As the day wore on, the hideous drama of the gaming-house might be seen here by any chance open-air spectator—the quivering eagerness, the blank despair, the sobs, the blasphemy, and the blows:

"E vedesi chi perde con gran soffi,
E bestemmiar colla mano alla mascella,
E ricever e dar dimolti ingoffi."

But still there was the relief of prettier sights: there were brood-rabbits, not less innocent and astonished than those of our own period; there were doves and singing-birds to be bought as presents for the children; there were even kittens for sale, and here and there a handsome gattuccio, or "Tom," with the highest character for mousing; and, better than all, there were young, softly rounded cheeks and bright eyes, freshened by the start from the far-off castello* at daybreak, not to speak of older faces with the unfading charm of honest good-will in them—such as are never quite wanting in scenes of human industry. And high on a pillar in the centre of the place—a venerable pillar, fetched from the church of San Giovanni—stood Donatello's stone statue of Plenty, with a fountain near it, where, says old Pucci, the good wives of the market freshened their utensils, and their throats also—not because they were unable to buy wine, but because they wished to save the money for their husbands—"Ma pe' mariti voglion risparmiare."

But on this particular morning a sudden change seemed to have come over the face of the market. The deschi, or stalls, were indeed partly dressed with their various commodities, and already there were purchasers assembled, on the alert to secure the finest, freshest vegetables and the most unexceptionable butter. But when Bratti and his companion entered the piazza it appeared that some common preoccupation had for the moment distracted the attention both of buyers and sellers from their proper business. Most of the traders had turned their backs on their goods, and had joined the knots of talkers who were concentrating themselves at different points in the piazza. A vendor of old clothes, in the act of hanging out a pair of long hose, had distractedly hung them round his neck in his eagerness to join the nearest group; an oratorical cheesemonger, with a piece of cheese in one hand and a knife in the other, was incautiously making notes of his emphatic pauses on that excellent specimen of marzolino; and elderly market-women, with their egg-baskets in a dangerously oblique position, contributed a wailing fugue of invocation.

In this general distraction, the Florentine boys, who were never wanting in any street scene, and were of an especially mischievous sort—as who should say, very sour crabs indeed—saw a great opportunity. Some made a rush at the nuts and dried figs, others preferred the farinaceous delicacies at the cooked provision stalls—delicacies to which certain four-footed dogs also, who had learned to take kindly to Lenten fare, applied a discriminating nostril, and then disappeared with much rapidity under the nearest shelter; while the mules, not without some kicking and plunging among impeding baskets, were stretching their muzzles toward the aromatic green-meat.

"Diavolo!" said Bratti, as he and his companion came, quite unnoticed, upon the noisy scene; "the Mercato is gone as mad as if the most Holy Father had excommunicated us again. I must know what this is. But never fear: it seems a thousand years to you till you see the pretty Tessa and get your cup of milk; but keep hold of me, and I'll hold to my bargain. Remember, I'm to have the first bid for your suit, specially for the hose, which, with all their stains, are the best panno di garbo—as good as ruined, though, with mud and weather stains."

"Olà, Monna Trecca," Bratti proceeded, turning toward an old woman on the outside of the nearest group, who for the moment has suspended her wail to listen, and shouting close in her ear, "Here are the mules upsetting all your bunches of parsley: is the world coming to an end, then?"

"Monna Trecca" (equivalent to "Dame Greengrocer") turned round at this unexpected trumpeting in her right ear with a half-fierce, half-bewildered look, first at the speaker, then at her disarranged commodities, and then at the speaker again.

"A bad Easter and a bad year to you, and may you die by the sword!" she burst out, rushing toward her stall, but directing this first volley of her wrath against Bratti, who, without heeding the malediction, quietly slipped into her place, within hearing of the narrative which had been absorbing her attention, making a sign at the same time to the young stranger to keep near him.

"I tell you I saw it myself," said a fat man, with a bunch of newly-purchased leeks in his hand. "I was in Santa Maria Novella, and saw it myself. The woman started up and threw out her arms, and cried out and said she saw a big bull with fiery horns coming down on the church to crush it. I saw it myself."

"Saw what, Goro?" said a man of slim figure, whose eye twinkled rather roguishly. He wore a close jerkin, a skull-cap lodged carelessly over his left ear as if it had fallen there by chance, a delicate linen apron tucked up on one side, and a razor stuck in his belt. "Saw the bull, or only the woman?"

"Why, the woman, to be sure; but it's all one, mi pare: it doesn't alter the meaning—va!" answered the fat man, with some contempt.

"Meaning? no, no; that's clear enough," said several voices at once, and then followed a confusion of tongues, in which "Lights shooting over San Lorenzo for three nights together"—"Thunder in the clear starlight"—"Lantern of the Duomo struck with the sword of St. Michael"—"Palle"*—"All smashed"—"Lasso!"—"Lions tearing each other to pieces"—"Ah! and they might well"—"Boto† caduto in Santissima Nunziata!"—"Died like the best of Christians"—"God will have pardoned him"—were often-repeated phrases, which shot across each other like storm-driven hailstones, each speaker feeling rather the necessity of utterance than of finding a listener. Perhaps the only silent members of the group were Bratti, who, as a newcomer, was busy in mentally piecing together the flying fragments of information; the man of the razor; and a thin-lipped, eager-looking personage in spectacles, wearing a pen-and-ink case at his belt.

"Ebbene, Nello," said Bratti, skirting the group till he was within hearing of the barber. "It appears the Magnifico is dead—rest his soul!—and the price of wax will rise?"

"Even as you say," answered Nello; and then added, with an air of extra gravity, but with marvelous rapidity, "and his waxen image in the Nunziata fell at the same moment, they say; or at some other time, whenever it pleases the Frati Serviti, who know best. And several cows and women have had still-born calves this Quaresima; and for the bad eggs that have been broken since the carnival, nobody has counted them! Ah! a great man—a great politician—a greater poet than Dante. And yet the cupola didn't fall—only the lantern. Che miracolo!"

A sharp and lengthened "Pst!" was suddenly heard darting across the pelting storm of gutturals. It came from the pale man in spectacles, and had the effect he intended; for the noise ceased, and all eyes in the group were fixed on him with a look of expectation.

"'Tis well said you Florentines are blind," he began, in an incisive high voice. "It appears to me you need nothing but a diet of hay to make cattle of you. What! do you think the death of Lorenzo is the scourge God has prepared for Florence? Go! you are sparrows chattering praise over the dead hawk. What! a man who was trying to slip a noose over every neck in the Republic that he might tighten it at his pleasure! You like that; you like to have the election of your magistrates turned into closet-work, and no man to use the rights of a citizen unless he is a Medicean. That is what is meant by qualification now: *netto di specchio no longer means a man who pays his dues to the Republic: it means a man who'll wink at robbery of the people's money—at robbery of their daughters' dowries; who'll play the chamberer and the philosopher by turns—listen to bawdy songs at the Carnival, and cry 'Bellissimo!'—and listen to sacred lands, and cry again 'Bellissimo!' But this is what you love: you grumble and raise a riot over your quattrini bianchi" (white farthings), "but you take no notice when the public treasury has got a hole in the bottom for the gold to run into Lorenzo's drains. You like to pay for staffieri to walk before and behind one of your citizens, that he may be affable and condescending to you. 'See what a tall Pisan we keep,' say you, 'to march before him with the drawn sword flashing in our eyes; and yet Lorenzo smiles at us. What goodness!' And you think the death of a man who would soon have saddled and bridled you as the Sforza has saddled and bridled Milan—you think his death is the scourge God is warning you of by portents. I tell you there is another sort of scourge in the air."

"Nay, nay, Ser Cioni, keep astride your politics, and never mount your prophecy; politics is the better horse," said Nello. "But if you talk of portents, what portent can be greater than a pious notary? Balaam's ass was nothing to it."

"Ay, but a notary out of work, with his ink-bottle dry," said another by-stander, very much out at elbows. "Better don a cowl at once, Ser Cioni; every body will believe in your fasting."

The notary turned and left the group with a look of indignant contempt, disclosing, as he did so, the sallow but mild face of a short man who had been standing behind him, and whose bent shoulders told of some sedentary occupation.

"By San Giovanni, though," said the fat purchaser of leeks, with the air of a person rather shaken in his theories, "I'm not sure there isn't some truth in what Ser Cioni says. For I know I've good reason to find fault with the quattrini bianchi myself. Grumble, did he say? Suffocation! I should think we do grumble; and, let any body say the word, I'll turn out in piazza with the readiest, sooner than have our money altered in our hands as if the magistracy were so many necromancers. And it's true Lorenzo might have hindered such work if he would—and for the bull with the flaming horns, why, as Ser Cioni says, there may be many meanings to it, for the matter of that; it may have more to do with the taxes than we think. For when God above sends a sign, it's not to be supposed he'd have only one meaning."

"Spoken like an oracle, Goro!" said the barber. "Why, when we poor mortals can pack two or three meanings into one sentence, it were mere blasphemy not to believe that your miraculous bull means every thing that any man in Florence likes it to mean."

"Thou art pleased to scoff, Nello," said the sallow, round-shouldered man, no longer eclipsed by the notary, "but it is not the less true that every revelation, whether by visions, dreams, portents, or the written word, has many meanings, which it is given to the illuminated only to unfold."

"Assuredly," answered Nello. "Haven't I been to hear the Frate in San Lorenzo? But then, I've been to hear Fra Menico da Ponzo in the Duomo too; and according to him, your Fra Girolamo, with his visions and interpretations, is running after the wind of Mongibello, and those who follow him are like to have the fate of certain swine that ran headlong into the sea—or some hotter place. With San Domenico roaring è vero in one ear, and San Francisco screaming è falso in the other, what is a poor barber to do—unless he were illuminated? But it's plain our Goro here is beginning to be illuminated, for he already sees that the bull with the flaming horns means first himself, and, secondly, all the other aggrieved taxpayers of Florence, who are determined to gore the magistracy on the first opportunity."

"Goro is a fool!" said a bass voice, with a note that dropped like the sound of a great bell in the midst of much tinkling. "Let him carry home his leeks and shake his flanks over his wool-beating. He'll mend matters more that way than by showing his tun-shaped body in piazza, as if every body might measure his grievances by the size of his paunch. The gravezze (burdens, i. e. taxes) that harm him most are his heavy carcass and his idleness."

The speaker had joined the group only in time to hear the conclusion of Nello's speech, but he was one of those figures for whom all the world instinctively makes way, as it would for a battering-ram. He was not much above the middle height, but the impression of enormous force which was conveyed by his capacious chest and brawny arms bared to the shoulder, was deepened by the keen sense and quiet resolution expressed in his glance and in every furrow of his cheek and brow. He had often been an unconscious model to Domenico Ghirlandajo, when that great painter was making the walls of the churches reflect the life of Florence, and translating pale aërial traditions into the deep color and strong lines of the faces he knew. The naturally dark tint of his skin was additionally bronzed by the same powdery deposit that gave a polished black surface to his leathern apron—a deposit which habit had probably made a necessary condition of perfect ease, for it was not washed off with punctilious regularity.

Goro turned his fat cheek and glassy eye on the frank speaker with a look of deprecation rather than of resentment.

"Why, Niccolò," he said, in an injured tone, "I've heard you sing to another tune than that often enough, when you've been laying down the law at San Gallo on a festa. I've heard you say yourself that a man wasn't a mill-wheel, to be on the grind, grind, as long as he was driven, and then stick in his place without stirring when the water was low. And you're as fond of your vote as any man in Florence—ay, and I've heard you say, if Lorenzo—"

"Yes, yes," said Niccolò. "Don't you be bringing up my speeches again after you've swallowed them, and handing them about as if they were none the worse. I vote and I speak when there's any use in it: if there's hot metal on the anvil I lose no time before I strike; but I don't spend good hours in tinkling on cold iron, or in standing on the pavement as thou dost, Goro, with snout upward, like a pig under an oak-tree. And as for Lorenzo—who's dead and gone before his time—he was a man who had an eye for curious iron-work; and if any body says he wanted to make himself a tyrant, I say, 'Sia; I'll not deny which way the wind blows when every man can see the weather-cock.' But that only means that Lorenzo was a crested hawk, and there are plenty of hawks without crests whose claws and beaks are as good for tearing. Though if there was any chance of a real reform, so that Marzocco* might shake his mane and roar again, instead of dipping his head to lick the feet of any body that will mount and ride him, I'd strike a good blow for it."

"And that reform is not far off, Niccolò," said the sallow, mild-faced man, seizing his opportunity like a missionary among the too light-minded heathens; "for a time of tribulation is coming, and the scourge is at hand. And when the Church is purged of cardinals and prelates who traffic in her inheritance that their hands may be full to pay the price of blood, and to satisfy their own lusts, the State will be purged too—and Florence will be purged of men who love to see avarice and lechery under the red hat and the mitre because it gives them the screen of a more hellish vice than their own."

"Ay, as Goro's broad body would be a screen for my narrow person in case of missiles," said Nello; "but if that excellent screen happened to fall, I were stifled under it, surely enough. That is no bad image of thine, Nanni—or, rather of the Frate's; for I fancy there is no room in the small cup of thy understanding for any other liquor than what he pours into it."

* The stone Lion, emblem of the Republic.

"And it were well for thee, Nello," replied Nanni, "if thou couldst empty thyself of thy scoffs and thy jests, and take in that liquor too. The warning is ringing in the ears of all men: and it's no new story; for the Abbot Joachim prophesied of the coming time three hundred years ago, and now Fra Girolamo has got the message afresh. He has seen it in a vision, even as the prophets of old: he has seen the sword hanging from the sky."

"Ay, and thou wilt see it thyself, Nanni, if thou wilt stare upward long enough," said Niccolò; "for that pitiable tailor's work of thine makes thy noddle so overhang thy legs that thy eyeballs can see naught above the stitching-board but the roof of thy own skull."

The honest tailor bore the jest without bitterness, bent on convincing his hearers of his doctrine rather than of his dignity. But Niccolò gave him no opportunity for replying; for he turned away to the pursuit of his market business, probably considering further dialogue as a tinkling on cold iron.

"Ebbene," said the man with the hose round his neck, who had lately migrated from another knot of talkers, "they are safest who cross themselves and jest at nobody. Do you know that the Magnifico sent for the Frate at the last, and couldn't die without his blessing?"

"Was it so, in truth?" said several voices. "Yes, yes—God will have pardoned him." "He died like the best of Christians." "Never took his eyes from the holy crucifix." "And the Frate will have given him his blessing?"

"Well, I know no more," said he of the hosen; only Guccio there met a staffiere going back to Careggi, and he told him the Frate had been sent for yesternight, after the Magnifico had confessed and had the holy sacraments."

"It's likely enough the Frate will tell the people something about it in his sermon this morning; is it not true, Nanni?" said Goro. "What do you think?"

But Nanni had already turned his back on Goro, and the group was rapidly thinning; some being stirred by the impulse to go and hear "new things" from the Frate ("new things" were the nectar of Florentines); others by the sense that it was time to attend to their private business. In this general movement Bratti got close to the barber, and said:

"Nello, you've a ready tongue of your own, and are used to worming secrets out of people when you've once got them well lathered. I picked up a stranger this morning as I was coming in from Rovezzano, and I can spell him out no better than I can the letters on that scarf I bought from the French cavalier. It isn't my wits are at fault—I want no man to help me tell peas from paternosters—but when you come to foreign fashions a fool may happen to know more than a wise man."

"Ay, thou hast the wisdom of Midas, who could turn rags and rusty nails into gold, even as thou dost," said Nello; "and he had also something of the ass about him. But where is thy bird of strange plumage?"

Bratti was looking round with an air of disappointment.

"Diavolo!" he said, with some vexation. "The bird's flown. It's true he was hungry, and I forgot him. But we shall find him in the Mercato, within scent of bread and savors, I'll answer for him."

"Let us make the round of the Mercato, then," said Nello.

"It isn't his feathers that puzzle me," continued Bratti, as they pushed their way together. "There isn't much in the way of cut and cloth on this side the Holy Sepulchre that can puzzle a Florentine."

"Or frighten him either," said Nello, "after he has seen an Inglese or a Tedesco."

"No, no," said Bratti, cordially; "one may never lose sight of the Cupola and yet know the world, I hope. Besides, this stranger's clothes are good Italian merchandise, and the hose he wears were dyed in Ognissanti before ever they were dyed with salt-water, as he says. But the riddle about him is—"

Here Bratti's explanation was interrupted by some jostling as they reached one of the entrances of the piazza, and before he could resume it they had caught sight of the enigmatical object they were in search of.

CHAPTER II.

A BREAKFAST FOR LOVE.

AFTER Bratti had joined the knot of talkers, the young stranger, hopeless of learning what was the cause of the general agitation, and not much caring to know what was probably of little interest to any but born Florentines, soon became tired of waiting for Bratti's escort, and chose to stroll round the piazza, looking out for some vendor of eatables who might happen to have less than the average curiosity about public news. But as if at the suggestion of a sudden thought he thrust his hand into a purse or wallet that hung at his waist, and explored it again and again with a look of frustration.

"Not an obolus, by Jupiter!" he murmured, in a language which was not Tuscan or even Italian. "I thought I had one poor piece left. I must get my breakfast for love, then!"

He had not gone many steps farther before it seemed likely that he had found a quarter of the market where that medium of exchange might not be rejected.

In a corner, away from any group of talkers, two mules were standing, well adorned with red tassels and collars. One of them carried wooden milk-vessels, the other a pair of panniers filled with herbs and salads. Resting her elbow on the neck of the mule that carried the milk there leaned a young girl, apparently not more than sixteen, with a red hood surrounding her face, which was all the more baby-like in its prettiness from the entire concealment of her hair. The poor child, perhaps, was weary after her labor in the morning twilight in preparation for her walk to market from some castello three or four miles off, for she seemed to have gone to sleep in that half-standing half-leaning posture. Nevertheless our stranger had no compunction in awaking her, but the means he chose were so gentle that it seemed to the damsel in her dream as if a little sprig of thyme had touched her lips while she was stooping to gather the herbs. The dream was broken, however, for she opened her blue baby-eyes, and started up with astonishment and confusion to see the young stranger standing close before her. She heard him speaking to her in a voice which seemed so strange and soft that, even if she had been more collected, she would have taken it for granted that he said something hopelessly unintelligible to her, and her first movement was to turn her head a little away, and lift up a corner of her green serge mantle as a screen. He repeated his words:

"Forgive me, pretty one, for waking you. I'm dying with hunger, and the scent of milk makes breakfast seem more desirable than ever."

He had chosen the words "muoio di fame," because he knew they would be familiar to her ears; and he had uttered them playfully, with the intonation of a mendicant. This time he was understood; the corner of the mantle was dropped, and in a few moments a large cup of fragrant milk was held out to him. He paid no further compliments before raising it to his lips, and while he was drinking the little maiden found courage to look up at the long brown curls of this singular-voiced stranger, who had asked for food in the tones of a beggar, but who—though his clothes were much damaged—was unlike any beggar she had ever seen.

While this process of survey was going on there was another current of feeling that carried her hand into a bag which hung by the side of the mule, and when the stranger set down his cup he saw a large piece of bread held out toward him, and caught a glance of the blue eyes that seemed intended as an encouragement to him to take this additional gift.

"But perhaps that is your own breakfast," he said. "No, I have had enough without payment. A thousand thanks, my gentle one!"

There was no rejoinder in words; but the piece of bread was pushed a little nearer to him, as if in impatience at his refusal; and as the long dark eyes of the stranger rested on the baby face it seemed to be gathering more and more courage to look up and meet them.

"Ah, then, if I must take the bread," he said, laying his hand on it, "I shall get bolder still, and beg for another kiss to make the bread sweeter."

His speech was getting wonderfully intelligible in spite of the strange voice, which had at first almost seemed a thing to make her cross herself. She blushed deeply, and lifted up a corner of her mantle to her mouth again. But just as the too-presumptuous stranger was leaning forward, and had his fingers on the arm that held up the screening mantle, he was startled by a harsh voice close upon his ear.

"Who are you—with a murrain to you? No honest buyer, I'll warrant, but a hanger-on of the dicers—or something worse. Go! dance off, and find fitter company, or I'll give you a tune to a little quicker time than you'll like."

The young stranger drew back and looked at the speaker with a glance provokingly free from alarm and deprecation, and his slight expression of saucy amusement broke into a broad beaming smile as he surveyed the figure of his threatener. She was a stout but brawny woman, with a man's jerkin slipped over her green serge gamurra or gown, and the peaked hood of some departed mantle fastened round her sunburned face, which, under all its coarseness and premature wrinkles, showed a half-sad half-ludicrous maternal resemblance to the tender baby face of the little maiden—the sort of resemblance which often seems a more croaking, shudder-creating prophecy than that of the death's-head.

There was something irresistibly propitiating in that bright young smile, but Monna Ghita was not a woman to betray any weakness, and she went on speaking, apparently with heightened exasperation:

"Yes, yes, you can grin as well as other monkeys in cap and jerkin. You're a minstrel or a mountebank, I'll be sworn! You look for all the world as silly as a tumbler when he's been upside-down and has got on his heels again. And what fool's tricks hast thou been after, Tessa?" she added, turning to her daughter, whose frightened face was more inviting to abuse. "Giving away the milk and victuals, it seems; ay, ay, thou'dst carry water in thy ears for any idle vagabond that didn't like to stoop for it, thou silly, staring rabbit! Turn thy back and lift the herbs out of the panniers, else I'll make thee say a few Aves without counting!"

"Nay, Madonna," said the stranger, with a pleading smile, "don't be angry with your pretty Tessa for taking pity on a hungry traveler, who found himself unexpectedly without a quat-rino. Your handsome face looks so well when it frowns, that I long to see it illuminated by a smile."

"Va, va! I know what paste you are made of. You may tickle me with that straw a good long while before I shall laugh, I can tell you. Get along, with a bad Easter! else I'll make a beauty-spot or two on that face of yours that shall spoil your kissing on this side Advent."

As Monna Ghita lifted her formidable talons by way of complying with the first and last requisite of eloquence, Bratti, who had come up a minute or two before, had been saying to his companion, "What think you of this pappagallo, Nello? Doesn't his tongue smack of Venice?"

"Nay, Bratti," said the barber in an under tone, "thy wisdom has much of the ass in it, as I told thee just now; especially about the ears. This stranger is a Greek, else I'm not the barber who has had the sole and exclusive shaving of the excellent Demetrio, and drawn more than one sorry tooth from his learned jaw. And this youth might be taken to have come straight from Olympus—at least when he has had a touch of my razor."

"Orsù! Monna Ghita!" continued Nello, not sorry to see some sport; "what has happened to cause such a thunder-storm? Has this young stranger been misbehaving himself?"

"By San Giovanni!" said the cautious Bratti, who had not shaken off his original suspicions concerning the shabbily-clad possessor of jewels, "he did right to run away from me, if he meant to get into mischief. I can swear that I found him under the Loggia de' Cerchi, with a ring on his finger such as I've seen worn by Bernardo Rucellai himself. Not another rusty nail's worth do I know about him."

"Che, che," said Nello, eying the stranger good-humoredly; "the fact is, this bello giovane has been a little too presumptuous in admiring the charms of Monna Ghita, and has attempted to kiss her while her daughter's back is turned; for I observe that the pretty Tessa is too busy to look this way at present. Was it not so, Messer?" Nello concluded, in a tone of courtesy.

"You have divined the offense like a sooth-sayer," said the stranger, laughingly. "Only that I had not had the good fortune to find Monna Ghita here at first. I begged a cup of milk from her daughter, and had accepted this gift of bread, for which I was making an humble offering of gratitude, before I had had the higher pleasure of being face to face with these ripe charms which I was perhaps too bold in admiring."

"Va, va! be off, every one of you, and stay in purgatory till I pay to get you out, will you?" said Monna Ghita, fiercely, elbowing Nello, and leading forward her mule so as to compel the stranger to jump aside. "Tessa, thou simpleton, bring forward thy mule a bit, the cart will be upon us."

As Tessa turned to take the mule's bridle she cast one timid glance at the stranger, who was now moving with Nello out of the way of an approaching market-cart; and the glance was just long enough to seize the beckoning movement of his hand, which indicated that he had been watching for this opportunity of an adieu.

"Ebbene," said Bratti, raising his voice to speak across the cart; "I leave you with Nello, young man, for there's no pushing my bag and basket any farther, and I have business at home. But you'll remember our bargain, because if you found Tessa without me it was not my fault. Nello will show you my shop in the Ferravecchi, and I'll not turn my back on you."

"A thousand thanks, friend!" said the stranger, laughing, and then turned away with Nello up the narrow street which led most directly to the Piazza del Duomo.

CHAPTER III.

THE BARBER'S SHOP.

"To tell you the truth," said the young stranger to Nello, as they got a little clearer of the entangled vehicles and mules, "I am not sorry to be handed over by that patron of mine to one who has a less barbarous accent, and a less enigmatical business. Is it a common thing among you Florentines for an itinerant trafficker in broken glass and rags to talk of a shop where he sells lutes and swords?"

"Common? No: our Bratti is not a common man. He has a theory, and lives up to it, which is more than I can say for any philosopher I have the honor of shaving," answered Nello, whose loquacity, like an overfull bottle, could never pour forth a small dose. "Bratti means to extract the utmost possible amount of pleasure, that is to say, of hard bargaining, out of this life; winding it up with a bargain for the easiest possible passage through purgatory, by giving Holy Church his winnings when the game is over. He has had his will made to that effect on the cheapest terms a notary could be got for. But I have often said to him, 'Bratti, thy bargain is a limping one, and thou art on the lame side of it. Does it not make thee a little sad to look at the pictures of the Paradiso? Thou wilt never be able there to chaffer for rags and rusty nails; the saints and angels want neither pins nor tinder; and except with San Bartolommeo, who carries his skin about in an inconvenient manner, I see no chance of thy making a bargain for second-hand clothing.' But, Dio mi perdoni," added Nello, changing his tone, and crossing himself, "this light talk ill beseems a morning when Lorenzo lies dead, and the Muses are tearing their hair—always a painful thought to a barber; and you yourself, Messer, are probably under a cloud, for when a man of your speech and presence takes up with so sorry a night's lodging, it argues some misfortune to have befallen him."

"What Lorenzo is that whose death you speak of?" said the stranger, appearing to have dwelt with too anxious an interest on this point to have noticed the indirect inquiry that followed it.

"What Lorenzo? There is but one Lorenzo, I imagine, whose death could throw the Mercato into an uproar, set the lantern of the Duomo leaping in desperation, and cause the lions of the Republic to feel under an immediate necessity to devour one another. I mean Lorenzo de' Medici, the Pericles of our Athens—if I may make such a comparison in the ear of a Greek."

"Why not?" said the other, laughingly; "for I doubt whether Athens, even in the days of Pericles, could have produced so learned a barber."

"Yes, yes; I thought I could not be mistaken," said the rapid Nello, "else I have shaved the venerable Demetrio Calcondila to little purpose; but pardon me, I am lost in wonder: your Italian is better than his, though he has been in Italy forty years—better even than that of the accomplished Marullo, who may be said to have married the Italic Muse in more senses than one, since he has married our learned and lovely Alessandra Scala."

"It will lighten your wonder to know that I come of a Greek stock, planted in Italian soil much longer than the mulberry-trees which have taken so kindly to it. I was born at Bari, and my—I mean, I was brought up by an Italian—and, in fact, may rather be called a Græculus than a Greek. The Greek dye was subdued in me, I suppose, till I had been dipped over again by long abode and much travel in the land of gods and heroes. And, to confess something of my private affairs to you, this same Greek dye, with a few ancient gems I have about me, is the only fortune shipwreck has left me. But—when the towers fall, you know, it is an ill-business for the small nest-builders—the death of your Pericles makes me wish I had rather turned my steps toward Rome, as I should have done, but for a fallacious Minerva in the shape of an Augustinian monk. 'At Rome,' he said, 'you will be lost in a crowd of hungry scholars; but at Florence, every corner is penetrated by the sunshine of Lorenzo's patronage: Florence is the best market in Italy for such commodities as yours.'"

"Gnaffè, and so it will remain, I hope," said Nello. "Lorenzo was not the only patron and judge of learning in our city—Heaven forbid! Because he was a large melon, every other Florentine is not a pumpkin, mi pare. Have we not Bernardo Rucellai, and Alamanno Rinuccini, and plenty more? And if you want to be informed on such matters, I, Nello, am your man. It seems to me a thousand years till I can be of service to a bel erudito like yourself. And, first of all, in the matter of your hair. That beard, my fine young man, must be parted with, were it as dear to you as the nymph of your dreams. Here at Florence we love not to see a man with his nose projecting over a cascade of hair. But, remember, you will have passed the Rubicon when once you have been shaven: if you repent, and let your beard grow after it has acquired stoutness by a struggle with the razor, your mouth will by-and-by show no longer what Messer Angelo calls the divine prerogative of lips, but will appear like a dark cavern fringed with horrent brambles."
